dissenting sect in England or Scotland, to tighten the bonds of internal organisation. Influences in the great world outside, especially in France, which tempted to a loosening of hereditary severity, furnished only so many fresh incentives and admonitions to the leaders of the society to heighten their walls and strengthen their dictatorship. Not the less is the endeavour in itself unnatural and doomed to failure. Calvinism, like other forms of Protestantism, rests upon the right and duty of private judgment. Desirous as its chiefs may properly be to guide private judgment to the conclusions they regard as true, they cannot abstain from appeals to the reason which are sure to be answered in various ways. In proportion as the danger they perceive disposes them to dogmatise as a means of resisting it, many minds are the more resolved to exercise to its largest extent the freedom which they have been taught is the foundation of their society. Dogmatism and heterodoxy are the twin dangers of a community like the French Reformed Church. Views indistinguishable from Unitarianism are at once effect and cause of an absolutism such as that under which the Protestant Church of Paris has been bowed until the last few months. In the same conflict of a narrow conformity and an anarchical liberty may be found an explanation of the want of progressiveness of the Reformed Church in the French nation. To describe its condition as stagnant would not be fair. French Calvinists are devoted to the practice of their religion. Their services are well attended. They are well taught, and are as ready as in the days of the Bourbons to bear sacrifices for their belief. Their faith can attest its vitality by deeds. No Frenchmen are more moral, more industrious, more intelligent, and more patriotic than the members of the Reformed Church. Their prosperity is confirmation of the good qualities from which it springs. In comparison with their numbers they occupy an enormous proportion of places of public and private trust. A Ministry would be born with the seeds of dissolution in it which did not comprise one or more Protestant statesmen. Yet this community, so earnest in its religion, to which its religion is so useful, and which by its individual adherents helps so largely to govern France, can scarcely be said to be a corporate element at all in French nationality. The spirit of French Protestantism is not discernible in French literature or in French society. French Protestantism appears satisfied to keep its skirts from contamination by the surrounding corruption. If it make any efforts to purify the heavy atmosphere of modern French feeling, their success is not manifest to foreign observation. Either it is motionless or it moves in a circle. So far from making converts, its ranks seem to grow thinner and thinner. In time it threatens to become a caste rather than a class, an inheritance of certain energetic families rather than an aspect of French life and a form of French thought.

For the Reformed Church to assert its legitimate rank in French nationality the majority in it must consent to be less dogmatic and the minority to be better disciplined. Catholicism daily loses its hold on the national mind. Powerful in its sway over the senses, it will not agree to address arguments to the understanding, which in a Frenchman has to be convinced as well as the emotions. Through its unwillingness or incapacity to prevail with the reason it is sinking into the untenable position of a faith for women and children which manhood disdains. Protestantism might have afforded a refuge for tempers in need of a religion which shall be one they may share and not merely subscribe to and wait upon. As French Calvinism is, a Frenchman conscious of a spiritual void would scarcely look more to the Reformed Church to fill it than he would think of turning German because he felt discontented with the tone of French literature. From the meagre glimpses attainable into the precincts of French Calvinism he would observe one party in the Church engaged in the framing of shibboleths to exclude as many brethren as possible, and another occupied in proclaiming an independence contradictory to all repose of soul. The change which takes effect from yesterday will not by itself abate either anarchy or despotism. If the orthodox majority prove itself a local majority everywhere, it has asserted its intention to exercise its extreme rights and keep every form of doctrine but its own dumb and gagged. A majority, however, must be both exceedingly resolute and well trained and exceedingly unscrupulous to accomplish such a result. Somewhere there is certain to be a rift. In the midst of the ruling oligarchy itself a dissentient may arise to plead for private judgment. Should the level surface of French Calvinism admit thus of being diversified, yet not convulsed, a time might come when Protestantism would once more display itself, as it has not shown itself for the last two centuries, among the living forces of rational being.

DARWIN AND THE CLERGY.

The Pall Mall Gazette of Tuesday writes:—

The singular apotheosis of Mr. Darwin's, which followed an address on Evolution delivered last night by Dr. W. B. Carpenter, at Sion College, was even more impressive, from a theological point of view, than his burial in the Abbey. Not a single one of the large body of clergymen present ventured to declare himself an anti-evolutionist, and only one or two hinted a fault in the argument and hesitated dislike to some of Mr. Darwin's school. Most professed to find in Mr. Darwin a staunch champion of the Church, and one gentleman spoke of him as "a humble and holy man of God." One speaker, unconscious that he was sitting under the portrait of the late Bishop of Oxford (Dr. Wilberforce), argued that the clergy, as a body, had never shown any opposition to the new learning, only the noisy nobodies had made their voices heard. Mr. Darwin was canonised, but Haeckel and Huxley were—let us say damned with faint praise.

The Christian Register of Boston, U.S., writes:—

The death of Charles Robert Darwin removes one of the most remarkable men of the century. No man since Newton or Kant has exerted such a powerful influence upon human thought. . . . In this short time nearly all the prominent scientific men of our time, in England, Germany, and this country, have accepted the doctrine of evolution, in some form or other. Agassiz was the last naturalist of special prominence who held out stubbornly against the new doctrine, and considered it "a mire of assertion"; but to many of his hearers the very facts which the learned savant presented in his charming lectures seemed rather to support the evolution theory than his own, and most of his pupils, including his own son, embraced some form of the doctrine he opposed. The marvellous rapidity with which Mr. Darwin's views have found acceptance among scientific men defies all comparison. "It is without a parallel," said George Ripley, "in the history of knowledge." . . . Though we have not space now to consider its special relation to theology, yet it may be said that, under a rational view of this doctrine, theism is fortified, rather than weakened, and the dignity of man is lifted far above the plane on which dogmatic theology had placed it.

BROOKE HERFORD.

The Chicago Unity writes:—

The call of the Rev. Brooke Herford to the pulpit of the Arlington-street Church, Boston, and the acceptance of the same by him, adds one more honourable name to the somewhat long list of ministers which Western Unitarianism has contributed to the life of the "Eastern Church." Within the last few years, Messrs. Shippen, Staples, Savage, Cooke, Harrison, Ames, Heywood, Pardee, Stebbins, Parrot, Rowen, Collyer, Herford, and others that do not occur to the memory at the present moment, were beckoned eastward from harder fields of labour to those abounding in more honours and dollars. This last affliction is as complimentary to Mr. Herford as it is depressing to the Church of the Messiah of Chicago, where he has laboured so successfully for nearly seven years, and to the Western Conference, in whose welfare he has taken such vital and serviceable interest. The Unitarian Church of America has nothing more honourable to offer to a minister than the pulpit of Channing, Gannett, and J. F. W. Ware, and that it has given to Mr. Herford. We will not begrudge him this well-won distinction. The ministry, like other callings, should be allowed all the inspiration that comes from merited promotion. We extend our congratulations to Mr. Herford, and will do what we can to prepare other recruits for our Eastern Mission fields.

The revision of the Old Testament is nearly finished. The second revision will take the whole of the present year, and the finished work will be published in 1883.

PROFESSOR MOLESCHOTT, a member of the Italian Senate, will deliver a lecture at the Roman University, on the first Sunday in June, upon the life and work of the late Mr. Darwin.

Correspondence.

THE SUSTENTATION FUND.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—So much interest has been expressed about the Sustentation Fund, which it was determined at Liverpool to establish, that we should like to inform your readers that the committee are making careful inquiries as to the amount required, and are preparing a scheme for the management of the Fund.

As soon as the necessary arrangements can be made, a statement will be issued, and it is trusted that the requirements of the case will be met as generously as the enthusiasm shown at Liverpool has led the committee to expect.

On behalf of the Secretaries,

A. W. WORTHINGTON.

Old Swinford, Stourbridge, May 15.

THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The able letter of Mr. Orr, which appeared in the Inquirer of the 6th inst., calls to my mind a very painful experience in relation to the Resurrection of Jesus, and it occurs to me that a statement of the way in which I obtained relief from my difficulty on the matter may, perhaps, be a contribution to the present discussion in your columns not altogether useless.

Having, while a Congregational Minister, been compelled by strong conviction to relinquish belief in the plenary inspiration of the Bible and much of the supernatural element in it, my crucial difficulty remained in the narratives of the Resurrection of Jesus. I found but little help in such Unitarian literature as I knew of. I read Dr. Priestley's able sermon on the subject, and the evidence therein cited seemed quite convincing that Jesus had risen from the dead. Yet I could not believe the strange series of miracles associated with that event—the entrance into a room where the apostles were met—the doors being shut—the partaking of broiled fish and honeycomb, the vanishing out of their sight, and finally the ascension into the clouds of heaven. This difficulty held me in the bonds of Congregationalism long after other ties had been snapped. But one day, looking over an old bookstall in High-street, Holborn, I came upon a copy of that able work, "An Inquiry Concerning the Origin of Christianity" (1838), by Charles C. Hennell, the friend and adviser of George Eliot. There I found a solution of my difficulty. At Charing Cross Railway-station, amidst the bustle and confusion of the waiting-room, I eagerly read the portion relating to the resurrection, and my trouble disappeared. I had been unable to abandon belief in the honesty of the apostles and other first missionaries of the Christian faith in their declaration that they had seen Jesus alive after the crucifixion. I felt certain that something had happened to account for the empty sepulchre. Mr. Hennell's theory supplies a rational explanation of the matter.

[Mr. Hennell's theory, for the full statement of which we have no space, is that Joseph of Arimathea, aided possibly by Nicodemus, obtained possession of the body and buried it secretly, and then told Mary Magdalene that Jesus had risen and gone into Galilee.]

Another rational solution of the difficulty is presented in a very interesting American work entitled "What was He? or Jesus in the Light of the Nineteenth Century," by William Denton. Mr. Denton's theory is that Jesus did not really die, but that Joseph of Arimathea, seeing signs of life when he deposited the body of Jesus in the tomb, secretly but successfully used means for his recovery—that Jesus went out into Joseph's garden in the early morning of the third day, and was seen by Mary, and perhaps some of the others, as narrated in the New Testament, but that the result of the crucifixion, exposure, and excitement was that Jesus, after lingering some time in Joseph's house, died, and was secretly buried by his kind but timid host. Mr. Denton quotes in support of his theory the fact that several fanatical women in France among the Convulsionnaires were crucified (some of them several times), but after remaining on the cross for hours were taken down, and speedily recovered.

Mr. Page Hopps, in his recent letter on the subject in your columns, says, "What became of the body of Jesus, then, is a matter of no consequence." That is perfectly true if it were only a question of so much decaying matter; but, for evidential purposes, in discussing the problem of the spread of Christianity on the basis of a belief in the resurrection of the body of Jesus, it is of the very highest importance.

Excuse my adding that the thankfulness I felt for the help afforded me in this question by Mr. Hennell's book was so great that I reprinted the portion relating to the disappearance of the body of Jesus, and have had the pleasure of gratuitously distributing a thousand copies, mostly in response to applications by post. I purpose publishing a tract, containing both Mr. Hennell's and Mr. Denton's theories, and will gladly send a free copy to any who may ask for it, by post-card or otherwise. Mr. Dalton's view is reasoned out in a very interesting and convincing way.

F. HADYN WILLIAMS.

Manor House Villas, Blackpool, May 15.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Your correspondent "K. B.," quoting the words ascribed to Jesus, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up," asks, "How can this Divine declaration be reconciled with Mr. Orr's" statement that the miracle was brought upon Jesus?

To this I reply by referring "K. B." to another declaration of Jesus, "No one taketh my life from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power (or right) to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment received I from my Father."

With as much reason might "K. B." ask, How is the above declaration of Jesus, "No one taketh my life from me," to be reconciled with the fact of his being put to death by the Jews and Pilate on a cross on Calvary? Is it not plain from his own statement that he must have been guilty of felo de se?

Will "K. B." excuse me if I say that such criticism is much on a par with most of those arguments whereby modern scepticism tries to get rid of that great fact in Jesus's history, that proved him, as a contemporary declares, "to be the Son of God with power by his resurrection from the dead?"

JAMES ORR.

Clonmel, May 15.

CRIME IN IRELAND—WHO IS RESPONSIBLE?

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—In common, I suppose, with most of your readers, I read with considerable interest the letter of Mr. Harold Rylett which appeared in your columns last week. In it he echoes the sentiment expressed on all sides now—that of horror and detestation of the crime committed on Saturday week. The agents and supporters of the Land League are anxious to wash their hands of all complicity in that affair. But it appears to many that he and his friends protest too much; they are too eager to join in the almost universal cry of execration. It is difficult to reconcile their present language with their past utterances, and the countenance they have given to the acts of their associates. And this applies to Mr. Harold Rylett as well as to the other leaders of the Irish revolutionary party. The day following the date of his letter the Times, quoting from the Ulster Examiner, gave certain extracts from a speech of his delivered in St. Mary's Hall, Belfast, on May 5, at a Nationalist meeting to celebrate "the Land League triumph." Referring to the office of Chief Secretary, he said it was no sinecure to be filled by sprigs of lordly English families, and he hoped the people would make the office as hot a one as possible. What was such language as that to an excited meeting but a direct incentive to crime? And that was said the day before the murders. What did he mean by "making the office as hot a one as possible for the new Chief Secretary?" This was said, too, after the "policy of conciliation and concession" which he approves in the Inquirer had been entered upon. A new man is chosen to carry out that policy, and just as he sets his foot in Ireland, before he has time to make a single enemy or do the slightest wrong, Mr. Rylett at a public meeting says he hopes the people will make his place as hot as possible for him. Some ruffians taking the advice did truly make it "hot" for the stranger just come with his message of conciliation.

But this is not all. Mr. Rylett continued, "Lop off all they liked of the branches of the tree of injustice—now the Land Question, now another question, and what remains? There will be no peace in Ireland while England rules there. It was not local government they wanted, or partial self-government. They wanted the whole thing—that Ireland should be a nation once again. Let them not think that they had gained all yet." But in the Inquirer he says, "We seek to secure legislative recognition of the principle laid down by J. S. Mill, that the land of Ireland, like the land of every other country, belongs to the people; and also for the further principle that the administration of Irish domestic affairs should be in the hands of an Irish House of Commons on due guarantee being given for the integrity of the Empire." More inconsistency. In the speech he says it is not local government they wanted, not partial self-government, but they wanted the whole thing; that is, I presume, absolute independence. But in the letter what he asks for is that the administration of Irish domestic affairs should be in the hands of an Irish House of Commons, on due guarantee being given for the integrity of the Empire. Which line of policy does he seriously mean—"the whole thing," or half the thing? One would like to know whether in the speech he upheld "the integrity of the Empire," as he does in the letter. It is true he speaks apologetically of his "use in moments of excitement of expressions which can scarcely be justified in calmer moments." But a man should not use in presence of an excited meeting expressions which in calm moments cannot be justified. And where, as in this case, his utterances have been followed by murder, he cannot expect to be forgiven by tendering a word or two of apology. A most serious responsibility attaches to every sentence of one who takes the position of a leader of the people in a grave crisis of their affairs. And if he scatters sparks in all directions where gunpowder is lying about, and an explosion follows, it is mere trifling to come forward and declare himself horrified at the catastrophe. One word more. If the leaders of the Land League would prove the sincerity of their horror at the Phoenix Park murders, let them discountenance all similar crimes in future, and assist heartily in bringing to justice those who commit them.

C. F. B.

HOME RULE.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I am glad to find Mr. Rylett apologising for expressions which roused indignation and disgust, and which seemed utterly unworthy of a Christian minister. Remembering his position on the poll, we may doubt his assertion—that his party is now "absolutely supreme"; but the power which he claims for it—"to suppress illegitimate secret societies"—involves a very serious responsibility.

As to the complicated agrarian question, the axiom—that "the land of Ireland, like the land of any other country, belongs to the people"—does not imply that either the buildings on land, nor the culture which has redeemed it from the wilderness, is public property. Though no doubt, in a sense, since there could be no property if there was no law, the Legislature claims control over all property for the public good.

If I were an Irishman I might resent being under the rule of an English Lord-Lieutenant, Chief Secretary, and Under-Secretary; yet it should be remembered that Ireland has more than its share of representation in Parliament in proportion to its present population, viz., 103 instead of 96. Mr. Rylett desires a House of Commons in Dublin to administer Irish affairs. There are, I suppose, many of us who think that Parliament has far more to do than it can possibly attend to, and that it might be well to have provincial Boards for local legislation, with a Court of Division for the United Kingdom of delegates from these Boards, even if the assent of Parliament were required before any measure became law; but I infer that Mr. Rylett desires that the Irish House of Commons should have powers no less extensive than before the Union, indeed, that Ireland should be as independent as the colonies. Although the Irish vote has, on the whole, been helpful to the Liberal party, I suppose that the Home Rulers have succeeded in schooling us into the belief that we could dispense with their presence at Westminster, and that, for our own peace, we could be content with secession, if it would assure peace to Ireland. This, however, seems to me more than doubtful, and I should be glad to know what Mr. Rylett and other Protestant Home Rulers expect should the Irish House of Commons (he says nothing of the Irish Lords) be restored. Would the Catholics be content with religious equality? Would not the priesthood claim that the Catholic Church should receive compensation for the oppression of centuries, and that it should be established and endowed as the national religion? Would not Home Rule in Ireland mean Rome Rule in Ulster? Those who object to Church despotism, as well as those who object to agrarian communism, are unwise if they risk the rights they now possess.

Bridport, May 17. R. L. CARPENTER.

PROPOSED NEW DOMESTIC MISSION. TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Had time allowed at the very interesting meeting held on Wednesday evening I would have ventured to make a suggestion or two relative to founding a new mission in London, and offer them now through your columns.

Money, as was well said by Mr. F. Nettlefold, is not the main thing wanted, but workers and work. But in my judgment the man to start with as head and chief is everything. The difficulty of obtaining such was greatly felt by our London committee when both its stations, Spicer-street and George's-row, became vacant at the same time. It is now, and has been felt at Birmingham since the death of my dear friend the late John Wilson, who so admirably filled the post of missionary there for many years. It has been, and is likely again to be felt at Liverpool also. As yet no suitable candidates have offered themselves for either vacancy.

My suggestion is rather for the future than for the present. Let there be at least one student specially trained at Manchester New College for mission work. The college is, I am very happy to say, now closely connected, though not officially, with our London Domestic Mission, through our excellent secretary, Professor Carpenter, and the Rev. Professor Drummond, also a member of our committee.

Let there be a scholarship fund raised for this object, say enough to yield £100 a year for two years, another £50 at least to be provided by the London committee, or any other according to service rendered. Two years or more of practical mission work would be one of the best preparations for ministerial duties elsewhere, if thought desirable by the student so trained. These suggestions are of course crude, and open to revision.

What an admirable application of the Hibbert Trust Fund might be made in the direction thus indicated, one so much in harmony with the wishes, if not the very will of the founder of that splendid endowment! C. L. CORKRAN.

LONDON MINISTERS' CONFERENCE TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The Committee of the London Ministers' Conference cordially invite the attendance of ministers at the meeting of Friday, June 2, at Dr. Williams's Library, Grafton-street, Gower-street, when the subject, "The Methods of a Church for our Time," will be introduced by the Rev. Dr. James Freeman Clarke. Tea at six, chair taken at seven.

May I add that as it is specially important on this occasion that we should know beforehand how many will be present, we shall feel obliged if gentlemen will kindly signify without delay their acceptance of this invitation.

HENRY IERSON, Secretary.

It is proposed, we believe, to place a bust of Mr. Darwin in the Abbey, and, if the funds admit, to found a scholarship bearing his name, and intended to foster the pursuit of scientific research.

Religious Intelligence.

THE LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.

The forty-seventh annual meeting of the members and friends of this Society was held at the Mission-station, George's-row, Lever-street, on Wednesday evening. The large room was crowded in every part, many persons standing during the whole proceedings. The chair was occupied by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, M.A., and among others present were Mr. D. Ainsworth, M.P., Mr. Meadows Martineau, Treasurer; the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., Secretary; the Revs. W. A. Pope and F. Summers, Missionaries; Mr. C. Corkran, Mrs. Madge, Miss Bischoff, Miss Tyrrell, Miss Tagart, the Revs. Dr. Martineau, Dr. Drummond, J. A. Picton, T. Forsyth, R. Spears, P. H. Wicksteed, T. L. Marshall, W. C. Bowie, A. B. Camm, D. Davis (Nottingham), A. M. Geldart, J. T. Whitehead; Messrs. Blake-Oggers, LL.D.; L. M. Aspland, LL.D.; T. Smith Osler, LL.B.; T. C. Clarke, I. M. Wade, J. T. Preston, F. Nettlefold, E. Bromley, S. Preston, E. B. Squire, P. Worsley, W. Wilson, R. Bartram, A. Preston, A. J. Fabritius, J. Wellings, J. Brabner, H. Jeffery, J. Conway, H. Martineau, C. Hind, W. A. Sharpe, F. S. Schwann, &c., &c.

Mr. T. MEADOWS MARTINEAU read the Treasurer's report, of which the following is an abstract:—

1881.		RECEIPTS.
Balance in hand	...	£37	0 6
Subscriptions...	...	548	9 6
Donations	...	82	5 0
Collections	...	90	2 7
Legacies	...	513	18 6
Government Grant	...	184	19 0
Dividends	...	72	5 2
Nelson Bequest	...	34	6 3
Rent	...	31	0 8
		£1,594	7 2
		EXPENDITURE.
General Purposes	...	£47	0 10
Spicer-street Mission	...	606	3 3
George's-row Mission	...	525	0 0
Invested	...	343	18 6
		£1,522	2 7
Balance in hand	...	72	4 7
		£1,594	7 2

The Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, Secretary, read the following

COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

The proceedings of the Mission, directed by your Committees, do not essentially vary from year to year, and present little matter for special comment or report. The earnest and faithful labours of the Missionaries have been continued with persistent zeal; and though, owing in part to special circumstances of locality and population, the field at George's-row seems to yield more visible harvest of success, your Committee are assured that the maintenance of the efficiency of the Station at Spicer-street is still of high importance to the neighbourhood, and feel it of the greatest consequence that its Missionary, Mr. Pope, should be aided in his difficult task with every encouragement and support.

In accordance with the announcement made in the last Report, the Mixed School at Spicer-street was closed after the inspection in July last. The report of H. M.'s Inspector stated that the Mixed School had "improved considerably" during the previous year, and added, with respect to the infants, "Great pains are taken with the children in this school, and it is in a thoroughly satisfactory state."

The Committee are glad to be able to add that the Infants' School continues in excellent order, under the superintendence of Miss Spurgeon, and has considerably increased in numbers. The anticipations expressed by your Committee a year ago with regard to the probable effect of the closing of the Mixed School have thus been fully justified.

Similar increase in the numbers of the Infants' School has shown itself at George's-row. H.M.'s Inspector having recommended certain changes in the organisation of the teaching, your Committee entrusted these modifications to the Head Mistress, Miss Nesbitt, and have now good hope of more satisfactory results.

The Committee desire again to acknowledge with gratitude the kindness of the congregations and Ministers who last year, as on previous occasions, held collections on behalf of the Mission. The sums thus gathered form an important element in the annual income of the Society, and the Committee likewise feel that the opportunity of thus presenting the claims of the Mission before a large circle of friends is of great value to them.

The Treasurer's balance-sheet for the year is in no way exceptional. The subscriptions are rather more than they were in the previous year, the donations and the chapel collections rather less; but those receipts were not sufficient for the year's expenditure by about £170, for which sum recourse was had to the legacies left to the Society in the year. These legacies were £200 from Mr. Edward Wright, and £313 18s. 6d. from Mr. Middleton, the proceeds of the sale of two Brighton Railway shares, bequeathed to the Society, as mentioned in the report of a former year. Mr. Edward Wright was one of the first and truest friends of your Society, for many years a member of your Committee, and always foremost in giving to it, its Missionaries, its teachers, its scholars, and its poor, his time, advice, and sympathy, as well as his means.

To the memory of Mr. Samuel Sharpe likewise the Committee pay their last tribute of reverent regard. He, too, had been among the earliest promoters of the Mission, and till the end of his long labours continued by generous support to testify his hearty sympathy with its endeavour to spread religious principles among the neglected poor.

We have also lost another warm friend and benefactor during the past year—Mrs. Warren, of Streatham. She has bequeathed £100 to the Society, but it does not appear in this year's accounts. The year's expenditure is very similar to last year's, but your Committee determined on doing what they have for years felt they ought to do—increasing your Missionaries' stipend from £175 to £200. Of course it rests with the supporters of the Mission whether this increase shall be permanent.

The Committee feel, therefore, that they must renew their appeal for further aid with increasing earnestness. The work of the Society remains what it has been for upwards of a generation, and meantime the wealth and the needs of London have both increased with rapid strides. Your Committee are convinced that the principles upon which their work is conducted are thoroughly sound, and they cannot see large districts, whether in the heart of the metropolis or on its outskirts, in which the provision of religious agencies is far below the demand of the population, without desiring to carry into other neighbourhoods the same trusts and the same methods which have already proved effective in the stations so long established. They are persuaded that the operations of the Society ought to be extended; but this extension cannot take place without considerable additional means. In returning, therefore, to their subscribers for renewed instructions, they seek to communicate to them their own sense of the high significance of the objects of the Society, and of the results hitherto attained, and to learn whether it is their wish that steps should be taken for the promotion of similar endeavours in some other quarter of the vast area where the fields are always ready but the labourers are still too few.

The CHAIRMAN, after explaining and regretting a confusion of dates which would compel him to leave the meeting before its close, in order to deliver a lecture at the Men and Women's Working College, Queen-square, said that this was the first public meeting he had attended since he left the Church of England; indeed, he might say it was the third public meeting he had attended in the course of his life—(laughter). He was not a public speaker, except in the pulpit, and he felt exceedingly shy and diffident in speaking before a large audience of any kind. But that being the first public meeting he had attended among men with whom he had cast in his lot—(applause)—he could not possibly pass by the opportunity of saying something with regard to his own personal position. For reasons chiefly private, in which most of those present would sympathise were he to mention them, he had refrained from accepting the many invitations sent to him to speak among the Unitarian body. And he did not wish when he left that Church to bear a sect name, so far as the name Unitarian belonged to a sect at all. He wished in that sense to keep, if possible, a distinct position; but he thought the time had now come when people pretty well felt that that position was a distinct one, so that he might speak with more freedom than he should perhaps have done two years ago. He wanted to keep a free position, but he understood that in many quarters it had been misunderstood—not Unitarian quarters, for he could only return his sincere and grateful thanks to the whole Unitarian body for the extreme consideration, kindness and thoughtfulness with which they had treated him, in keeping themselves from making any demand upon him to come forward and join them, since he left the Church. He assured them that had touched him very greatly. But that silence and the position he had taken had been mistaken. In some quarters it had been supposed (though no one who knew him could suppose that to be true) he wished to stand apart from the men whom the world called Unitarians, and to avoid using the name. He had wished, as he had said, to keep clear from any special name, so far as it was opposed to sect; but he also wished, and that was the real thing in question—he wished to be classed with the men whom he saw round about him, if he might be thought worthy to be so, and to be permitted to stand along with them before the public—(applause). It was a position of which he was both proud and glad. The doctrines held by the Unitarians were his; the lines on which they conduct their sacred work for the benefit of mankind were the lines on which he himself should like to work, and in the social work which they were doing he hoped hereafter to join. He hoped therefore he might claim to be one of those ministers who might be accounted hereafter as worthy of being reckoned on the role of those who having left church or sect had set themselves up as ministers of a Free Christian chapel, and felt in their own consciences a determination to apply to regulation of life the doctrines that had been handed down by their free forefathers, had come to be classed by mankind as members of the Unitarian body. While asking pardon for making this personal explanation, the speaker said that he could not take the chair that evening and appear for the first time among Unitarians as engaged in putting forward Unitarian work without making it. Although circumstances would not permit him to remain long enough to move the report of the missionaries, he desired to refer to the salient features of the work being carried on in this quarter. In old days when he was a curate in a crowded part of London by the Edgware-road he had had as the superintending clergyman of two missionaries who worked in that parish, to go over many reports of this kind. These reports were however rather records of conversions which had been effected by the missionaries. Many of the efforts attempted had been good, but they had wanted direction towards practical work. In the case of one of these missionaries he had been especially fortunate, one entire street having been redeemed from a state of misery, destitution, and evil living; but still on the whole there had been no systematic direction in those reports towards social work, towards the elevation of the minds and bodies of the men and women among whom the missionaries laboured; towards the encouragement of those arts which smooth and adorn life. Nor had there been much invention shown by the missionaries; and this fault had again exhibited itself when afterwards he moved to another parish. The workers plodded on in much the same round, contenting themselves for the most part with attempting to bring those around them into harmony with a certain set of doctrines, to which they themselves cling; but to his mind inventiveness seemed one of the first needs of true missionary work, especially work among a population so exceedingly various and so incessantly changing as the population among which the missionaries had to work in this part of the town. He had been, he confessed, greatly struck by the energetic, the modest, and the faithful work of the workers attached to this Mission. There was no self-consciousness, so far as he could see, in the reports which he had read; no effort to make themselves known or to push themselves forward, while both the things he had laid stress upon occupied a prominent position. The reports exhibited a systematic direction on the part of the missionaries towards the social improvement of those among whom they worked, towards the lifting of them up by other means than those of an intellectual and religious character into a higher sphere of thought and life. In particular he had been struck by the manner in which the missionaries seemed to be always on the look out for something new and something which would lift the people into a different range of life. For, instance, the suggestion made by one of the writers that the missionaries should henceforth have a kind of medical training imparted to them was a very excellent one. While it would not, of course, do for the missionaries to take the place of the medical practitioner, they might with advantage know enough to put things to rights while some one else was running for the doctor. Indeed, it might prove desirable that the missionaries should take the twelve lessons given by the Ambulance Committee—(hear). The plan of starting a society for rough boys and girls was one to be commended, and he wished it success. The Provident Medical Society, another new scheme, started within the past year was an excellent business. Nothing could be better than to encourage, on the part of the poor, the necessity of looking after their health and of not being dependent upon hospitals—(hear). Passing to the different modes of employing time, and of administering instruction, as well as of advancing learning and knowledge, he could not fail to express his admiration at the inventiveness displayed by the missionaries. Concerts had been held which had delighted the people with excellent music; lectures had been given at which the latest discoveries of science had been laid before the attendants; lending libraries had spread abroad the treasures of knowledge among their subscribers; singing and violin classes had cultivated and developed whatever musical taste lay latent in the scholars, while lastly a Band of Hope had been started, giving the contradiction to the charge often made against the Unitarian body that there was no temperance society allied with their faith. Being a late convert to teetotal principles, and moved with all a new convert's enthusiasm, he heartily commended this effort, and in all sincerity and with special interest he wished the Band of Hope success—(hear). Although a teetotaler for only the three last months, and although he had never exceeded the allowances countenanced by "moderate drinkers," viz., three glasses of claret a day, he begged to take this opportunity of stating that in every single respect did he seem to have undergone a change for the better—(hear). Over and above the agencies he had enumerated, a chess club and a cricket club had been established, an elocution class had been started, and window gardening had been encouraged, while country excursions had been organised. Beyond all this, the reports recorded the daily work of Christian endeavour, which was the ground work of all the things he had noted. Visiting the poor, entering into their distress, and helping them to keep themselves unspotted from the world, were the main sections of the work done in this direction, and it was impossible to lay too much stress upon the importance of these efforts. Metaphysical questions did not interest the poor, rather were they engaged in the solution of the great problem of life. Just able and no more to keep their heads above water, the poor stood in need of being comforted with the thought and the knowledge that there was a God above them upon whom they might lean for guidance and support. The world knew little of this work; indeed, if it knew itself it were not worth so much doing; if it were self-conscious it would not be done well. The Kingdom of God came not by observation, nor was work of this kind done well when it was flaunted before the eyes of men. In conclusion, the Chairman said that he should lay it upon himself and his congregation at Bedford-street Chapel to respond in a practical manner to the appeal made by Professor Carpenter by furnishing to the funds of the Society at least £50 a year—(cheers).

Mr. P. M. MARTINEAU said that before Mr. Brooke left he was sure all present would join him in offering to Mr. Brooke their hearty thanks for coming there that night, at what he knew was considerable personal inconvenience. He had travelled thus far east, and had also travelled a little out of what was his ordinary path. They had all to thank him for his most interesting speech—(applause)—all the more interesting, he ventured to say, because it came from what he might perhaps call a new, though happily no longer an outside mind—(applause).

The Rev. Stopford Brooke then vacated the chair, which was temporarily taken by Mr. T. SMITH OSLER.

The Rev. F. SUMMERS, one of the missionaries of the Society, then read a report on the work done during the past year, and an essay on the work of the Domestic Missionary and a report were also read by the Rev. W. A. POPE.

Mr. DAVID AINSWORTH, M.P., having arrived, took the chair, and after apologising for not arriving earlier, moved, "That the reports of the Treasurer and Committee be received, approved, and adopted, and, together with the reports of the missionaries, be printed and circulated." From the contents of the reports and from the large assemblage present, he thought there was little doubt of the very great interest taken in the work, and the able manner in which it was carried out by the missionaries. He noticed that great attention was given to the teaching of infants, and he believed there was nothing like beginning as soon as they could to instruct young people to become wiser and better men.

The Rev. Dr. MARTINEAU, in seconding the motion, was sorry to say he had no claim to the position in which he had that night been placed from any personal devotion to the work of that Mission; and he could only plead the very deep interest he always felt in missions of that kind, an interest which strengthened as his years advanced, and as his observation of society and its needs became wider and longer. Notwithstanding the constant complaints of the relatively little that was done by these Missions, in comparison with the enormous evils by which society in our great cities was embarrassed, he was persuaded that if by any calamity these Missions and their agencies were suddenly to disappear, before three months were out everyone of the evils against which they contended would show its head in a most formidable way, and that the absence of them would be evidenced by an increase both of the physical sufferings and also of the defective morals under which our large towns suffer so much. He met with friends who looked with a considerable degree of distress and scepticism upon the operations of Missions of this nature, and that feeling was founded upon grounds which did not appear to be entirely unsupported by rational considerations. For example, they were constantly addressed in a spirit of physical despair, that the physical evils besetting the life of the poor in our large cities are so tremendous that it is quite out of place to attack them from the spiritual side, inasmuch as the population are entirely unfitted for spiritual appeals by the sufferings in which they are sunk. He had heard it said, "Look at the condition of the homes, look at the streets, look at the employments, look at the whole life of those who are at the lower end of society, and how is it at all compatible with the conditions under which they live that the principles of the Christian life should receive illustration in their daily conduct? See how tremendous the competition is for the means of livelihood; how sure it is that the weak must always go to the wall. How miserable it is when sickness arrests the arm of strength, and stops the income of the wages; when the father and head of a family is swept away, leaving the widow with her children to the tremendous struggle of life; when prolonged sickness takes away the resources of the family, and when you add to this the narrow limits in which within the four walls of their homes they are crowded together in the most unwholesome way, a way scarcely consistent with the decencies of life—how can you expect to introduce Christian civilisation amongst people in these circumstances?" They could not but feel that there was something to support such remarks, and sometimes he had himself been staggered by them. He had heard it said—"Wait till you get these evils cured. Address yourself first of all to these physical conditions of men, and when you have homes of comfort, and when you have incomes that are adequate, and when you have perfect public education, then you may hope to Christianise your population." He asked whether they would on that account sit still and cancel their missions until those physical evils were cured? Must they wait for the spiritual appeal until the temporal conditions were amended. If that were the case, and if the condition of a Christian civilisation were that people should have comfortable homes, a competency and no crowding, there were plenty of homes in London in which those conditions were fulfilled, and they had nothing to do but to shift the locality of the Mission and to send their missionaries, if they pleased, to begin with the Lord Mayor and Aldermen—(laughter). If it were said they were provided for already, and they are sufficiently good Christians, he replied that there were persons with homes equally comfortable where there was a great dearth of spiritual life, and as great a failure of the practical principles of Christianity as there was in the neighbourhood of Spicer-street or of St. Luke's—(hear). It was amongst the poor at first that the Gospel was preached, and the first triumphs of Christianity were amongst a slave population, under conditions of even greater suffering than the present condition of society presented. He sometimes heard another objection—that the temporal evils under which our large towns suffer are not of our creating, and are quite impossible for us to cure. They were asked:—"What can we do to bring down these high rents? The price of every commodity, including the commodity of house accommodation, is determined by the relation of supply to demand, and where the supply is defective in comparison with the demand, where the numbers that are competing for the house accommodation that exists are on the increase, the price of these houses must inevitably increase, and it is no more possible for society or for law or for private exertion to bring down the price of house rent than it is to bring down the price of shoes, which also has doubled within our recollection." He could not help feeling that there was a great degree of plausibility in that statement, and he did not quite understand what their worthy missionary had in his mind when he said it was a duty on the part of the legislature to bring down high rents. He did not see himself how that could possibly be done, and when they were told that the real cause was in the inordinate increase of numbers and the overstocking of the labour market, partly by the improvidence of marriages and partly by the influx from the Provinces of more persons than the industries of London can take up—when anybody said that was the root of the evil and that it could not be touched by private exertion or legislation, he must say he found it very difficult to find an answer to that statement. He looked the other day at the appeal recently made with regard to the emigration of the unemployed in London, and on carefully reading the letters of those who applied for public help in emigration, he was struck with facts of this kind:—There was a letter, written evidently with great confidence, appealing as though the writer felt he had a perfect title to demand it, for the means of being sent abroad with his wife and his two children. That was the letter of a youth of nineteen years of age. If habits of that kind prevailed among the class that was distressed, he asked whether any human beings could help them? It was quite impossible to do so—(hear). They all knew the morality upon that subject which prevailed in the middle class, and he would ask whether there was any one of them who did not know numerous cases in which, out of consideration for the needs of sisters or parents, there had been postponement or even a total abstinence from marriage on the part of men of the middle class; complete and entire self-denial on these matters, merely out of a conscientious feeling towards others. When that morality prevailed throughout the whole of society, the evils which had been referred to might be expected to disappear; but not till then was there any chance of their being really reduced. He had frequently heard that sort of objections with regard to missions of this kind, and he was prepared to say there was a certain amount of reasonableness in them. But it was impossible to say they would never concede anything to others for which they had not a claim of justice, and to stand by and see others dropping their duties and committing sins, and to take no notice simply because each of them did his own particular duty. It was impossible upon the simple ethical principles of abstract justice and strict individuality that any society could exist. They were all on probation, and probation implied possibility of right and possibility of sin; and so long as those two possibilities existed, there would be the weak who would fall—there would be many who, partly from ignorance of their misfortune and partly from guilt, would fall into the deepest degradation; and it was utterly impossible for those who had any spiritual conscience, any religious conscience, to stand by and, simply because they were not responsible for those things, restrict themselves to their own duty and to take no notice. That he took to be the real difference between the mere, bare, dry justice of morality and the principle of religion. We were not made upon this pattern, and our conscience was not constructed to be content with the performance of our own individual share of duty. It was not sufficient that each acted for himself and saw that his own account was right; but if a man saw there were dropped duties and committed sins they also must go to his conscience, and he must feel that it was impossible to bear them. That he should perhaps put by, saying that though it was not our duty to man, it was our duty to God; and it was precisely because God had put into our hearts something of his own infinitude and sanctity that we had this abhorrence of moral evil, this inability to live with it before our eyes, and a determination to root it out and to say there should be no dropped duty so long as we were here to take it up. It was that which constituted the difference between a mere dry morality as between man and man, and a satisfied morality as between man and his maker—(hear). That was the real defence of these Missions. It was a carrying out of the essential principle of Christianity, a cry which each one was bound to take to all that came under his view; it was an inability to endure anything that shocked the conditions of human life or contracted the obligations of conscience, and it was a power which would rule by a spread in society of that purity, that righteousness, that clearness and mutual affection which constitute the true kingdom of God. The reports which had been read appeared to him peculiarly interesting, and the only passage about which he felt the least scruple was that upon which he had ventured to comment. He knew their missionary did not mean exactly the interpretation he (Dr. Martineau) had put upon his words, but it seemed to him there was a little caution required in that matter; because if they encouraged those suffering under evils to lay the fault of those evils in the wrong place, demands would be made upon the State for that which it was impossible that the State could give, and if that were done a condition of society would be created which was extremely dangerous—(applause). Attention would be diverted from the real causes, and therefore from the real cure of those evils, and a demand would be made for things to be done by law which law could not accomplish. In this present day there was an enormous exaggeration of that which could be done by public law, and consequently a great neglect of that which must be done by private obligation. He looked with very great anxiety to that tendency because it was the source of almost all the hopeless revolutions which took place in society. He had no objection to revolutions in society, provided they were conducted upon principles that could be worked out to a triumphant and beneficial result; but he looked with serious apprehension upon every movement which worked an impossible machinery towards a given result, and he saw a great deal of that in the tendency of the present age. From that cause arose almost all the theories which so often deluded men, and which perhaps occupied a generation or two, not in progress, but in vain experiments, which had to be reversed before Society could make its advance again. For that reason they ought to be extremely careful in the language they used when referring to the evils of society. By all means they should exhibit those evils to the whole extent to which they existed, and it was especially the business of their missionaries to expose them to the very core; but when the causes and the cure of the evils were spoken of, a very cautious judgment and a very conscientious direction of opinion was required. The reports appeared to be excellently well drawn, and he therefore very cordially seconded their adoption—(applause).

The resolution was then put, and carried unanimously.

Mr. NETTLEFOLD begged to move, "That this meeting, while recognising with gladness the improvement slowly taking place in the condition of the people by means of increased educational and other philanthropic agencies, affirms the supreme importance of attempting to provide for their moral and religious needs on the principles of the London Domestic Mission, and requests the committee to consider the best manner of extending the work of the Society." He had peculiar pleasure in moving the resolution, inasmuch as it was almost identical with one he had attempted to move twenty-one years ago. At that time it was not considered advisable. Since then, however, a change had come over the spirit of the committee. The want of funds had been the only obstacle in the way. In asking that night that the committee should take means to establishing two, or even three, other Missions in different parts of this city three objections presented themselves. First, of finding an efficient staff of workers, next the requisite funds, and lastly the approval and co-operation of the committee. Of these the last was the only real difficulty, and that having been now overcome no obstacle any longer stood in the way. He did not believe that there would be any difficulty whatever in finding among the young members of their congregations an efficient staff for the new Missions. As to funds, he contended that no one sound and good work had ever been attempted by the Unitarian body and had had to succumb for want of means—(hear, hear).

Dr. ASPLAND, in seconding the resolution, highly commended the agencies at work in connection with their Missions, and heartily supported the proposal to extending these labours into other parts of the city. He hoped that it would not be taken for granted, as assumed by one or two speakers, that there were no poor at the West-end. He had listened to the reports with great pleasure, and in particular he had hailed with great satisfaction the words of Dr. Martineau when commenting upon a passage in one of the missionary's reports.

Mr. J. ALLANSON PICTON, who was warmly greeted, expressed the pleasure with which he had accepted the invitation of the Committee to attend that evening. It was to his mind one of the happiest features of the work carried on here that it was absolutely unsectarian. There had been many indications of this spirit in the reports which had been read, and the speeches delivered. Speaking on the overcrowded condition of the metropolis, and the high rents charged, it was, he considered, an odd and inexplicable matter that this should be the case. It struck him there was a moral evil at the root of this grievance. As our Christian civilisation had developed the standard of living should have risen. It was true that the standard had risen, but had it risen proportionately to the development of the other factors of existence? The records of the School Board showed that six-sevenths of the children attending school required State aid. Those figures meant that the standard of living did not include the cost of instruction. In the past the idea of educating the poorer classes had been sneered at. He contended that the rich in this country demanded more for their capital than they were entitled to. The opponents of imparting instruction to the people had very truly urged that the adoption of this policy would make labour dearer. This had taken place, and he rejoiced at the result; and he could not but hope on good ground that a better adjustment between capital and labour would be achieved in the future. He heartily congratulated those engaged in the work of ameliorating the condition of the poor in this part of London, and wished them success in their good efforts in the future.

The resolutions were then unanimously carried.

The Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED moved the following resolution:—"That this meeting, conscious of the great difficulties of missionary work under many of the conditions of London life, offers to the Revs. W. A. Pope and F. Summers, and to their fellow labourers in the Mission stations at Spicer-street and George's-row, its hearty thanks for their earnestness and zeal, and its continued sympathy with them in all their endeavours to carry the truths and influences of religion into the hearts and homes of the neglected poor."

Dr. BLAKE ODGERS seconded the resolution in a few brief words, and this being put to the meeting, was duly carried.

Mr. S. S. TAYLER next moved, the Rev. T. L. MARSHALL seconded, and it was agreed to, "That the following gentlemen be the committee and officers for the ensuing year, viz., treasurer, Mr. P. M. Martineau; committee, Messrs. Barrow, Brabner, Corkran, Rev. J. Drummond, Messrs. Lewis, Lister, H. Martineau, A. Preston, F. S. Schwann, I. M. Wade, and Wilson; secretary, J. E. Carpenter; auditors, Messrs. P. Worsley and H. Clarke."

A vote of thanks to the three gentlemen who had in turn occupied the chair having been cordially carried the proceedings closed.

PRESTON:—RE-OPENING OF THE UNITARIAN CHURCH.

On Sunday there were very large congregations at the Unitarian Chapel, when that place of worship was opened again, after being closed for some months for extensive alterations, involving an outlay of £600.

The services, both in the morning and evening, were conducted by the Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY, M.A., of South-place Chapel, Finsbury, London. The subject of Mr. Conway's discourse in the morning was "Individuality and Species." He said that in a strong individuality people felt that a man had thought out a thing, and they could pardon his obstinacy if they realised his force. Whether a man's individuality, not his eccentricity or selfishness, was pungent, bitter or pleasant, they respected it because it was organic. In the year 1836 two occurrences took place which, had they been mentioned at all at the time, would have seemed to the world of very little importance compared with passing events. A young man returned to England from a voyage round the world, a young naturalist, fresh from his university, came back on the ship Beagle, and sat himself down to the task of thinking out what he had seen and observed. That was Charles Darwin; and in that same year Ralph Waldo Emerson issued his first little book on Nature, in which he anticipated, declared, and announced a character, a hope, and a religion, based upon evolution, when his own comrade, unknown to him, but destined to be laid in the grave as it were by his side, in the same month, was working out a scientific statement of that same law in the universe. Those two men had been buried with the highest honours of their nations, and amid the mourning of two nations—nay, of the whole world. They had been honoured as high as any men of the century by those who were but recently denouncing them as infidels. They were representative men, and individually they were the first to teach evolution, and they were both of them wonderful illustrations of that law. Charles Darwin had been evolved by a patient race of scientific thinkers, passing from father to son, until it gathered its flower into his great brain. The other, Emerson, whose mind so blended with Darwin's, had been evolved from a stock of seven generations from Plymouth rock, his father being among those pilgrims who had handed down a tradition of moral sincerity, the earnestness of character, in truth, thought and culture, which finally rose in the beautiful seer of the New World. A new spiritual epoch, resting entirely upon the laws of spiritual, human and physical evolution had commenced. Mr. Darwin's book on "The Origin of Species" gave new impulse to every science and thought in the world, and in the far ages, when the highest civilisation shall gather up the scriptures of these times, which were worthy of being a bible of civilisation and of humanity, that book of his which established the law of evolution of the human intellect would be in that new bible its book of Genesis. Since that the human mind had made its exodus from the old land of spiritual and intellectual bondage, and only the rear of the people remained in that bondage. It was now only a question of time, for the leaders of thought had rendered their verdict upon the truth and on the bondage of the past in favour of the laws of liberty for the human mind. They had gathered round the infidel of twenty years ago and enshrined him in the old abbey amid the saints of the world. But after the Genesis and the Exodus came the book of prophecy, written by Emerson, who, standing upon that law of evolution, raised his divine voice, saying that that which had made men what they were was the power that still worked to make them what they were to be. The seer of the New World translated the laws of nature into moral laws. The scientific generalisation of the times to which he had referred was translatable into a vital principle of human life, because they learned from it that that individuality which amounted to variation must be either a relapse towards a lower species or the beginning of a higher species. Individuality was either capable or incapable of serving not a fossil or future world, but the actually existent world. The individual ought to live for the benefit of the human species at large, and not for a tribe. He condemned tribalism in all its forms, and said that the law of humanity must in the end prevail. Kant's great moral maxim was, "Act always so that the immediate motive of the will may become a rule for all intelligent beings." By that maxim the individuality of every man was subject to universal ends, because man had to further the formation of a higher species. Unfortunately, that law of living for public ends was not a rule of public life generally, but of the obscurist and the humblest. If a man's conduct was not good for his species it was an injury, and he was wronging every man, woman, and child in the world, and if everybody did the same the world would be corrupted and ruined. It was only an individual motive for moral conduct which could survive in civilised society. The hells and heavens of Christianity had faded away and were now the laughing-stock of the common sense of the world, and had lost their power. All that had passed away, and the generation now growing up would be able to tell their children that the reward of their good conduct was the certainty of their helping their species, and that the result of evil would be to inflict a wound upon the whole body of humanity. He argued, despite all objections, that that religion, if taught from childhood, would be more effective than Christianity, and more charitable, because it would engraft in men the spirit of benefiting the whole human family instead of working out selfishly one's own salvation.

In the evening Mr. Conway preached a most eloquent and thoughtful sermon on "The Wounded Christ," in the course of which he contended that the labouring population of to-day was "wounded." The failure of all political measures to deal with pauperism, the failure of all economic laws to diminish the troubles of society, was due to the fact that labour was "wounded." He had no foolish sentimentality about the degradation of work, for he believed that idleness was a curse. As much as £200,000,000 were swallowed up by the Church of England, which was enough to bring comfort, good care, sanitary improvement, and cleanliness to every house in the country. The best thing that had been done for wounded labour was the establishment of schools for the poor, but that had been the work of the most freethinking generation the world ever saw. But in truth education alone could not heal the wounds of the labourer; he must have help to relieve his want and woe. Dealing with various aspects of this question, he said that people who demanded Sunday closing without any Sunday opening might find that they were promoting Sunday madness. Christians preached one thing and practised another, and surely that was no belief. He advocated that all that which used to be done for God and for eternity must now be done for man and this world. He entreated men to derive their force from their love of mankind, to feel that it was the highest privilege of the human heart to call a thought out of the stupor of ignorance, to restore to a wounded brain its reason, and to bring joy where there was pain—for that was true religion.

The reopening services were continued on Sunday, the 14th, when eloquent sermons were preached by the Rev. FRANK W. WALTERS, of Glasgow, to crowded congregations, the subjects being, "The Human Providence," and "The Demand of the Age in Religion." The collections on both Sundays amounted to about £40 in all.

PLYMOUTH: JUBILEE OF UNITARIAN CHAPEL.

The fiftieth anniversary of the rebuilding of Treville-street Unitarian Chapel, Plymouth, which was founded in the year 1689, was celebrated on Sunday. At the morning service there was a large attendance, and the proceedings commenced with a hymn appropriate to the occasion. The prayers were read by the Rev. J. COLLINS ODGERS, B.A., and the sermon was delivered by the Rev. J. E. ODGERS, M.A., of Liverpool. The preacher said:—My father desires me to say that had his health permitted it would have given him the greatest pleasure to have accepted your kind invitation. Of course it would be to him an occasion of peculiar interest if he were present, but I am sure he is thinking of us at this present moment, because when this chapel was opened, fifty years ago, the Rev. H. Acton, of Exeter, preached in the morning and my father in the evening. The subject for the evening was the worship of the Father in spirit and in truth. Since that time great changes have taken place in the world, wonderful advances have been made in literature, science, and art; and education has been, and is still, being more widely diffused. Still, it is most interesting to my father to know that the subject on which he preached at that time has not, within all these years, become to be considered absurd, and that it is admitted by all Christians that the worship of the Father is an indispensable pleasure. The rev. gentleman then proceeded to read the sermon written by his father, which, after dealing with the wonderful disclosures made by the scientific men of the day, referred to the great and valuable assistance rendered to science by the late Mr. C. Darwin. During the last fifty years wonderful changes had taken place in theological opinions and in the customs of churches, and many opinions which were once regarded as true and essential were now laid aside. Numerous were the dogmas that had been laid aside, and religion was separated from theology, which was almost regarded as a needless thing, and men had got to realise the being of one spirit—God—and they worshipped him in spirit and in truth. It was in this spirit that he, the writer, looked back, and although he could not help thinking of the failures attendant upon his ministry in that place, yet he was comforted by the thought that he did his best, and tried to love his fellow-creatures. That, said Mr. Odgers, is the message I have to deliver from him to you, and I would now like to speak a few words more particularly about this church. We measure but a short time in the history of this church when we measure fifty years. We measure not a long religious period of its history when we speak of the time since it has borne the Unitarian name. Our Presbyterian ancestors did not think it possible to bend their old religion, but it has been done in this church, and much better than they ever thought of. Their belief changed, but their trust in God was greater than their belief. It is for the Unitarian to maintain his faith, and not to keep it as a private dogma. He should maintain that Christ suffered not merely for the sake of saving suffering, sick, fallen, and degraded mankind, but to show forth His noble humanity in laying down His life for the sake of others. "It may be found that your worship in this place may not be all that could be wished for, but then there will be the Divine Presence always near, and from this place you can go week after week with renewed blessing in your hearts. And so it shall be with the generations that follow you. At the evening service the Rev. J. E. Odgers, M.A., again preached to a crowded congregation.

In continuation of the jubilee celebrations a soirée was held on Monday afternoon in the Congregational Hall, Treville-street. The tea was followed by an organ recital in the Unitarian Chapel by the organist (Mrs. C. Barter), and an anthem was admirably sung by the choir.

In the evening a public meeting was held in the Congregational Hall. Mr. A. S. HARRIS presided, and among those present were the Revs. J. Collins Odgers, J. Edward Odgers, L. T. Badcock (Tavistock), W. E. Mellone (Devonport), W. Sharman; Messrs. E. Davies, T. R. Bond, Dr. Merrifield, R. N. Worth, B. Ruse, J. Underhill, R. B. Twose, A. J. Bond, J. G. Norman, and George Tippetts.

The CHAIRMAN said that the special services in the chapel adjoining and the meeting that evening were in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the re-opening of their chapel after it had been rebuilt. The site of that building was occupied by a very old chapel indeed, and this in the process of time became so dilapidated that the congregation were afraid to worship in it. In 1830 it was found necessary to reconstruct this building, and in 1832 the present chapel was opened. On that occasion the Rev. Henry Acton preached in the morning, and in the evening the Rev. J. W. Odgers was asked to preach as a candidate for the office of minister of that chapel. The discourse was of such a character that it was at once seen that the trustees need seek no further for a minister for the congregation. Mr. Odgers was selected, and remained with them for twenty-one years—(applause). He not only made himself useful in his congregation, but was a valuable member of the community in which he resided. He almost re-organised the Mechanics' Institute, and the baths and washhouses, the cemetery, and various sanitary improvements were all matters in which he heartily engaged, and many of which operated for the benefit of the town at the present day—(applause). Mr. Odgers had taken a great interest in their jubilee celebration, but he was unable to be present with them. They had, however, at that meeting his two sons, whom he was sure they all heartily welcomed. He proposed a vote of thanks to the Rev. J. W. Odgers for the interest he had manifested in the proceedings connected with the commemoration and his wish to be with them on that occasion had his health permitted; and a vote of thanks also to his two sons for their valuable services and the way in which they had represented their father on that occasion—(applause).

Mr. Twose seconded the resolution. He regretted that Mr. Bayly like Mr. Odgers was prevented by infirmity from being present with them that evening.

Mr. DAVIES could not let the occasion pass without expressing his deep respect and his deep gratitude, a gratitude which he was sure must be shared by a large number of Plymouth people, for the services Mr. Odgers had rendered to the town while he was minister of the chapel. He thought those services had never been properly acknowledged by the town.

The resolution was then carried.

The Rev. J. E. ODGERS said it was with deep feelings that he listened to those words of hearty appreciation of his father's services as minister of the chapel at Plymouth. He should be very sorry if they ever put denominational success before social and philanthropic duty, and he should be very sorry indeed, if in order that a man might take a position of social usefulness he should ever run the risk of putting his religious or theological position in his pocket—(applause). He was the minister of the eldest Nonconformist church in England, and he consequently took a deep interest in their Nonconformist history. Their religious position had been so largely determined by their history that that history should not be allowed to fade away from the minds more especially of the young people of their congregations—(applause). He concluded by saying that they must all forego something for their faith in God.

The Rev. COLLINS ODGERS said that in many of the orthodox churches the doctrine of the Trinity was not held in so rigid a manner as formerly, and the doctrine of eternal torment, since the sensible utterances of Canon Farrar, in St. Paul's Cathedral, on the subject, had very much dropped out of view in many congregations. The whole of the conception of what made a Christian church had entirely altered and become more gentle since that chapel was built, fifty years ago. He concluded with several personal reminiscences of his connection with the Plymouth chapel, and thanked them heartily for the resolution they had passed.

Mr. R. N. WORTH gave an exceedingly interesting historical sketch of the growth of Nonconformity in Plymouth. They were then standing on what he considered the most Puritan site of the most Puritan district of Puritan Plymouth. Plymouth never obtained any name in the country worth calling a name until it became Puritan. With the growth of that religious feeling Plymouth sent away men from that port who sailed against the Spaniards and the foes of religion. He traced the struggles between the inhabitants and the Crown in the cause of religious freedom, and related many interesting incidents in connection therewith. Among these were the sailing of the Pilgrim Fathers from the port—though not one of the band belonged to the town, as had been supposed—and the erection of Charles Church, which he contended was the first Nonconformist place of worship erected in Plymouth. The original chapel on the site of the present Unitarian Chapel must have been erected in 1689. The first minister of the congregation was Nathaniel Jacob, and his successor was Nathaniel Harding. There was not a single person connected with the foundation of that congregation who had not to pay dearly for his faith. The lesson he would draw from all this was that the man, or nation, or cause that had such a past behind it as they had behind them and was true to that past need have no fear, but a certain hope of a glorious future—(applause).

Mr. Norman proposed a vote of thanks to those friends of Tavistock and Devonport for the great kindness they had showed in coming there that night. He suggested that they should retain their old chapel, and consecrate it to literary purposes as a library, and that they should erect a new chapel elsewhere—(applause).

The Rev. W. SHARMAN seconded the resolution. They were indebted to Tavistock for many recruits in their congregation in Plymouth. He was not inclined to take quite such a bright view of matters in Plymouth as Mr. Olgers had done. Liberal thought had not made the progress in Plymouth which it had in Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham and other commercial and intellectual centres. They were much as they were in Plymouth fifty or sixty years ago. As he looked ahead and thought of the work to be done, although the land of promise was a little nearer, it was a land their feet would never tread, and there was only left for them the faithful pilgrimage towards it in the spirit of their fathers—(applause). The resolution was carried.

The Rev. L. BADCOCK and the Rev. W. E. MELLONE both briefly replied, and the meeting concluded with a hearty vote of thanks to the chairman for presiding.

STAMFORD-STREET CHAPEL.—The Spring meeting of the congregation was held on Monday evening, when there was a good attendance. The Rev. W. C. BOWIE occupied the chair, and delivered in the course of the evening short and interesting addresses chiefly on matters relating to the congregation. Addresses were also delivered by Mr. N. M. TAYLOR, on the Liverpool Conference, the Revs. T. L. MARSHALL, A. B. CAMM and G. WOOLLER, Mr. HUGON TAYLOR, of Manchester New College, who advocated a Confirmation Service, and Messrs. McEwen, S. S. TAYLOR and H. H. STANNUS. The proceedings were agreeably diversified by an admirable selection of music from the choir, under the efficient direction of Mr. Callow, Mrs. S. S. TAYLOR presiding at the organ.

ERFURTH, where Luther was educated, is about to erect a statue to the great Reformer.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT AND PILLS.—As the seasons change, the climatic variations warn us all to be careful. Most especially is it incumbent on the aged, prone to bronchial attacks, outward ulcerations, and similar debilitating disorders, to have them removed, or worse consequences will follow. These remedies are their sheet anchors; on their powers all may confidently rely. The Ointment not simply puts their sores out of sight, but extirpates the source of mischief, extracts the corroding poison, and stimulates nature to fill up the ulcer with sound, healthy granulations, that will abide through life. Under this treatment bad legs soon become sound, scrofulous skins cast off their scales, and scrofulous sores cease to annoy. Such hope for the diseased was unknown in former days.

The Liberal Pulpit.

CHARLES DARWIN.

[By STOPFORD A. BROOKE, preached at Bedford Chapel May 7, 1882.]

No truer eulogium can be spoken over the grave of a great man than the declaration of his ideas, than the confession of their permanence. It is the wreath of "everlastings" which the grateful world lays upon his resting-place; and when the whole world of thinkers lays it there, when it is not one nation, but all nations that belong to the fraternity of Thought—then it is great honour. And the nation to whom such a man belongs may indeed rejoice. We had sorrow when our greatest natural philosopher was taken from us, but the sorrow was lessened when we thought that his work was done, that his had been the rare happiness to have lived to complete it and to see its fruits. And the sorrow was taken away, in joy that out of our midst had gone forth thoughts which had recast the existing scientific thought of all mankind, and which, beaten by the hammer of his work, has been made into tools by which all scientific collecting, investigating, and generalisation of Nature will be, for all time, more justly directed, more certainly developed, and more closely concluded. No nation in the world had ever more reason to be proud—with the pride which ennobles—than England has in being the mother of Charles Darwin.

Over the mass of great men, each great in his own particular sphere, some rise supreme, not only kings but emperors of thought. Strait is the gate of that greatness and narrow is the way, and few there be that find it. Their supreme greatness lies in this, that these men conceive and lay down in their own special branch of work ideas which not only belong to it, but to other branches, which pass beyond the particular into the universal, are applicable to other spheres of work, and may be used to do work in them. These are the Mother Thoughts of the world, which rule over by right, not dependencies or provinces, but the whole kingdom of Thought. The men who conceive them, or, as I should say, discover them—for they have an absolute existence of their own—have gone down to the source of things, and sat beside the fountains of the universe—they have seen the central ideas of God.

And when, having seen them, they declare and prove them, so that they become clear to men, to none so much as to these men ought the human race to be grateful. For they bring order, ease, working power, and peace into life and thought. When any new theory starts up and threatens to be a troublesome problem we bring it to these great ideas which we sometimes call laws, and ask does it agree with these? If not, we put it, to the saving of infinite trouble, altogether away.

3.—When ideas of this kind are first disclosed they seem so simple that we wonder how they can be called great. It is only through their infinite workability that we find out how immense they are. When Lyell said, "Nature has always been acting through the myriad years of the past of the earth in the same manner as she is acting now," it seemed a very simple declaration. Yet it has enabled us to explain the whole development of the surface of the earth since the time when the crust was able to bear water upon it, and when we know the conditions, to state with quite close enough accuracy how things were two, five, ten or fifteen millions of years ago.

This thought had then an application which was capable of infinite extension. But it had more. It passed beyond its own sphere. It was just as applicable to man's history, and in fact has since been carried into the sphere of historical philosophy. Know the conditions under which men were living, and the point of progress they had touched, at any point of the past, and you will be able to say how they acted then, for human nature will develop itself in the same manner as it is doing now. Hence arose a science of humanity, as yet in its infancy, but destined to the same accuracy as geology has attained. This, then, is an instance of what I mean by ideas which are central, and the discovery and proof of which by a man lifts him into the highest rank.

4.—Well far greater than this work of Lyell's was the work of Darwin, but it was of the same kind. It made master conceptions common property, and those conceptions had universal analogies. They were thoughts on whose lines not only the organic world, but the world of man was built. If it were merely scientific experiments that he conducted, however masterly, or scientific discoveries that he made, however remarkable, this would not be the place to speak of his work otherwise than for its moral qualities which were superb; but it is the place to speak of him, because he caught, and when he had caught mastered, by proving their truth, the very mother ideas on which the organic world increased and formed itself, or was formed into nations and societies and tribes, and still goes on, and will for ever go on, as long as earth shall last; and it is the place to speak of him because these ideas, being at the very roots of things, extend beyond the organic world, and can be used and practically applied for the explanation of the history of mankind, of the growth and development of truth, of ideas of truth, of national ideas, of political, of religious ideas. It is because of this universal applicability of his thoughts—that he is to be thanked as much from the pulpit as he is from the chair of the philosopher.

I want to help you to feel how great he was by showing, as briefly as I can, the extension of these ideas. But first, what were the ideas? I will put them briefly, almost in a tabular form, and in their shortest shape. First, Darwin did not attempt to lay down any proposition concerning the origin of organic life. He supposed that one or two forms of life came to be, and that these had a reproductive power. What would occur? In a short time the organisms would have so increased that they would fill the whole earth capable of supporting them. But reproduction would go on, when there was neither room nor food for any more. These things we know, and the inevitable result of them would be that a struggle for existence would take place, and on an average—the deaths would equal the births, so that the total number of individuals would be stationary.

Secondly. Take now that result, namely, that there would be a "struggle for existence" as proved, and now look at the history of organic life again to see if we can add to that result other facts which we may correlate with it. We observe now two other things which belong to the organic world. One is called heredity. That is, there is a tendency in organic matter to transmit its qualities. Wheat produces wheat, a fish, a bird, a man—each produces its own kind, and hand on their peculiarities. That is one fact. The other is called variation. There is a tendency in the midst of this heredity, to occasional varieties. One, e.g., out of the brood of a bird, or one out of many calves will be slightly different from the others, and different perhaps in such a way as will make its life more in harmony with the conditions that surround it; and therefore easier to live, more likely to win when the struggle for existence is very sharp.

To put these two facts shortly. There is Heredity and Variation: or general likeness with individual differences of parents and offspring. What will be the result of these two facts, taken together with the world-wide struggle for life? This—that the variations which give an advantage in the struggle to those that have them will be continued; while those that are disadvantageous will cause their possessors to die out. This is Natural Selection, or the "Survival of the Fittest." The statement is simple—on the whole, those live who are best fitted, and those die who are least fitted, to maintain their existence. We have, therefore, got a new factor in the argument, the survival of the fittest. Suppose we take that result as proved. Now is there anything else to be considered? Is there another element in the problem? Yes, there is one more. It is the conditions under which the organisms exist—the conditions of the struggle. Climate, station, food, these may be called inorganic conditions. As they vary, those animals fittest, through variation, to meet and use the varying conditions will survive. Then there are what may be called the organic conditions, that is, there will be living creatures who will be enemies, rivals, or friends of other living creatures in the struggles both directly and indirectly. Now these conditions are in a constant and universal state of change. Everyone knows that from his own experience. That is one new fact. Add it to the rest, and what follows? This! There will be changes of organic forms—variations being perpetuated which are best fitted to struggle with the new things—to keep the organisms in harmony with the changed conditions, and as these changes of condition are so far permanent that they do not revert back to identical previous conditions, so the changes of organic forms will also be so far permanent, and become species. This is the origin of species. But as the conditions go on changing, a time comes when a certain variation, or a certain species—unless that word is wholly to be blotted out—can no longer fight the battle. Its best variations continue, but they tend to grow less and less able to resist changing conditions; things are too hard for them, and year by year the species degenerates, and finally perishes. This is the degeneration of species.

These are the ideas, briefly put; but not too briefly for you to see at once that they explain not only the growth of organic life over the whole globe, but that (the sphere of thought and of their application being changed) they explain also the growth of the ideas which make the history of mankind. Few were the forms of organic truth—if I may use that term—which arose we know not how in man, but we believe through the inspiration of God. They multiplied as men multiplied, and each of these tended to transmit themselves with an heredity as marked as that of organisms, but always also with a like tendency to variation. And when the world was filled with forms of, e.g., the idea of God, there arose among these forms a struggle for existence, and those variations which were most fitted to survive, which could bear the battle best, because they were best for men's inner and outer life to live upon, were in this way naturally selected. But the conditions under which these various forms of truth lived were in a state of universal and unceasing change—conditions over which men had no power, such as climate, food, health, the forces of nature, station—conditions made by men themselves, such as government, social customs, the appearance of men of genius, discoveries, wars, migrations of nations (the conditions of no fifty years being ever the same, nor ever or most rarely reverting to their previous state); so that the forms of truth varied to meet the conditions, and at last, certain types of forms—and each of these types characterised by manifold varieties—so fitted themselves to the elements which remained permanent under the changing conditions of human history, that they themselves became permanent; that is, species of truth arose. But when the conditions began to change vitally, then these species of truth degenerated, and when the conditions altogether changed, these species of truth passed away, to be succeeded in turn by new ones, which had all along been growing up in the same manner under the continuous operation of the same laws. This is Darwin's theory of organic life, repeated in the organic life (if I may use that term) of ideas and their forms. This is evolution, and it gives us the power to make a science of human history, provided we can collect our facts truly, collate them in just proportion, and generalise them with that imaginative force which arises straight out of knowledge, emotion, conscience and reason acting together. To have given us the tools to do that work raises the giver into a position equal to that of the greatest men. Charles Darwin has thrown open the gates to a million workmen of a boundless field of work, and every man who works in it is sure of a harvest of some kind; and the field is not only that of the development of organic life on the earth, it is also that of the development of organic truth.

But now, and lastly, to carry on this strict analogy—before Darwin did the splendid thinking out of which grew his theory (the different statements of which theory will soon be universally accepted as laws, that is clear expressions of things as they have been, are, and will be, in organic life), certain large generalisations had been made with regard to organised life and its forms, without which he would not have been able to conceive his theory. It had been proved that all the millions of animals and all their thousands of species or forms which have ever existed on this earth,—say for ten millions of years—and for how much longer who can tell?—were all reducible to five—or at the most seven—modes of construction. This was indeed simplifying matters. So far went the comparative anatomist. Now up to that point, the theory of Darwin might have suggested itself to his mind, but scarcely ever got beyond a speculation. Before it became possible for it to have a chance of demonstration, simplification of the original forms of organic life had to be carried further. It was necessary for the conception of laws regulating the whole of the development of organic life that there should be only one primitive form of life. Was this true? It was found at last to be the very fact. Different as the seven or five plans of construction were, there was no doubt finally that they all started from the same thing—from an egg, or in simple phrase a cell—a portion of nitrogenous matter with a small particle or nucleus in the middle of it; and moreover, that the changes which took place in this cell during the earlier times of its growth were, in the case of all living things, the same, so that you could not at all conjecture if you saw the egg during its early changes, whether the animal in it was going to be a man, or a lobster, or a snail, or a sponge. All animal life begins in the same way, in a cell. And further still, for once on this path to unity it was impossible to stop, it was found that the whole of plant life, from the giant pine to the microscopic moss, began in the same way, in a cell with a nucleus, and of the same matter as the cell out of which grew the animal, and that the first processes of development were also substantially the same for the oak as for the whale, for the primrose as for the butterfly that alights upon it. The whole organic world arises out of one original form. This is that unity of organisation which once proved enabled Darwin to conceive his theory.

Now take this with you into the world of ideas and their forms. We are as much confused among their multitude, and often as wrong about their origin, as the old naturalists were about species. We say (in politics and religion, nay even in science), This or that way of thinking, this or that idea, is the only true way of thinking, the only true idea; or at least we say—It stands alone, as distinct as the ox is from the whale. We do not believe in any necessary co-ordination of the ideas which rule mankind, or of the thoughts we have ourselves; we do not believe in their common organisation. Yet till we believe it I do not think there will be much progress made in a philosophy worth having of the history of man. What is true in the world of organic life is also true in the world of human thought and its emotions. There are only a few original grand lines of thought! and on either side of these, in negation, affirmation or doubt, all the inferior species and varieties of human thoughts have branched away. The first forms they took were as rude and unformed as those of early organic life, but they contained within them possibilities of development, and steadily, as conditions changed and became more complex, they grew and varied, reverting sometimes to their original type, and handing down their qualities and struggling with one another, until species of them became permanent for a time, and then passed away—but the main conceptions on which all had grown, always remain behind, always subsist the same.

It is time we found out what these were, and are; and laid them down. A few of them are practically in our possession; more could be discovered if we set ourselves consciously to look for them, and searched for them by means of a comparative anatomy of the thinking of the whole world. When that is done we shall probably find that all the thoughts of the human race arise out of but half a dozen first ideas. Find those, and then no one can tell what a flood of light will then be thrown, by this simplifying of thought, upon the problems which so much disturb us, on the confused tangle of history; nor how much new power all mankind will have over the present and the future of humanity, and each person over individual action and feeling. Then we shall be able also to simplify still further. We shall get back to one primitive source, to one ground of all thought, absolutely simple, and find, not a cell, but a living power of love, in whose desire to give and to take form, all things, all thoughts are potentially contained; in whom that which we call Matter and that which we call Spirit are one and the same thing. That is the work of the next few centuries, and when it is done (and I bid you rejoice at the pleasure and comfort of your descendants) man will be able to explain by this theory of Darwin's, applied to the development of the human mind, the whole course of the history of the thought of the human race, with all its problems, in every sphere of it, with the same certainty of progress in discovery as we now have in investigating the organic world. There is a whole universe of work, quite new, before the human-race.

THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD held its weekly meeting on Thursday. The question of industrial schools was the principal matter dealt with. The Bye-laws Committee recommended that a visitor may, with the consent of a superintendent, charge any child found wandering and not having any home or settled place of abode or proper guardianship or visible means of subsistence, but that no action be taken except by the direction of the Industrial Schools Committee. The recommendation met with almost general disapproval, on the ground that it might have the effect of increasing the number of children sent to industrial schools, and it was negated by a large majority.

Our Calendar.

SUNDAY, MAY 21.

LONDON.

Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, at Little Portland-street Chapel, at 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M.
Rev. CHAS. VOYSEY, at Langham-hall, 43, Great Portland-street, 11.15 A.M.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 24.

London District Unitarian Society, at Hackney, 6.30 P.M.

* Notices of Sunday Services are inserted in this Calendar at 6d. a line, and of other Meetings and Services gratis, provided a detailed Advertisement appears.

SELECTED BOOKS.

Charlemagne, by Rev. E. L. Cutts, 3/6
Cushman (Charlotte), by C. E. Clement, 5/
Douglas's (R. K.) China, 5/
Du Moncel's (Le Comte Th.) Electric Lighting, 2/6
Nash's (W.) Two Years in Oregon, 7/6
Smith's (J.) Natural Truth of Christianity, edited by W. M. Metcalfe, 5/
Sprott's (G. W.) The Worship and Offices of the Church of Scotland, 6/
Stephen's (L.) Science of Ethics, 16/
Taylor's (E. M.) Madeira, its Scenery, 7/6

MR. WALTER MAWER, Sunday School Association Office, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C., will supply any of the above-named new books and new editions, at the prices named, carriage free, on receipt of Post-office Order, payable at the East Strand Post-office.

BIRTH.

JONES—On the 17th inst., at New Cross, the wife of Arthur Lloyd Jones, Surgeon, of a son.

DEATHS.

BIRKS—On the 14th ult., at 4, Park-terrace, Taunton, Mary, widow of the late Rev. William Birks, and mother of the Rev. John Birks, Taunton; the Rev. William Birks, Stroud, and the Rev. Richard Elliott Birks, Tamworth, aged 74 years.

GREEN—On the 17th inst., at Bowdon, near Manchester, in his 32nd year, the Rev. Benjamin L. Green, late Minister of the Oat-street Meeting House, Evesham.

GRIMSHAW—On the 13th inst., at High Bank, Gorton, Mary Ann, relict of the late John Grimshaw, Esq., J.P. and D.L., aged 86 years.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Several communications are unavoidably postponed on account of the pressure on our space.

The Inquirer,
A Religious, Political, and Literary
Newspaper, and Record of Reverent
Free Thought.

ESTABLISHED 1842.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

COLLYER'S SERMONS again reduced in price, for giving away to friends and inquirers, &c., &c.

SERMONS, by ROBERT COLLYER, "Nature and Life," and "The Life that Now Is," in One Volume. Price 2s., post free, if prepaid; or for Twelve Copies and upwards, 1s. 6d. each, carriage free.

TEXTS AND MARGINS OF THE REVISED NEW TESTAMENT. By Dr. G. VANCE SMITH, 1s.

POSITIVE ASPECTS OF UNITARIAN THOUGHT AND DOCTRINE. Cheap Edition, 1s.

Address, Miss PHILPOT, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London.

One Shilling Post Free.

CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE in the LIGHT OF NEW TESTAMENT REVISION.

By ALEXANDER GORDON, M.A.

"What is this? A new Teaching!"—MARK i. 27.

London: CHRISTIAN LIFE PUBLISHING ASSOCIATION, 281, Strand, W.C. 1882.

STOURBRIDGE OLD PARSONAGE BOYS' PREPARATORY SCHOOL.

Miss MAGINNIS will have VACANCIES after the Easter Holidays for Two Boarders. Terms on application.

SCHOOL will RE-OPEN on TUESDAY, May 2.

HIGH SCHOOL, STOKE GREEN, NEAR COVENTRY, established (1865) by the Rev. G. HEAVISIDE, B.A., of University and Manchester New Colleges, London, promotes a Liberal Education at a moderate cost.

MOUNT VERNON HIGH SCHOOL, NOTTINGHAM.

Boys carefully prepared for the Universities, Public Schools, or for Business. Vacancies.

SCHOOL RE-OPENS, May 8, 1882.

EDWIN SMITH, M.A., Head Master.

BRENTWOOD, WORSLEY, near MANCHESTER.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal MRS. F. SHAWCROSS, late of Brook House, Knutsford.

The NEXT TERM begins MONDAY, May 8.

For prospectus, apply to the Principal.

ENGLISH LANGUAGE and LITERATURE, COMPOSITION and READING.

Miss LOUISA DREWRY has some time Disengaged for Lecture—or Practice Classes in Schools. She would also read with Private Pupils.—143, King Henry's-road, South Hampstead, N.W.

"THE FORT, MARGATE."—APARTMENTS in a well-furnished house, facing the sea, on moderate terms.

Address, Mrs. Stabback, Lansdowne Lodge, the Fort Margate.

BRIGHTON.—Apartments, with or without Board, at Miss Wood's, 12, Lower Rock Gardens. One minute from Madeira-walk and the Chain Pier.

A CAMBRIDGE M.A. (experienced, good address) wishes at once for a TUTORSHIP to one or more boys under 14. Most successful with pupils. Is musical and a cricketer, &c. Highest references. No agents.—Address Spec. care of Messrs. Dawson and Sons, 121, Cannon-street, London, E.C.

WANTED by an invalid lady a young person as COMPANION, the lady to be above 24 years of age, and willing to undertake also the education of a girl 12 yrs old.—Apply by letter, A. B., stating age, experience, qualification, and reference, addressed to the care of the Editor of this paper.

OLDBURY SUNDAY SCHOOL ANNUAL SERVICES, Sunday, May 21, 1882.—Preachers: Morning, the Rev. HENRY MCKEAN; Afternoon, the Rev. THOMAS PIPE; Evening, the Rev. J. B. GARDNER. Services at 10.45 A.M., and 2.45 and 6.30 P.M. A Collection at each Service.

UNITARIAN CHAPEL, PRESTON. CHAPEL AND SCHOOL ALTERATIONS.

The following Subscriptions have been received towards the £100 still required for the above purpose, in response to the appeal to our friends:—

	£	s.	d.
Amount previously acknowledged	54	11	0
Mr. William Rathbone, M.P., London	5	5	0
Mrs. Thomas, Redland, Bristol	2	0	0
R. L. Leamington	1	0	0
Mr. G. B. Brooks, Padham	0	10	0
Misses Lambert, Newcastle-on-Tyne	2	0	0
Mrs. L. Haslam, Bolton	1	0	0
Mr. Henry Turner, Offerton	1	0	0

Further subscriptions will be thankfully received by Mr. SAMUEL LEE, 50, Berry-street; Mr. HENRY HIBBERT, 12, Spring Bank; or the Rev. W. J. TAYLOR, 34, East View, Preston.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK.—Current Accounts opened according to the usual practice of other Bankers, and Interest allowed on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £25. No commission charged for keeping Accounts.

The Bank also receives money on Deposit at Three per cent. Interest, repayable on demand.

The Bank undertakes, for its Customers, free of charge, the custody of Deeds, Writings, and other Securities and Valuables; the collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the purchase and sale of Stocks and Shares.

Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued.

A Pamphlet, with full particulars, on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane.

THE BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY'S ANNUAL RECEIPTS EXCEED FOUR MILLIONS.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH, with Immediate Possession, and No Rent to pay. Apply at the Office the BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH, with Immediate Possession, either for Building or Gardening purposes. Apply at the Office of the BIRKBECK FREE HOLD LAND SOCIETY.

A Pamphlet, with full particulars, on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane.

ASSURANCE AGAINST ACCIDENTS OF ALL KINDS. ASSURANCE AGAINST RAILWAY ACCIDENTS ALONE. ASSURANCE AGAINST FATAL ACCIDENTS AT SEA. ASSURANCE OF EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

Railway Passengers' Assurance Company. THE OLDEST AND LARGEST COMPANY, INSURING AGAINST ACCIDENTS OF ALL KINDS.

The Right Hon. LORD KINNAIRD, Chairman.

Subscribed Capital, £1,000,000.

PAID-UP CAPITAL AND RESERVE, £240,000.

MODERATE PREMIUMS

Bonus allowed to Insurers after five years,

£1,700,000

HAS BEEN PAID AS COMPENSATION.

Apply to the Clerks at the Railway Stations, the Local Agents, or

64, CORNHILL,

or 8, GRAND HOTEL BUILDINGS, CHARING-CROSS, LONDON.

WILLIAM J. VIAN, Secretary.

Possessing all the properties of the Finest Arrowroot,

BROWN AND POLSON'S CORN FLOUR

Is a World-wide Necessary

FOR

THE NURSERY, THE SICK-ROOM, AND THE FAMILY TABLE.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE ANNIVERSARY MEETINGS,

MAY 31st and JUNE 1st, 1882.

The FIFTY-SEVENTH ANNUAL MEETING of the Association will be held on WEDNESDAY, May 31st, in UNITY CHURCH, UPPER-STREET, ISLINGTON, LONDON. The Service to be commenced, at Eleven o'clock, by the Rev. WILLIAM M. AINSWORTH, of Lancaster.

The SERMON will be preached by the Rev. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, D.D., of Boston, U.S.

The usual COLLECTION will be made at the close the Service in aid of the Funds of the Association.

After a short interval, the MEETING will be held for the transaction of the Business of the Association; DAVID AINSWORTH, Esq., M.P., the President, in the Chair.

The CONFERENCE will be held on THURSDAY MORNING, June 1st, in ESSEX-STREET CHAPEL, STRAND, LONDON, at Half-past Ten. Subject:—"The Duty of our Churches in relation to the Masses of the People." To be introduced by the Rev. JAMES T. WHITEHEAD, of Hackney, and the Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, of Stamford-street, London.

In the Evening of the same day, June 1st, a SOIREE will be held in the CANNON-STREET HOTEL. Tea and Coffee at Six o'clock, Music at 6.30, and afterwards the Meeting. The President, DAVID AINSWORTH, Esq., M.P., in the Chair.

Tickets for the Soiree (One Shilling each) should be taken early. On and after Monday, May 29th, the price will be 1s. 6d. To be had at the Office of the Association, or in the London Church Vestries.

HENRY IERSON, Secretary.

37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London.

THE FORTY-EIGHTH ANNUAL MEETING OF THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION

WILL BE HELD AT THE

FREEMASONS' TAVERN, GREAT QUEEN-STREET, LINCOLN'S-INN FIELDS, LONDON, on FRIDAY, 2nd JUNE NEXT.

E. LAWRENCE, Esq., LL.B., will preside, and the Rev. F. E. MILLSON, of Halifax, will read a Paper on "The Changed Methods for the Changed Conditions of Sunday School Work."

Breakfast at half-past eight for nine o'clock. Tickets 2s. 6d. each, to be had at the Rooms of the Association and of the Stewards.

STEWARDS:

FREDERICK ALLEN.
W. CHAS. BISS.
HOWARD C. CLARKE.
W. H. DRUMMOND.
T. N. DYER.
ERNEST GRIFFIN.
PHILEMON MOORE.
C. F. PEARSON.

FRANK PRESTON.
ION PRITCHARD.
FRANK ROBINSON.
THOS. ROBINSON.
HUGON S. TAYLER.
JOHN S. TOYE.
J. ALAN WHITEHEAD.
F. WITHALL.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

The THIRTY-SECOND ANNUAL MEETING will be held in the NEW GRAVEL PITS CHAPEL, HACKNEY, on WEDNESDAY, May 24, 1882. Sir J. C. LAWRENCE, Bart., M.P. (President of the Society), in the Chair.

Tea at half-past Six o'clock. The Chair to be taken at half-past Seven o'clock precisely.

Tickets for the Tea, price Sixpence each, may be obtained of any member of the Committee; at the British and Foreign Unitarian Association's Rooms, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand; and at the New Gravel Pits Chapel, Hackney.

LONDON.—WEST-CENTRAL TEMPERANCE HOTEL, 97, 99, 101, Southampton-row, Russell-square.—Patronised and highly commended by the Rev. D. S. Govett, M.A., English Chaplain, Gibraltar; Rev. H. M. Holden, M.A., St. Bartholomew's, Bradford, Yorkshire; Rev. Canon French, M.A., Killaloe, Ireland, &c. Central, quiet, exceptionally clean, moderate in charges. Visitors' Drawing Room. Breakfast or Tea, 1s. 3d. Beds from 1s. 6d. Printed Tariff Card on application.

FREDERIC SMITH, Proprietor.

Printed by WOODFALL and KINDER, of Milford-lane, Strand W.C.; and Published for the Proprietors by WALTER MAWER, at the Offices of the SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London, W.C.—Saturday, May 20, 1882

The Inquirer.

A Religious, Political, & Literary Newspaper, & Record of Reberent Free Thought.

[REGISTERED AT THE GENERAL POST-OFFICE AS A NEWSPAPER.]

No. 2083.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 27, 1882.

[PRICE 5D.]

CONTENTS.

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:—

Our Anniversaries	333
The Opening of Museums on Sunday ...	333
Suicide	334
The Moral Aspect of the Nibelung Lied ...	335
Dr. Jas. Freeman Clarke's Lowell Lectures	336

REVIEWS:—

Memoirs of Old Friends, &c.	337
Literary Notes	339

CORRESPONDENCE:—

The Irish Crisis	339
The Sunday Opening Debate and Division	340
Emerson as an Agitator	340
The Plymouth Jubilee Meetings	340
Early Marriages	304

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE:—

London District Unitarian Society ...	341
Leicester: Welcome to the Rev. J. Moden	342

THE LIBERAL PULPIT:—

The Mission of Unitarianism	343
------------------------------------	-----

The next number of the Inquirer will contain full reports of the Annual Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Sunday School Association, and other valuable and interesting matter. Orders should be sent, not later than Friday morning next, to Mr. WALTER MAWER, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C.

OUR ANNIVERSARIES.

OUR anniversaries come round again in their due course, reminding many of our older friends and active workers in the Liberal cause of the rapid flight of years, and bringing with them some chastened memories of the veterans and dear companions by the way who have fallen at their post, faithful to the end and full of hope for the ultimate triumph of truth and freedom, although it was not given to them as it is now to us to see the fruition of past labours in growing liberality of thought and the wider acceptance of principles of thought, which, as we have often said, are more precious than any dogmatic conclusions.

It has been felt in many quarters that the Liverpool Conference would lessen the usual attendance, and greatly diminish the interest of our Whitsuntide meetings in London. We cannot venture to predict quite so confidently as some of the oracles in the sporting world, but we are strongly inclined to think that these apprehensions will be agreeably disappointed by the result. The Liverpool meetings were so entirely successful that they created an appetite for more religious excitement of the same healthy kind. They showed so thoroughly harmonious, united a spirit, and were imbued by such a profoundly Christian sentiment in the best sense of the words, that those who have imagined that we could only meet in conference to dispute and divide are now convinced that there is a closer and a more real bond of union among us than they had imagined. They were pervaded by so deep and fervent an enthusiasm, regulated by the sound common sense which we modestly trust is one of the characteristics of Unitarians, that many who have hitherto kept aloof from our public meetings and deprecated all "denominational" efforts have had their prejudices dispelled, and have come to the conclusion that Unitarianism with its thoroughly free and elastic organisation, such as it is, stands for religious freedom and progress, and for Liberal Christianity in harmony with the best and highest tendencies of thought in the present and coming age.

Those who attend our meetings of next week in such a spirit will, we doubt not, find much to interest and encourage them.

We have recently been called to mourn for the loss of two of our foremost divines in America, and two of our foremost literary men, the latter not ours only but the world's possession. It is a most interesting and noteworthy fact that the almost life-long friend and dear companion of H. W. BELLINGS, the accomplished orator, of ORVILLE DEWEY, the learned divine, of LONGFELLOW, the poet of humanity, of EMERSON, "the American Plato," will be the preacher at the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association on Wednesday. Dr. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE is so well known in this country as now the foremost of American divines of the Liberal school of theology that no words of ours are needed to introduce him to our readers. Since the long past days when ROBERT COLLYER, H. W. BELLINGS and ATHANASE COQUEREL occupied the pulpit of Essex-street Chapel at our successive anniversaries, no divine so eminent has preached the Association sermon. His works are cherished possessions in most of our households, and we fully anticipate that there will be a widespread desire on the part of those who have read his admirable religious manuals to listen to words of wisdom from his eloquent lips.

The denominational year, if we may so term it, has not been one of great excitement, except for the memorable incident of the Liverpool Conference, but it has been one of steady and healthy work, undertaken under circumstances of greater encouragement and hope than in any former period. The report of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association will, we have reason to believe, show that that society is in a thoroughly sound and progressive state, and is rapidly winning universal respect and confidence under the guidance of its present efficient officers. With the laudable object of gaining as wide and popular an assembly as possible, the usual collation, at which only a moderate number could be present, is substituted by a soirée in the large hall of Cannon-street Hotel, which it is hoped will be attended by at least a thousand or fifteen hundred persons. We understand that a concert of unusual excellence will form the introductory part of the programme, and our American visitor, a deputation from the Reformed Church of Holland, and various well-known speakers will take part in the subsequent proceedings.

The meeting of the Sunday School Association on Friday, under the genial presidency of Mr. EDWIN LAWRENCE, LL.B., is sure to prove as attractive and spirited as it always has been in past years. It is well that we should be reminded of the close relation between doctrinal and practical effort, and of the duty of bringing the Sunday-school everywhere into intimate connection with the Church. We hope we shall hear something more than we heard last year of the prospects of the long-talked of building scheme which is to form a centre and a permanent home for our various religious societies.

On Friday evening the ministers of our Free Churches meet in conclave at Dr. WILLIAM'S Library, when an address is to be delivered by Dr. FREEMAN CLARKE on "Methods of a Church for our Time." In the spirit of the widest hospitality an invitation is extended to, and is generally responded by ministers of other Churches; but it is an informal meeting of an essentially private society for the discussion of subjects especially interesting to the ministerial mind, and we greatly regret that it will not be in our power to gratify the natural curiosity of the outer world by any report of the discussions.

We have every reason to believe that the proceedings of the whole week will be animated by that unity of spirit which ought always to characterise the advocates of the religion of freedom and reconciliation. This season of Whitsuntide, the Pentecost of the early Church, is a standing historical witness to the power and permanence of such a faith.

THE OPENING OF MUSEUMS ON SUNDAY.

THERE is really nothing new to be said in reference to this old controversy, and probably the minds of all our readers are quite made up on the subject. We need do little more than record that yesterday week Mr. GEORGE HOWARD moved a resolution in the House of Commons in favour of the opening of public museums and galleries of art on Sundays, and was supported and opposed on the old customary grounds.

Mr. HOWARD, like other principal advocates of the measure—notably the late Dean STANLEY—carefully disclaimed any wish to introduce what is called a Continental Sunday. There is no desire on the part of any one to promote increased Sunday labour, or to turn for the industrious millions a day of rest into a day of toil. One day of rest in every seven is demanded by the physical necessities of our nature, and if the Sabbath in the true etymological sense of the word were not supposed to have divine sanctions and authority, it would be necessary to institute it, and guard it by legislative enactments in the highest interests of the community as a whole.

But the measure advocated by the Sunday

Society and its friends does not tend to any such result, but only aims to promote the rational enjoyment of a portion of the Sunday, which is now spent by increasing numbers in idleness at home or dissipation in the public-house. It is only proposed that the toiling millions should have access to precisely the same kind of advantages in their own national museums and art galleries which the rich already possess in their own homes or in their private galleries.

The debate of last week was notable for its curious conflict of testimony from members who have peculiar opportunities of knowing the opinions of the working classes. Mr. BURT, as a genuine working man himself, seconded Mr. HOWARD'S motion, and contended that the measure would involve no great addition to Sunday labour, while the benefit it would confer would be widely felt and highly appreciated. Mr. BROADHURST, another representative of the working classes, gives us to understand that they prefer Sunday as it is, with all its terrible dullness and monotony, and would rather bear the ills they know and are accustomed to than incur the possible risk of converting the precious day of rest into another day of unremitting toil.

The argument is by no means conclusive, even granting that the opinion it represents is widely diffused among the working-classes, a statement to which we give an incredulous ear. The inestimable privilege of a Sunday free from all unnecessary work is in no danger from such a movement as that under consideration. It is protected by the good sense of the community, and by the ascertained economical fact that unremitting toil for seven days of the week would be less productive to both capitalists and operatives than six days' work relieved by a periodical seventh day's rest. The "continental Sunday," enjoyed in a simple and natural way, is becoming less and less of a working day, and it is only superficial observers who contend that in Catholic countries there is less attention to the outward observances of religion than in our own Protestant land, where recent statistics have shown the marked absence from both our churches and chapels of the great majority of the population.

If, on the other hand, the working classes—which may be included a considerable portion of the lower middle classes—have no taste for the refining influences of art, music, popular science, and would only spend a "free Sunday" in gross and sensual indulgences, the reply is, so much the worse for the working classes; the churches and chapels have failed to attract them, it is time to try to elevate and instruct them. It is admitted now that they spend the greater part of the Sunday, which is represented as so great a boon, in idleness and mere sensual indulgence. It is admitted that they have access to no private libraries of their own, and in our overcrowded towns have no great attractions to keep them in their own family circle. It is admitted that they frequent in crowds the public-houses from the moment of their opening to that of their closing. It is obvious that Sabbatarianism is largely responsible for these admitted evils by its unreasonable restrictions and prohibitions. It deprives the working man of almost his only opportunity of cultivating his mind and refining his tastes, and then uses the very indifference it has created as an argument against the opening of popular museums and galleries of art. The Sabbatarians, with the bigotry characteristic of their class, strive to impose their own narrow and exclusive opinions upon those who reject the whole Sabbatarian superstition; with the inevitable result that by increasing multitudes the day is not observed according to their own Judaical interpretation, while they deprive others of the opportunity of observing it in the larger, healthier, freer spirit which is in harmony with their own conscientious convictions.

For our part we hold that Sunday as at present observed is far more generally desecrated in this country than it is on the Continent. There is far more drunkenness and idle dissipation on that day in London than there is in Paris. It is not often that travellers spend a Sunday in that city, but those who do have been impressed not only by the order of the crowds in the streets and places of public resort compared with an English crowd, but with the evident enjoyment and appreciation with which soldiers, artisans, and their families pass through the galleries of the Louvre and the Luxembourg. Mr. CAINE'S testimony during the debate was exceedingly valuable. He said that he had studied the question in Holland as a Protestant country, and Belgium as a Catholic country; in Amsterdam and in Brussels he found the churches crowded on the Sunday morning, and the picture-galleries in the afternoon, and this experience confirmed his belief that the churches had nothing to fear from the opening of places of instruction like picture-galleries.

It is high time to break down the Sabbatarian superstition, based as it is upon misinterpreted passages of the Hebrew legends, and to vindicate the rational, healthful and innocent enjoyment of what may then be regarded as in the highest sense of the phrase the Lord's Day, set apart and consecrated by natural and therefore divine ordinance to the highest culture of both mind and body. We cordially wish all success to the laudable work of the Sunday Society, and urge them to continue energetically in their efforts until they have succeeded in converting their present influential minority into a decisive majority. In the recent debate it was manifest that the weight of argument was all on their side, while their opponents relied on untrustworthy traditions and narrow prejudices.

SUICIDE!

THE subject of suicide is one of a deeply interesting and painful character. It stands in close relation to many other matters of interest—civilisation, religion, science, sex, and social life. Many difficult problems are found connected with it when a rationale of it is attempted. Fresh interest has been given to this subject recently by the elaborate work of Dr. HENRY MORSELLI of Turin, an abridgment of which has appeared in English, forming a volume of the "International Scientific Series." This book is an essay on comparative moral statistics, and furnishes abundant materials for thought to the student and philosopher. Some of the conclusions which Dr. MORSELLI arrives at seem fanciful and unaccountable: only those of a broad and general character can be accepted as affording any solution of this difficult question.

The first of these broad and general facts is, that suicide keeps pace with civilisation. It does not decline as mankind make progress in civilised life. Indeed, it is believed that the nineteenth century is the century par excellence of suicides. This is a most discouraging fact. It is a painful admission to make, especially by those who look to the progress of civilisation to check the social evils of our time, and elevate the tone and condition of society. We are not surprised that philosophers of eminence have taken a serious view of the position thus revealed, and put forth all their powers "to determine the causes and ascertain the limits of this strange psychological phenomenon." As the result of their inquiries statistics have been gathered in abundance, and they show a rate of growth and regularity which challenges attention. England, we are happy to say, does not stand at the head, and therefore does not deserve the sweeping accusation of MONTESQUIEU that England is the classic land of suicide. France, Germany, and other countries take precedence of England in this sad business. The following statistics will illustrate this fact with regard to England, Prussia, and France:—

	England & Wales.	Prussia.	France.
1851-55.....	1,025.....	2,075.....	3,639
1856-60.....	1,310.....	2,152.....	4,002
1861-65.....	1,343.....	2,247.....	4,700
1866-70.....	1,459.....	3,316.....	4,989
1871-75.....	1,544.....	3,343.....	5,256

It is said that the only European country which shows a diminution of voluntary deaths is Norway, and this exception is "owing perhaps to the severe laws issued in the last twenty years against drunkenness, and to the Government restrictions placed on the sale and consumption of alcohol, by which means a powerful cause of death by suicide has been removed." Here, then, we come to another broad fact, which Dr. MORSELLI'S statistics substantiate. That a considerable number of suicides may be traced to the consumption of alcohol is openly admitted in scientific works. The drinking habits of the people, then, tend largely to the commission of this great crime. This is another weighty argument in behalf of strict temperance in regard to the use of intoxicating liquors. One fact seems certain, that as drunkenness increases suicides increase. This is a sufficient condemnation of intemperance, were there no other.

Another fact which Dr. MORSELLI'S inquiries tend to establish is, that climatic changes are among the influences which lead to suicide. In certain seasons of the year the number of deaths from this cause rises above the average. We are told that the transition period between spring and summer, and especially the month of June, exercises the most positive influence on suicidal tendency, whilst that of winter, particularly of December, would be negative. This appears strange, because for a long time an opposite opinion was held. It was maintained that suicide was more frequent in damp, cloudy, and dark weather, such as helps the development of the melancholy passions. That suicides should be more numerous in the bright days of June than in the gloomy days of November seems scarcely credible.

One more strange conclusion to which Dr. MORSELLI'S statistics bring us is, that suicides are more frequent in the earlier than in the latter days of the week. How is this to be accounted for? He himself endeavours to explain it in this manner:—

It appears to us easy to understand the psychological reason of this statistical fact. Saturday is the favourite day of those who have to live by manual labour. It is the day on which the workman receives his pay, and thus is the day of joy, of material well-being, of moral quiet, and this content of mind lasts through Sunday, on which day the gluttonous, dissipated man of the people wastes the money gained in the week, whilst also the solemn festivity, the quiet and general gaiety, distract from their sad thoughts those who think of leaving life voluntarily. But the new week begins with the satiety of gluttony, the effects of drunkenness, the remorse for prodigality, the burthen of misery and of moral sufferings, and especially with the intolerance of work among the labouring classes, by which the greater number of violent deaths from Monday to Thursday are explained.

The question of sex, too, has its bearing on this subject. Suicide is much more common among men than among women. In some instances the number of the latter is only one-half, in others one-fourth. On the average it would seem that three men commit self-destruction to one woman. How is this wide difference to be accounted for? Partly at least by the circumstance that there is less excitement, less wear and tear of brain and nerve in life of women than of men. Men mingle more in the world, take part more in its excitements, its politics, its business, its competitions and its enterprise, share more largely in its successes and reverses, are identified more closely with the stirring events of the time. Women, on the contrary, lead a more quiet and retired life; their home, with its immediate connections, is their world. There sphere of life is smaller, and free from the excitements which make up the sphere of men's life. Something also may be due to a difference of moral nature; to women having more patience, more quiet endurance, more repose and serenity of nature than most men, also more faith and trust. There is this difference between men and women, speaking generally, and this we think will help to account for the fewer suicides among women than among men.

Again, gambling in its various forms is largely answerable for the growing crime of self-murder. Both here and on the Continent gambling is a prevailing vice. It exists in a variety of forms, and is equally pernicious and ruinous in all. It is impossible to take up a daily paper without having its temptation to gambling thrust before you. It is bad enough here, but we suppose in some places on the Continent it is still worse. The suspense, the excitement, the hope and fear, the sudden chance, the ruinous loss, the despair that follows—all these lead naturally to that mental condition which prompts to suicide. And again, business transactions are now quite commonly carried on in a manner that comes very near to gambling. What term describes better the speculations of the stock-market? How are millions of money lost and won by dodges and adroit moves little if any better than the gambler's tricks? The hurry and drive of those times, the severe tension of brain and nerve in these fast days, the railroad speed of life, the feverish desire for display, wealth, station, position—all these are tendencies towards the melancholy goal of insanity and suicide. Taking all these things into account, the wonder is not that suicides abound, but that they are not more numerous than they are, alarming as the actual number is.

What remedy or corrective can be found for this prevalence of suicide? It is difficult to answer this question. So far as it arises from the increased momentum of modern life we do not see how it is to be remedied. We cannot go back to the quiet ways of our fathers. We cannot check the rapid progress of our time, or hope to allay the excitement which is a necessary concomitant of that progress. The interest in life and its concerns becomes continually more absorbing. At the same time moral and religious agencies of every kind never were so active as they are to day. These ought to, and no doubt do, exercise some corrective influence, but their inadequacy is only too obvious in face of the terrible array of facts collected in Dr. MORSELL'S instructive and interesting work.

THE MORAL ASPECT OF THE NIBELUNG LIED.

There are many interesting phases of the epic-drama, which Wagner has, with his "New Art," placed before the public. We will confine ourselves to its moral aspect, and try to show the philosophical and spiritual significance of the whole. The undoubted elements in the marvellous poem of the Nibelung Lied are: survivals of Nature Myths formed when early man was in contact with the phenomena of earth, sea and sky; mingling with these, are the stories of base and heroic deeds in the growth of national life; but because we live in a moral universe, there is a spiritual significance in the crudest and most grotesque ideas of the early stages in the history of our race.

We are sometimes awed with the weird force and grandeur of this poem, and in hearing the musical equivalent of the realistic scenes presented on the stage, we feel how what is mythical, historical and even cosmic, yields in importance to what is expressed throughout the whole, viz., the moral element in this presentation of the tragedy of life. Of course, these myths and legends crystallised, and assumed definite and poetic form on the very borderland of history, and mingled with the early forms of German literature. But the Nibelung Lied is on this account, perhaps, all the more valuable, as it is the unconscious expression of moral development, and enshrines for us in the non-historical dramatis personæ the motives, aims, and ideals of growing man.

If we apply our modern code of ethics to the earlier stages of the drama, we may see the opposite of the moral aspect; but these, viewed in the light of the climax, show us clearly the ascent of the quality of life, the evolution from moral chaos of a spiritual ideal.

So true is this that we have to wait for the third night (Siegfried) before we see the relation of the strifes, intrigues, cruelties, and crimes of the Nibelung (Alberich), of the god (Wotan), of the giants (Fafner and Fasolt), and of the children of the gods (Siegmund and Sieglinde), to the true hero and heroine, the masculine embodiment of truth, honour, purity, and aspiration in Siegfried, and of chastity, heroic womanly devotion and sacrifice in Brünnhilde.

Perhaps it will be well to re-tell the story in brief, letting the salient features have strict relation to the moral drift of the poem. The subject is—the lust for gold with its accompanying power—the quest of the magic ring. The development of the plot shows how the love of what is low has a deteriorating and dwarfing effect on character, while the influence of the love of what is pure and true is ennobling in an expansive power of growth.

Alberich, the Nibelung, while being tempted by the allurements of the water-nymphs, catches sight of the gleaming gold in the depths of the Rhine; and though love, to him, has no high signification, he resigns it for the wealth whose possessor should win the world; out of the mass he makes the ring, which is the symbol of right to the hoard. The chief god, Wotan, and the fire-god, Loge, by cunning intrigue force Alberich to give up the treasure, but in parting with the magic ring he attaches to it a curse. Wotan barters the ring to the giants for the beautiful Freia. The charm of the curse works with these giants, for they quarrel, and Fasolt is killed by Fafner, who holds the ring.

Siegfried is born of Siegmund and Sieglinde, and he who is the embodiment of the higher qualities cares not for the glittering gold, though he becomes possessor of the ring. Here the moral element becomes supreme. Carlyle says, "Hear deep enough, and you hear musically;" and we may say, "See deep enough and you see poetically." Fafner, the surviving giant, in the shape of a dragon guards the ring. Siegfried with the sacred sword of right slays the dragon, and accidentally tastes its blood. According to the Greek idea the strength of the soul of the conquered foe passes into the conqueror, and here Siegfried, having tasted the blood of the dragon, gets possession of the ring (for which he does not care), but the blood has a threefold effect on him.

1st. He is able to understand the dark plotting thoughts of his enemy. 2nd. He understands the language of birds; he has the Open Sesame to the realm of melody. 3rd. The songs of the birds lead him to Brünnhilde, who is the embodiment of chastity, heroic devotion and sacrifice—the feminine counterpart of himself. Thus he is led to the light of his life, to the love worthy of his own noble soul.

We should like to speak more of the character of Siegfried and Brünnhilde than space allows. They are no doubt the expression in personalities, the individualisations, of the moral element. "The rude Saga-man felt darkly and indistinctly" what we more clearly see. Gutrune says of Siegfried, "Lordliest is he of men alive." So full is he of the pure and noble, that what all others long and strive for was nothing to him. He says:—

"Well nigh I forgot the gold."

No one who on the third night of the "Nibelung Lied" witnessed Siegfried finding Brünnhilde asleep, and waking her with the pure kiss of love, will ever forget the scene. No doubt here there was a survival of myth as the sun wakes all nature into life and song, and beauty; but there was a richer meaning concerning the deeper things of our moral life, as truth and honour call forth and come into union with light and love. We are prepared by the confused and chaotic condition of the earlier parts of the poem for the growth of the higher human life. Ruin has been worked to all who lusted for the hoard of wealth and possessed the ring, and, as a consequence, there is the waning power, the Dusk of the Demi-gods; but following this is the dawn of a divine humanity.

We see how the ideas of purity, love, honour, truth, and even sacrifice were slowly growing through the retiring gloom of prehistoric times. It is true the demi-gods of mythology were the heroes of past ages, and are only "shadows of men projected into the distance, and looming in exaggerated importance;" they are not, however, to be viewed as final expressions in the drama, but as conditions that are outgrown in the later developments, when truth and honour are seen to be the glory of manhood, when chastity and sacrifice are the charm and power of womanhood, when a divine humanity is complete in the union of Siegfried and Brünnhilde with a love that can grow through trial and perfect itself in death as the crowning perfection of all human endeavour. It is very important to remember that the ideals of a people, the heroes of their romances, the higher personal embodiments of their myths and legends are the projection of their better selves towards which, in their finer moods, they aspire; hence Siegfried and Brünnhilde, while they were not realised ideals in actual life, show how the old Teutonic world caught and expressed visionary gleams of the moral beauty which we believe is the revelation in humanity of the Father of Love.

We have used the words "Divine humanity," and the poem plainly shows how the old world dimly felt that the redemption of the soul from the dwarfing deadly power of a low love, viz., the mere possession of the gleaming treasure of the Rhine, and the struggle to retain the ring, must be made by the union of the divine and human elements in the lives of hero and heroine, Siegfried and Brünnhilde, and by their devotion to the higher qualities, the very opposite of the elements that had been loved by those in quest of the Magic Ring. It is one more expression of the Eternal Logos. We should go beyond our limits of space were we to point out all the moral beauties of the Nibelung Lied which illustrate and confirm the views we have expressed.

One or two remarks must suffice. The low and wicked Mime cannot forge the sacred sword; Siegfried, because his might is the expression of right, accomplishes the task easily. Wotan wishes to foil the power of him who has the ring, but he despairs even of the heroes as helpers, unless he can find "the only one who himself, free from the 'curse,' may save the gods by regaining the fatal ring."

Brünnhilde is condemned for an act of generosity and sacrifice to slumber on a rock, till a man shall find, and wake, and win her: she implores but one favour from her offended father; to surround her during her slumbers with a wide circle of blazing fire, in order that no man shall wake her but a fearless hero—one whose love shall be tried as by fire.

The tragic element in life is abundantly illustrated. Love is called on to suffer—but for others. Siegfried loses his identity through the potion administered by his plotting foe, and has to woo his own wife for another man; while Brünhilde has the pain of seeing her own ideal hero and husband, estranged and seemingly false, though in reality profoundly real and true. In this complication some of the heroic virtues are displayed. What gives such emphasis to these moral elements is that they are in harmony with the expressions of the ascending quality of life in the Icelandic and Scandinavian versions of the Nibelung Lied. Siegfried comes from the most fiery temptation scathless:—"because of his blameless purity in this ordeal he makes his name an exalted one so long as the world shall last." The tragedy deepens towards the close, and the moral element shines forth in resplendent lustre. Hagen, who kills Siegfried, tries in vain to seize the ring from the corpse. Brünhilde sacrifices herself on the pyre of her dead hero, and throws the ring which she takes from his finger "into the Rhine for eternal atonement and salvation." Greed and lust are subdued, and love is supreme.

One cannot help seeing that in the cosmic meaning of the poem, only the dual aspect of nature is regarded—the eternal strife of light and darkness with its sad reference to human life. Max Müller says, "There is always a mingling of light and shade—in joy, a fear of sorrow; in sorrow, a ray of hope, and throughout the whole a silent wondering at this strange world." The seer and the singer of the far back time did not see "an increasing purpose in the process of the suns," but in the moral element he did express, the rude Saga-man had "elective affinities" with the teachings of the Religious Faiths, and with the spiritual tendencies of modern times. He could not see as we do now, the worse become the better, and the better the best in infinite progression, but his moral teaching is one with the Old Testament when it says, "Ephraim is joined to his idols; let him alone." We must lower to the level of our idols, or rise to the height and beauty of our ideals; and as Jesus taught—if we would win the world, of mere power, and wealth and pleasure, we must lose our souls, of honour, truth and right, and love. We are thankful to be born in a time when we can combine with these spiritual truths the larger hope, and feel as F. W. Robertson said, when expressing the essence of In Memoriam—"The immortal is in us, and Love is King." A. B. C.

DR. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE'S LOWELL LECTURES.*

Some months since it was our happy duty to call attention to Dr. Clarke's "Life of Christ," as told in the conversion of Thomas, the Jewish Septic. And, while introducing that notice, allusion was made to the exhilarating influence wrought by an example of vital vigour in a Septuagenarian, which could pour forth in one year three such racy productions as the spirited article in the North American Review on the text, "Did Shakespeare write Bacon's Essays;" the practical suggestions of "Self-Culture;" and the picturesque "Legend of Thomas," the Twin. Another year has come in with May Day. And now, once more, we have the joy of welcoming our friend's last book of "Events and Epochs in Religious History," his "Lowell Institute Course of Lectures for 1880;" and at the same time, of announcing that we may hope soon to see another volume on "The Christian Religion and Modern Agnosticism," being the substance of his discourses before the "Church of the Disciples" during this season; and what will be yet more interesting, his "Lowell Institute Course of Lectures for 1881-82," on "Ethnic and Catholic Religions"—in which, by singular coincidence, Dr. Clarke has traversed a part of the same region of human development, so exhaustively explored, and eloquently depicted, in his "Hibbert Lectures," by Dr. Kuenen.

The last words received from Dr. Clarke are his touching address at the funeral of Ralph Waldo Emerson, in the village church where the Concord Sage was wont to worship; and his most Christian, while statesmanlike, protest against the unjust attempt to exclude the hard-working and thrifty Chinese from California, for the end of securing the votes of Irish emigrants, who, though foreigners themselves, are intriguing, with jealous spite, to shut out all other foreigners, who can underbid them in the labour market, while living more cheaply and toiling more efficiently. This humane, argumentative, and well-timed discourse is worthy of the associate of William Lloyd Garrison, Samuel J. May, and John Pierpont, during the Anti-Slavery Conflict;—who from first to last has been the advocate of "Woman's Peerage";—and who, throughout the "War for Freedom and Union," was the pastor and confidential friend of Governor John A. Andrew.

When now the source of such fresh-heartedness, original thought, and prompt alacrity in duty is sought for, let one who has known him from boyhood bear witness that the fountain of James Clarke's exhaustless energy is Faith—in its three degrees, of Confidence in heart, Intuitive Belief in intellect, and Fidelity in will. With steadfast might he does the nearest work that his hand finds to do; single-eyed in purpose, free from ambition, and with pure intents to glorify God and serve his fellows in his own generation, he pretends to no special greatness, fulfils his average best, and goes on his even way, leaving the results in trust to Providence. And so will he be found next week—somewhat fagged, it may be, with a hard winter's unremitting toil—yet ever receptive of new influences, responsive to new friendships, hospitably liberal in heart and mind, and ready, as is his wont, according to his compatriot Edward Hale's felicitous phrase, always to "lend a hand."

The anecdote so tersely told by Brooke Herford, in last week's Inquirer, shows what style of "Christian Manhood" Dr. Clarke aspires to reach. Grandson of James Freeman, the dauntless pioneer and patriarch of Unitarianism in New England, brought up at the feet of Channing, Dewey, Greenwood, and Furness; the disciple in philosophy of James Walker, F. H. Hedge, George Ripley, O. A. Brownson, and later in his career of James Martineau; the reverent compeer of Emerson, and bosom friend of Theodore Parker, widely as he differed from each in theology; and, finally, the shoulder to shoulder helper of Henry W. Bellows in expanding the "Unitarian Sect" into the "Universal Communion of Liberal Christianity," it would be strange indeed if he did not strive to be one of the heralds of the Coming Church of "the Children of God;" while carefully trained in modern schools of "Scientific Criticism," and widely read in "Comparative Religious History," he states with accurate clearness and sententious point the "Affirmative Convictions," to which thus far he has been led.

And just this inter-blending of broad spiritual fellowship and sharp intellectual discernment will be found to be the distinctive characteristic of the book now referred to, as an outline sketch, for which alone there is room, will quickly prove.

The volume is dedicated to "William Greenleaf Eliot," President of Washington University, St. Louis, Missouri, companion of theological study in youth; fellow-worker in Christian labours in early manhood; and friend in all the experiences of life. And its aim is thus succinctly stated in a prefatory note:—

There is nothing more interesting to us than the religious experiences of those great souls who have helped to lead the human race up nearer to God. This collection of sketches may inspire in some persons the wish to make a more serious study of the lives and events, of which little more than an outline could be given in the present work.

And again, in the Introduction he says:—

My purpose is to call your attention to certain points of paramount interest in the history of religion. I shall speak of the Christian Church in its humble beginnings, and of the curious phenomena of monastic institutions, first appearing in Ethnic religions and afterwards reappearing in Christianity. I shall say something of the great thinkers and heroes of faith, around whose lives, as on an axis, the history of human life has turned, and who have sometimes directed the main currents of human thought for many centuries. The tendency of scientific study in our time has perhaps led us to undervalue the influence of such great souls.

A condensed analysis of the contents will exhibit the wide sweep of biography and of theological evolution, overlooked as from a high observatory in these twelve lectures, whose subjects may be recapitulated briefly, thus:—

The First and Second lectures are on "The Catacombs," tracing their pathetic history through three periods, when they were used as (1) cemeteries, (2) places of retreat and worship, (3) sacred places. Dr. Clarke introduces his descriptions with this suggestive paragraph:—

I shall speak first of the Christian Church while it was underground, before it came into light and air. Great-souled movements are apt to be like plants, having their rudimental life in darkness. Unseen by man, unknown to history, this very obscurity of their origin is an important condition of their free developments.

The Third Lecture is on "The Buddhist Monks of Central Asia," beginning with a sketch of Sakya-Muni and his religious system; of King Asoka's Inscriptions and their high moral tone; of the Buddhist Monastic Life in Ceylon, Burmah, China, &c.; of Buddhist Architecture in their rock-cut Temples and Monasteries, and closing with a critical appreciation of the merits, defects, and spirit of Buddhism, and its supposed denial of God and Immortality. This lecture is most instructive, and presents very much the same view already given in the "Ten Great Religions," enlarged and modified by the valuable contributions to Buddhist literature by T. W. Rhys Davids and others, in later years.

In the Fourth Lecture Dr. Clarke passes by an easy transition to the "Christian Monks and Monastic Life." He begins by clearly proving that original Christianity was not Monastic. He then traces the beginnings of Christian Monasticism among the Anchorites, and the collection of Monks into Communities and Convents; then describes the rule of St. Benedict at Monte Cassino; and of the Reformed Benedictines or Cistercians at the Abbey of Clairvaux; passes next to the Mendicant Orders, under St. Dominic and St. Francis; and closes his lecture with an equitable review of the Lessons of Monasticism.

This leads the author in his Fifth Lecture to a most discriminating estimate of the characters, lives, doctrines, and influence of Augustine, Anselm, Bernard, and to a brilliant picture of their Times. The temptation is strong to linger on this ample lecture; but the themes presented are too complex and far-reaching in tendency to be touched upon, even, now. For Dr. Clarke proves how deeply the whole Church, Protestant as well as Catholic, has been indebted to these three profound religious philosophers and fervent saints, even while it has outgrown and dropped like husks many of their dogmas.

But we must pass, at once, to the Sixth Lecture, wherein is portrayed one of the grandest and loveliest pictures ever given of Jeanne d'Arc. It is illustrated from the latest literature in regard to the Maid of Orleans, collected in five large octavo volumes, by Jules Quicherat in 1854, giving the official records of the two trials of condemnation and revision from MSS. in the Bibliothèque Royale; again, in two large octavo volumes in 1858, by Counsellor E. O'Reilly, of the Imperial Court at Rouen; and finally, in the conclusive work of M. Wallon, Secretary of the Academy of Inscriptions, published in 1876. The lecture closes with an exquisite tribute to the memory of "La Pucelle," by the high-souled American poetess Maria Lowell, which begins:—

"Here dwells the legend, fed by time and chance,
Fresh as the morning, though in centuries old;
The whitest lily in the shield of France,
With heart of virgin gold."

The Seventh Lecture leads us on to "Savonarola and the Renaissance;" and the Eighth presents "Luther and the Reformation," contrasted with "Loyola and the Jesuits." Both of these Lectures, while travelling over the well

* "Events and Epochs in Religious History." Twelve Lectures delivered at the Lowell Institute in 1880 by James Freeman Clarke, D.D. Boston: J. R. Osgood and Co., 1881.

It may be well to remind our friends that he has been also the author of "Ten Great Religions," "Common Sense in Religion," "Steps of Belief," "Truths and Errors of Orthodoxy," "Self-Culture," "Exotics," "The Doctrine of Prayer," "The Hour That Now Is," "Biographical Sketches," "The Legend of Thomas Didymus," &c.

beaten highways of modern history, offer vistas into many unexhausted domains of thought, which it would be pleasant to explore, if space permitted.

The Ninth and Tenth awakening Lectures, are on "The Mystics in all Religions," and "George Fox and the Quakers." The range of suggestion opened in these two surveys of some of highest mountain-peaks of piety, above the perpetual snow line of speculative thought, may be inferred when it is stated that the author leads us from the Mystics of Asia, Persia, and the Alexandrian Platonists, to the Mediaeval Mystics, Jacob Boehme, as well as Madame Guion, Fénelon, and the Quietists, and Swedenborg, &c. And he gives us also quite a full biographical and critical description of the Quaker Movement from George Fox downward, to the latest views of this wonderful religious experience, as judged by such diversely endowed "discerners of spirits" as George Bancroft the historian, the Catholic Moehler, F. D. Maurice, and the Poet Whittier.

The course closes with two most enlightened and quickening Lectures,—the Eleventh on the Huguenots,—and the Twelfth on John Wesley and his Times,—which we can scarcely bear to pass by in silence. Few heartier tributes of honour have been rendered anywhere than can be found here to the glorious band of religious heroes, whom in an evil hour infatuated France drove into exile to enrich foreign lands with the genius, devotedness, gallantry, chivalry, and refined culture of her elect sons and daughters. And probably no more cordial, sympathetic and delicately appreciative, while impartially just estimate of the Wesleys and of Methodism has ever been given within the narrow space of thirty-four pages than can be found in this Lecture. But the limits of our review are last reached.

Dr. Clarke closes his rich volume with these inspiring words:—

In these lectures I have endeavoured to enforce one idea, taught us in history, namely, that no historic event is so important as the advent of a Conviction—of a New Truth. I have tried to show the power of such convictions in the human soul to build up institutions, to change the course of events, and to alter the tendencies of human affairs; and that among all convictions there are none so strong, permanent and unconquerable as religious convictions. These lives make new for us, in every age, the immortal words of the Scriptures concerning those who "look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen," knowing that "the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal."

Cannot some English publisher be found who, while the author is among us, will make the needed arrangements for an English edition of these "Events and Epochs in Religious History"? W. H. C.

LYDGATE CHAPEL.—The above chapel having been closed for two Sundays for painting, cleaning and beautifying, the morning services were held in the school-room, and in the evenings the Rev. B. Glover delivered two lectures in the Town Hall, Holmfirth, on the following subjects: "Why Man Wants Religion, and what sort of religion he wants," and "Common Sense in Religion." The room was crowded on both occasions. A large number of the inhabitants of Holmfirth hold Unitarian views, but it is only occasionally they hear a Unitarian sermon or lecture, there being no Unitarian place of worship in that town. On Sunday, May 14, the chapel was re-opened, the services being conducted by the Rev. B. Glover. In the evening the chapel was quite full, when many of the Holmfirth friends were present.

AVONDALE-ROAD CHAPEL, PECKHAM.—The annual sermon on behalf of the Sunday-school was preached on the 21st May by Mr. Carter, in the new school-room, which was tastefully decorated with beautiful flowers, contributed chiefly by Unitarian friends at Tenterden, but to which the members of the congregation made also no small addition. Most noteworthy among the floral decorations was a beautiful wreath of choice white flowers placed around the memorial tablet to Mr. Samuel Sharpe. The schoolroom was filled with a large gathering, the Sunday-school children attending and taking part in the service, under the direction of their superintendent, Mr. A. V. Griffin. The result of the collection was £3.

Reviews.

Memories of Old Friends; being Extracts from the Journals and Letters of Caroline Fox, of Penjerrick, Cornwall, from 1835 to 1871. Edited by Horace N. Pym. Second Edition. Smith, Elder and Co. 1882.

Until the publication of the first edition of this book but few persons probably knew of the existence of Caroline Fox. And yet she was the friend of such men as Mill, Carlyle, Bunsen, Sedgwick, John Sterling, C. Kingsley, and F. D. Maurice. But she never occupied a prominent place in the world of letters, and there is no reason to suppose that the "journals" were written with a view to publication; this, indeed, lends to them an additional charm. The editor has made a selection, covering a period of thirty-six years, from her journals and letters, the first entry being made when Miss Fox was only sixteen years of age. From a memoir written by the editor we learn that Caroline Fox was one of the three children of Robert Were Fox, who came of a fine old Quaker lineage. He was well known to scientific men, being "eminent for his researches on the temperature, and the magnetic and electrical condition of the interior of the earth, especially in connection with the formation of mineral veins, and was further the inventor of some, and the improver of other instruments." The invention referred to was the "Deflector Dipping Needle," which has since been used in all the Arctic expeditions. He lived partly at Falmouth and partly at Penjerrick, which is about three miles from that town; it was at the former place that Caroline was born. She is described "as a child" by a friend of the family—Mrs. Schimelpenninck—as "quick, bright, and susceptible, with little black, laughing eyes, a merry round face, and as full of tricks and pranks as a marmozet, or Shakspeare's Robin Goodfellow." Being of a delicate constitution, she was not sent to school, but received her education at the hands of her mother, aided by the best masters obtainable. Her education, however, was far from being completed when she ceased to be under the care of these masters, her extensive and discriminating reading stimulating her to the study of subjects often regarded as too abstruse for the feminine mind. She was, however, not a mere reader or student, but an active worker wherever the claims of the poor and the sick awoke her sympathies. The editor calls attention to the gradual growth of character that these journals unfold, the earlier entries showing the sprightliness of youth, those later on the more serious thoughts of one who had acquired some knowledge of the world, and the still later ones the deeper, and perhaps pathetic, views of one who had lost many a loved friend, and felt herself hastening onward to the "Going-hence." There is a passage in a manuscript found in her desk after her death, written when she was but twenty-one years of age, describing the condition of her mind in the previous year. She says:—

Carlyle admirably expresses my state of mind when he speaks of the spasmodic efforts of some to believe that they believe. But it would not do; I felt I was playing a dishonest part with myself, and with my God. I fully believed in Christ as a mediator and exemplar, but I could not bring my reason to accept him as a Saviour and Redeemer. What kept me at this time from being a Unitarian was that I retained a perfect conviction that though I could not see into the truth of the doctrine, it was nevertheless true; and that if I continued earnestly and sincerely to struggle after it, by prayer, reading, and meditation, I should one day be permitted to know it for myself. . . . The first gleam of light, "the first cold light of morning," which gave promise of day with its noontide glories, dawned on me one day at meeting, where I had been meditating on my state in great depression. I seemed to hear the words articulated in my spirit, "Live up to the light thou hast; and more will be granted thee." Then I believed that God speaks to man by His spirit. I strove to live a more Christian life, in unison with what I knew to be right, and looked for brighter days; not forgetting the blessings that are granted to prayer.

A little later on she was walking along "sorrowfully and thoughtfully," the thought came to her, "I know that he (Christ) is the Redeemer of all such as believe in him; and I will believe, and look for his support in the contest with unbelief." Immediately her doubts and difficulties became shadowy, and her mind was full of happy anticipations of speedy and complete deliverance from them. In 1855 she wrote:—

And now I must add a later conviction, namely, that the voluntary sacrifice of Christ was not undertaken to appease the wrath of God, but rather to express his infinite love to his creatures, and thus to reconcile them unto himself. Every species of sacrifice meets, and is glorified in him; and he claims from his children, as a proof of their loyalty and love, that perfect subjection of their own wills to his, of which self-sacrifice he is the eternal pattern; and bestows the will and the power to be guided only by himself.

A few years before her death she made an entry in her journal which also throws some light upon her spiritual condition. She had just recovered from an attack of bronchitis, and desired to record her "sense of the tender mercy that has encompassed me day and night." She says:—

Though it may have been in part my own wilfulness and recklessness that brought it on, that and all else was pardoned, all fear of suffering or death was swallowed up in the childlike joy of trust; a perfect rest in the limitless love and wisdom of a most tender Friend, whose will was far dearer to me than my own. That blessed presence was felt just in proportion to the needs of the hour, and the words breathed into my spirit were just the most helpful ones at the time, strengthening and soothing. This was specially felt in the long still nights, when sometimes I felt very ill: "Never less lonely than when thus alone—alone with God." Surely I know more than ever of the reality of that declaration, "This is life eternal, that they might know Thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent." I write all this now, because my feelings are already fading into commonplace, and I would fain fix some little scrap of my experience. I had before been craving for a little more spiritual life on any terms, and how mercifully this has been granted; and I can utterly trust that in any extremity that may be before me the same wonderful mercy will encompass me, and of mere love and forgiving compassion carry me safely into port.

It would be a mistake to imagine from these extracts, that in these volumes we have the record of one of those introspective existences, which shock, rather than stimulate, the religious sense. On the contrary, the journals teem with brightness and cheerfulness, and fully bear out the references made to the family in Carlyle's life of John Sterling. "At Falmouth Sterling had been warmly welcomed by the well-known Quaker family of the Foxes, principal people in that place, persons of cultivated opulent habits, and joining to the fine purities and pieties of their sect a reverence for human intelligence in all kinds; to whom such a visitor as Sterling was naturally a welcome windfall. The family had grave elders, bright cheery younger branches, men and women; truly amiable all after their sort; they made a pleasant image of home for Sterling in his winter exile." And further on he adds, "Something like proficiency in certain branches of science, as I have understood, characterised one or more of this estimable family; love of knowledge, taste for art, wish to consort with wisdom and wise men, were the tendencies of all; to opulent means superadd the Quaker beneficence, Quaker purity and reverence, there is a circle in which wise men also may love to be." In the journal there is a reference made to a conversation with Sterling "about Friends." She says that "we are the first he ever encountered; he had formed a very incorrect notion of them, conceived that they never smiled—a slight mistake." And certainly Miss Fox gives plenty of evidence to dissipate any such notion. She had evidently a keen sense of the humorous, and many are the amusing anecdotes she tells which show this. Here is one of Professor Airy, who "was so shy that he never looked a person in the face."

A friend remarked to him, "Have you ever observed Miss ———'s eyes? They have the principle of double refraction." "Dear me, that is very odd," said the philosopher. "I should like to see scribable change and growth he experienced when he made the discovery that what was right for others might not be right for him. Talked of life not being all fun, though there is a great deal of fun in it. His view of Goethe's character is a refined selfishness, but then he added, with a sincere modesty, "Sterling used to say the same sort of things of Goethe as I do now, and as he is always making progress, I fully believe that he is right in his enthusiasm, though I cannot now sympathise with it. He says that 'Hermann and Dorothea' make you love Goethe; I confess that I never met with anything yet which had that effect on me." He is greatly relieved at having finished his "Logie," and is going to mark the best passages for me with notes of admiration. He said, "My family have no idea how great a man I am!" He is now saving up his holidays for a third journey to Italy; he had serious hopes of an illness in the winter, but was conscientious enough not to encourage it! He is inclined to agree with Wordsworth in the defence of capital punishments, but I am glad to say has not quite made up his mind. He thinks Carlyle intolerant to no class but metaphysicians; owing to his entire neglect of this mode of thought, he is persistently floored by Sterling in argument. Carlyle is not getting on pleasantly with his work on the civil wars; he finds so little standing authority; and the mode of revolutionary thought then was so different to what the present age can sympathise with; all its strivings were for immediate results, no high abstract principles apparently influenced them—except transiently. John Mill had designed writing a work on the French Revolution, when he heard of Carlyle's purpose, and accordingly made over his books of reference to him; the world has also been deprived of a history of Greece from his pen, because Thirlwall was just beforehand with him.

We have marked several passages for quotation, indeed nearly every page presents us with some noteworthy thought or story, but we must impose a limit on ourselves. Our readers, however, will, we know, forgive us if we transfer some of these excerpts to our columns. All that we have hitherto quoted are from the first volume. The second is equally rich. Here is a charming reflection. "How I like things to be done quietly and without fuss. It is the fuss and bustle principle which must proclaim itself until it is hoarse, that wars against Truth and Heroism. Let truth be done in silence 'till it is forced to speak," "and then should it only whisper, all those whom it may concern will hear." And the spirit of the following leaves nothing to be desired:—"No news from Barclay. Well, silence is doubtless safe, and patience is good for us. I think Heaven will bless him, but how, it does not suit me even to wish. I've no notion of giving hints to Providence." She went to Norwich, and paying a cottage visit saw a young woman whose father was nearly converted, and she with a touch of humour records the saying of the daughter, "He quite believes that he is lost, which, of course, is a great consolation to the old man!" She goes to an infant school, and "wrote in the visitors' report book, that as many eminent men were very stupid at school, there was every hope for the sixty-three there."

Of Emerson she says, "He evidently writes from experience, not hearsay, and that gives the earnest tone which must awaken echoes in every heart which is not limited to formulas; even though much which he says may not be true to you, yet you feel that to him it is Divine truth." At the same time she records Maurice's opinion of him, "as possessing much reverence and little humility." She mentions a visit to Francis W. Newman, "a thin, acute-looking man, oddly simple, almost quaint in his manner, but with a sweetness in his expression which I had not at all expected." Froude she describes as "a very thoughtful young man, with a wonderful talent for reading lives in written characters." The present Mr. Justice Fry is referred to as "very pleasant and unaffected by all his learning and college success." Elihu Burritt is "a natural gentleman, and seems to have attained the blessed point of self-forgetfulness, springing from ever-present remembrance of better things." George Dawson was "a little, black-eyed, black-haired, atrabilious-looking man, full of energy and intensity, with an air of despising, if not defying, the happiness which he wished to make us all independent of." Of our present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster we read, "John Bright is great fun, always ready for a chat and a fulmination, and filling up the interval of business with 'Paradise Regained.' . . . One likes to have his opinion on men and things, as it is strong, clear, and honest, however one-sided."

Here is an amusing story:—

A damsel belonging to Barclay's establishment being here I thought it right "to try and do her good;" so I asked her, after many unsuccessful questions, if she had not heard of the Lord's coming into the world. "Why," she said, "I may have done so, but I have forgot it." "But surely you must have heard your master read about it, and heard of it at school and church and chapel." "Very likely I have," said she placidly, "but it has quite slipped my memory!" And this uttered with a lamb-like face and a mild blue eye.

Writing in 1846 she speaks of the name she gives to her religious principles, "Quaker-Catholicism," which she describes as "having direct spiritual teaching for its distinctive dogma, yet recognising the high worth of all other forms of faith and system, in the sense of inclusion, not exclusion; an appreciation of the universal, and various teachings of the Spirit, through the faculties given us, or independent of them." With this extract we close our review of these two very interesting volumes. It is these principles that pervade the whole of the entries in the journals and the letters to friends which are to be found in the second volume, and which give such a charm to them. It is not simply that Caroline Fox was privileged to be the friend of great men, but that she has given us the benefit of those privileges, in a spirit of liberal Christianity, and that she has not set down aught in malice, or indulged in petty tattle, that make these records so valuable, and lay the reading public under a debt of gratitude to their editor.

R. B.

Literary Notes.

THE REV. LEONARD HASSE, of Heckmondwyke, has undertaken to write the history of the Moravian Church in Yorkshire, towards which his father has made extensive notes.

THE Historical Committee of the General Assembly of the Irish Presbyterian Church have resolved to publish the extant minutes of the Synod of Ulster, which are complete in MS. from the Revolution of 1688 to the Union of the Synods in 1829.

THE Academy says that the two first volumes of Professor Knight's edition of Wordsworth are in the press; but, owing to the discovery of important details, illustrative of the poems of 1801, 1802, and 1803, chiefly derived from the MS. journals of Dorothy Wordsworth, the publication is delayed for a few weeks.

PROFESSOR SHELDON AMOS has in the press a volume entitled "The Science of Politics," which will be published in the "International Scientific Series" as a companion volume to his well-known "Science of Law."

THE June number of the Century will print an unpublished poem by Longfellow, consisting of a single verse, which the editor recognised above a rustic well at Shanklin, in the Isle of Wight.

MR. CHARLES LELAND will shortly publish, at Boston, a volume embodying his studies of gipsy life and character in Europe and the United States.

THE Queen of Roumania has published under her usual pseudonym, Carmen Sylva, a novel entitled "Ein Gebet" (Berlin).

PRINCE KRAPOTKINE is preparing a second article on the "Russian Revolution" for the Fortnightly Review. He will also write the chief Russian articles for the new edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

MR. SWINBURNE's new volume, "Tristram of Lyonesse, and other Poems," will be published in two or three weeks.

"NATURAL RELIGION," the work on which the author of "Eve Homo" has been so long engaged, will be issued by Messrs. Macmillan and Co. next week.

PROFESSOR JOHN FISKE, of Harvard, contributes an article on Mr. Darwin to the June number of the Atlantic Monthly.

BOURNEMOUTH.—The Rev. Alfred Hood has accepted a cordial invitation to continue the services which are being held in the Town Hall Buildings.

Correspondence.

THE IRISH CRISIS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—How can the friends of Ireland read such letters as that of Mr. Rylet and repress a groan of despair? Here in this crisis of the nation's life, when the sister kingdoms are for a moment drawn together, and the best hearts of both are throbbing with a common shame and a common sorrow; when the pacification of the country hinges on the line which shall be adopted by the popular leaders on both sides of the Channel, Mr. Rylet bursts through the solemnity of the hour to utter a shrill warwhoop of exultation over what he regards as the triumph of the League.

As to the tragedy of the 6th of May he is silent, and that though it is his bounden duty, I say, as a would-be leader of Irish opinion, nay more, as one whose mission to Ireland was to preach the Gospel of Christ, to denounce this new generation of vipers with at least the zeal with which he erst assailed England. A blood-stained shadow hangs over the Land League. It remains for them to show by word and deed that they have neither part nor parcel in common with the men whose policy has been and now is,

"Patriæ validas in viscera vertite vires."

But, to pass from what ought to have been said, we may concern ourselves with what is said. The policy of the future, which is brandished in our faces, is bifurcated, but very simple, viz., The Abolition of Landlordism and National Independence.

As to the former, let us have a clear understanding. John Stuart Mill—save the mark!—is pressed into the service of the League on the strength of a very platitude of political economy. "The land of Ireland, the land of every country, belongs to the people." I cannot congratulate Mr. Rylet on his ingenuousness. I am loth to accuse any man of suggestio falsi; but at any rate he cannot escape the charge of suppressio veri. He stoops to one of the paltriest devices of the hack journalist, and suppresses the context. Read what follows:—"The individuals called landlords have no right in morality or justice to anything but the rent, or compensation for its saleable value." Now, the Irish tenant-farmer is not a student of Political Economy. When he is told by a leader in Israel that the land is the people's, he construes it by the light of the idea that is rooted in Irish breasts—that the land of Ireland belongs to the Irish, and them alone; that the English landlord is a usurper; that he is there by no righteous title; that he is entitled to nothing, unless it be the £300,000,000 which it was proposed to extract from the pockets of the British taxpayer. Mr. Rylet knows this, and he knows further that Mill's principle was endorsed by the Legislature last year, but that the interpretation he has fostered will never be while the Union exists.

National independence means an Irish House of Commons. Mr. Rylet appends the saving clause, "on due guarantee being given for the integrity of the Empire." But this, I submit, is the very gist of the matter. Grant ever so much that Irish opinion should have greater weight in the government of Ireland, one axiom remains, and that is that the English people, and they alone, are the judges of what is a due guarantee of the integrity of the Empire. Sooner or later, Ireland will receive that measure of local self-government which Mr. Gladstone long declared to be needful for the whole kingdom. If the popular party will accept that, there are happy days in store for Ireland.

But does the present disposition of the Irish party give any grounds of hope? Already the Extremists are breaking away from Mr. Parnell. Under which banner will the Rev. Harold Rylet range himself? Will he recognise the generous temper of the English nation, which even now refuses to tarry in the good work of reform? We are taunted with an ignorance of Ireland. These men vaunt their own superior knowledge. But are they sure they know England? Do they deny the sacrifices she has made for Ireland? Can they acknowledge the enormous odds to be faced by a Minister who would pass a comprehensive measure of reform? the backslidings of lukewarm adherents? the obstruction and violent animosity of the Tories? their overwhelming strength in the Upper House? Did they hear nothing of the storm of indignation evoked by the savagery of the London Press, the infamous leader in the Times last Monday week?

The English nation is at last emerging from a fool's paradise. They are the worst enemies of Ireland who would close her eyes to the altered attitude of this country. But there are such, and not a few, who devote their energies to keep Irishmen in a fool's paradise of their own, whence the tree of knowledge has been industriously extirpated. While these men hold sway, peace and charity can have no place. They are the Irish difficulty, and no dust that Mr. Rylett throws in eyes can blind us to the truth.

H. W. M.

Manchester, May 18.

THE SUNDAY OPENING DEBATE AND DIVISION.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The debate and division on Mr. Howard's motion on Friday night affords another instance of the constantly-changing position which is taken by members of Parliament on public questions. Sometimes our representatives resent any suggestion that they are returned to the House of Commons as "mere delegates," while at other times, as was the case on Friday night, they think it not incompatible with their dignity to act as delegates at the bidding of a section only of their constituents.

Friday night's division is so opposed to what is known to be the public feeling of the country with regard to the observance of Sunday that many have felt disappointed at the voting on Mr. Howard's motion. The friends of Sunday Reform have no reason to be disheartened at the numerical strength of the majority, seeing that no one had the courage even to suggest that Parliament should close those institutions which are already open on Sundays, and that Mr. Broadhurst had to fall back on Lord Shaftesbury's old amendment to Lord Dunraven's resolution in favour of opening the British Museum and National Gallery until ten o'clock in the evening, Mr. Broadhurst pleading that the invention of the electric light had now made it possible to carry out Lord Shaftesbury's alternative to Sunday opening.

The following is an analysis of the different divisions which have taken place on this question in the House of Commons:—

Year.	Number for. Including Tellers.	Against.	Majority against.
1856	50	378	328
1874	70	273	203
1877	83	231	141
1882	85	210	125

On the actual division, therefore, the majority was reduced by seventeen votes, but a consideration of the following facts is necessary to form a correct estimate of the number of members who support the extension of Sunday opening asked for in Mr. Howard's resolution.

The eighty-five members who voted for Mr. Howard's resolution included two members who opposed the motion in 1877, and, without including those members who are known to be in favour of the resolution but have not hitherto voted on the question, the number of Mr. Howard's supporters would have been 111 but for the absence of Mr. Geo. Anderson, Mr. John Bright, Lord Randolph Churchill, Mr. Joseph Cowen, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Osborne Morgan, Mr. Rathbone, and other members of the present Parliament, who voted for Mr. P. A. Taylor's resolution in 1877.

Regrettable as was the attitude of Mr. Broadhurst towards a movement which is so closely identified with the interests of the industrial population of this country, and imperfect as was his information respecting the opinions and aspirations of English artisans with regard to the utilisation of their weekly leisure day, the member for Stoke certainly asserted his independence in acting in opposition to his constituents after they had most unmistakably declared their convictions to be on the side of Mr. Howard's resolution.

MARK H. JUDGE,
Hon. Sec. of the Sunday Society.

EMERSON AS AGITATOR.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—In your article on Emerson as agitator you have done good service in drawing attention to a side of his character little known by many of his admirers. As I read your article I was reminded of one of the most vigorous of Emerson's poems, which might well have been quoted to illustrate his attitude to the slavery question. The Boston Hymn was read in the Music Hall, Boston, January 1, 1863; it is too long to be reprinted entirely in your columns, but the last few verses may well be introduced for the sake of those who are not as familiar with the poems of Emerson as they are with his essays. The third of the following verses strikes me as very fine:—

But laying hands on another
To coin his labour and sweat,
He goes in pawn to his victim
For eternal years in debt.

To-day unbind the captive,
So only are ye unbound;
Lift up a people from the dust,
Trump of their rescue sound!

Pay ransom to the owner,
And fill the bag to the brim.
Who is the owner? The slave is owner,
And ever was. Pay him.

O North! give him beauty for rags,
And honour, O South! for his shame,
Nevada! Coin thy golden crags
With Freedom's image and name.

Up! And the dusky race
That sat in darkness long,
Be swift their feet as antelopes,
And as behemoth strong.

Glasgow, May 21. FRANK W. WALTERS.

EARLY MARRIAGES.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—In his speech at the annual meeting of the London Domestic Mission last week Dr. Martineau mentioned the case of a young man who had sought assistance from an emigration committee, and who it transpired was but nineteen years of age, though he had a wife and two children. Dr. Martineau seemed to consider that such a person ought not to be helped, and that the young man's views of morality were very different to those which obtained in a higher class, in which we often hear of men never marrying in order that they may support either parent or sister. Without detracting from the merit of these self-denying bachelors, I wish to submit, in the absence of all knowledge of the case, beyond that derived from Dr. Martineau's own narration, that there may have been equal merit on the part of the young man in contracting an early marriage. I by no means advocate these as a rule, but I do think that it is not wise or fair for us indiscriminately to condemn them. I have heard that it is owing to the prevalence of early marriage among the Irish that their women are so exceptionally chaste. I have no means of testing this statement, but I can quite understand that, among the poor especially, early marriage is an escape from a far worse state of things. I suppose that in the middle class if a young girl of sixteen is left without parents there is little difficulty in providing her with some friendly protection till she arrives at an age which in that class is generally regarded as a marrying one. But that is not so among the poor, and a man may be acting a noble and generous part in taking upon himself the legal responsibility of providing for and protecting the girl he loves at an age when prudence would forbid it. It seems to me that at these meetings the persons best qualified to speak upon the duties of the poor, their wants, their helps, and their hindrances are just the persons who, if not conspicuous by their absence, are at least to be numbered among the silent ones. Preachers and moralists deplore the secularism that exists among the working classes, forgetting that much of this is forced upon them by their surroundings, and the hand to mouth existence they live. With them Secularism is not a system of thought, but one of life. And the same is true of political economists, who are very indignant that these classes do not take the same enlarged views that they do, forgetting that the life of these workers leaves very little, if any, room for taking much thought for the morrow. Reverting to the early marriage question, I would say in conclusion, that as prudent citizens we may do our best to discourage them, but that their indiscriminate condemnation may only lead to worse evils.

CIVIS.

THE PLYMOUTH JUBILEE MEETINGS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The report of the recent meetings at Plymouth, given in the last number of the Inquirer, seems to me to require a few words by way of correction. It says, with reference to my son Edwin, that "the reverend gentleman then proceeded to read the sermon written by his father." This is a mistake. My son asked me to write a page or two by way of conveying a friendly message from me to the congregation, which I did; but I did not write a sermon. My son read the short paper which I wrote, and then delivered an appropriate extempore address.

Further, in what I wrote I am reported to have said that "religion was separated from theology, which was almost regarded as a needless thing." What I wrote was, that in recent times men had come to recognise more fully the distinction between religion and theology; but I certainly never said that I "regarded theology as a needless thing." I am very far from thinking so. Indeed, I have a very strong conviction that the importance of "theology," or, in other words, the importance of what we believe to be correct religious opinions, is not by any means so deeply felt, and so earnestly asserted by Unitarians as it deserves to be.

I hold my pen a moment longer for two or three verbal corrections:—

I did not, as your report states, say that "the worship of the Father in spirit and in truth" had not "become to be considered absurd," but that in the course of fifty years the subject of my first sermon at Plymouth "had not become obsolete or unimportant." I did not say that "the worship of the Father" was an "indispensable pleasure," but that Christians of all Churches still considered it to be "man's unquestionable duty and his noblest privilege."

And lastly, I did not say that while at Plymouth I had "tried to love my fellow creatures," but that I had endeavoured to be useful to them.

Hampstead, May 23. W. J. ODGERS.

[The report was taken from a local paper.]

CROYDON.—On Sunday last a special meeting of the Free Christian Congregation in this town was held, to consider the report of the general committee on the proposal to replace the existing iron church by a permanent structure. The committee recommended for adoption the plans prepared by Mr. Connon, of Leeds, in accordance with a design originally drawn by Mr. W. H. Teulon, a member of the congregation. The sum required was £3,900, and the committee proposed to release all intending subscribers from their obligations and to abandon the scheme unless the whole sum were raised within three months from the issue of the formal circular inviting subscriptions. The recommendation of the committee was unanimously adopted, and before the last person left the church £3,120 had already been subscribed. Little anxiety is felt with regard to the remainder, as the sum already raised is prior to the issue of the formal circular above referred to.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk Sold only in Packets labelled—"JAMES EPPS & Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." Also makers of Epps' Chocolate Essence for afternoon use.

Religious Intelligence.

THE LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

The annual meeting of this society was held at the Unitarian Church, Hackney, on Wednesday evening. There was a large attendance, and among others we observed the Revs. C. B. Upton, J. T. Whitehead, R. Spears, T. L. Marshall, Hobart Clarke, H. Ierson, T. Rix, A. B. Camm, J. Wright, F. Summers, J. E. Stead, W. C. Bowie, G. Carter; and Messrs. D. Martineau (treasurer), S. W. Preston and J. Tifford (secretaries), J. T. Preston, F. Collier, S. S. Tayler, H. Jeffery, R. Bartram, R. Keating, W. Tifford, T. Briggs, A. Collier, A. J. Fabritius, I. M. Wade, S. C. Charlesworth (Sheffield), E. S. Anthony, M.A., Alan Whitehead, B.A., &c.

Sir JAMES LAWRENCE on taking the chair said it gave him great pleasure to be there in his place as president. He thought it desirable to look back for a few years as well as to look forward, and to ask the few simple questions which naturally arise when men are acting together for common objects. On referring to some of the early reports and operations, he found that notwithstanding some discouragements there had been beneficial results that might be traced in many directions, which prevented any despondency. The question was whether they deserved success, considering the little interest and earnestness that had been shown with regard to the efforts to establish congregations in different localities. The question arises whether the methods adopted have been those most likely to accomplish the object had in view. Too much was often left to the minister or missionary, forgetful that it was first of all necessary to gather around him a number of sympathising men and women. He feared that they did not always think of the head of the Church as they should, when he saw in various directions ministers preaching on the affirmation of God and the certainty of immortality. This he thought departing from their true work. The existence of God should be assumed, just as the air we breathe, and not attempted to be proved. He had known personally of a rush of inquirers to know what are these new doctrines, and many have gone away disappointed because the minister seemed to have been endeavouring to prove what was already a certainty to his hearers. The very foundation of our effort is the thought that our views can be made clear to all, and be given forth with an enthusiasm which finds its way to all hearts. The knowledge of the truth would not engender a dogmatic or sectarian spirit in any way, and a minister who took this course would gather around him earnest and sympathising spirits, united in spirit, and united in the possession of a rational and scriptural faith. It was time to take stock of ourselves and of our proceedings. In these days we think too little of what is most vital, the preparation of mind, and heart, and soul for our eternal residence in the future life—(applause).

Mr. D. MARTINEAU read the financial statement, which showed that the debt of last year had been wiped off by the appeal then made. The Society began the year with a balance due to the Treasurer of £110, and at present there was a balance in hand of £23. He congratulated them on the amount raised from chapel collections, ten in number, producing £64. He referred with hope to the prospects of the movement at Wandsworth, where the congregation had already taken upon themselves a considerable portion of the expenses. The congregations at Stepney and Stratford were also returning to the funds of the Association a portion of the amounts they had received.

The Committee's Report was read by Mr. S. W. PRESTON:—

The Report began by a reference to the origin of the Society, thirty-two years ago, and the expression of an opinion that whatever necessity there was for such a Society at that time the need exists now to an extent which it is almost impossible for those who do not see the working of such a Society fully to realise. During that period the suburbs of London and the suburban population have increased so largely that the difficulty found by Unitarian families, who from circumstances are compelled to settle in a district in which there is no chapel of our denomination, in attending the one which may be nearest to them, is so great that it too frequently happens that they join some church or chapel of liberal orthodox views, and their young people, almost as a matter of course, grow up in the orthodox faith. The Committee receive constant applications from friends residing in these districts, asking if some means cannot be adopted for holding services in their neighbourhood, and gladly would they have acceded to such wishes if their funds would have allowed them; but with an income from annual subscriptions of only £200 per annum they have had to stand aloof, not daring to involve themselves in pecuniary responsibilities, whilst the support given to them is so utterly inadequate to the requirements. If the Unitarian cause in London is to be sustained with anything like vigour, a chapel with a stated minister ought to be placed in almost every suburb, and there is little fear that many of them would quickly become nearly, if not quite, self-supporting.

Reference was next made to the movement lately commenced in the populous district of Wandsworth, which there is every reason to hope will prove a success, if the services of a stated minister can be obtained. At Deptford also a promising effort has been begun in the General Baptist Chapel, and if funds are provided a missionary will be placed there.

At Stratford a decided increase is reported in the number of members and in the Sunday-school. Stepney continues in a most satisfactory state. At Avondale-road Chapel, Peckham, the Rev. G. Carter and his able band of coadjutors continue their vigorous efforts in building up an active congregation, and hopeful results may be anticipated when the new church is finished.

The report next referred to the death in July last of Mr. Samuel Sharpe, who had shown a deep sympathy with the work carried on by the Society from its commencement, and had been a liberal contributor to its funds. From the warm interest which he took in all measures for the promotion of Unitarian Christianity he has left a place which will not easily be filled.

Two social meetings have been held during the past year, which have been fully reported in these columns.

Courses of Lectures on the Affirmative Views of Unitarianism have been given in several places in the East of London, which have been attended by many, apparently anxious for further information. The report closed with an urgent appeal for largely increased funds, in order to sustain the present efforts and break fresh ground, and expressed the earnest conviction that, furnished with ample means for the support of ministers who would be fitted and ready to devote themselves to the work, such a result would be achieved as would gladden the hearts of all those who desire the spread of views of the Christian religion, where no subscription to any formal creed or dogma is required, and would place the Unitarian cause in London in a very different position to that which it now occupies.

Reports were also read by the two Missionaries of the Association, the Rev. R. Spears, stating that the past year at Stepney had been one of continued prosperity and encouragement, and reporting also favourably of the movement at Deptford. The Rev. J. E. Stead gave a favourable report also respecting Stratford.

Mr. SPEARS, before reading his report, stated that he had information only that evening that there was a fine field for missionary effort at Willesden.

The CHAIRMAN moved:—"That the reports now read be received, adopted and circulated under the direction of the Committee."

Mr. F. COLLIER in seconding the motion spoke of the rapid way in which our opinions were spreading in every direction, even when there was little apparent increase in our congregations. The name Unitarian is very differently regarded now from what it used to be, and in other churches it was not so customary as in former years to hear opinions antagonistic to our own. He thought very considerable work had been done by the Society with very little money, and he urged the meeting to put additional funds in the hands of the Committee.

The Rev. J. T. WHITEHEAD moved, "That this meeting warmly approves of the resolution of the Society to form congregations at Wandsworth and Deptford, and trust that all friends of Liberal Christianity will furnish the Society with means to carry out similar efforts in localities where they are needed." The resolution and the reports plead the cause better than he could, and showed how good a work had been done, how great is the work that remains to be done, and how small an amount is given to do the work. The work done at Notting-hill, Stepney, Peckham and Stratford only reminded us that in other localities the same work is waiting to be done. Our efforts in this direction ought not to be crippled for want of funds.

The Rev. A. B. CAMM, in seconding the resolution, spoke of the phases of thought and life on the border line between the traditional and the liberal faith. Five years ago, when he made the transition from Orthodoxy to Unitarianism, many of his friends shuddered: but now he found that two of these very families go to a Unitarian chapel, although they do not assume the name. These indications show that the work needs more enthusiasm and persistent earnestness. Mr. Seeley, writing in Macmillan's Magazine some years ago, spoke of Milton and Newton as having their attitude towards the rising sun, and he thought that the whole signs of the time indicated that we of the Unitarian faith are also with our faces towards the dawn, and if there are shadows they are passing away before the streaks of new-born day. The more slow progress is the richer and more permanent are often the results. As we watch the utterances of representatives, even at the May meetings, we find ample confirmation of these views. He found in society and in literature the higher thought that denominations have relation to the temporary and individual, and to the various phases of national life—a much broader view than the old theory that each sect had alone the elements of universality. With our three essentials, the fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of humanity in Christ, and the great hope of Immortality, we can well afford to wait. We have to enlighten the prevailing ignorance of our faith. Everything is making in favour of enthusiasm and aggressive effort—(applause).

The Rev. HOBART CLARKE, of Boston, U.S., said that coming as he did from the capital of Unitarianism he felt a great deal of interest in seeing the way in which they were doing their work in this great city. In Massachusetts Unitarians are almost an Established Church, and they have aristocratic congregations. The churches and the sermons were too fine, and the people did not come, but went with the Methodists. Here he saw they were determined to gain all, from the highest to the lowest. He moved that Sir J. C. Lawrence be elected president for the ensuing year, and that the vice-presidents be elected according to the list.

Professor URTON in seconding the resolution thought there never was a time when we had more reason to look forward with hope to the future. The essence of religion to be found in Christianity as interpreted by the individual conscience, was the great message of our Unitarian and Free Christian Churches; and everywhere we have signs that thoughtful men believe that only in Christianity can the soul find its true life. It was destined to be the universal religion, because it alone adapted itself to civilisation, science, and the highest tendencies of the human mind. The effect of this universal Christianity is mischievously counteracted by orthodox dogmas and traditions, and he could not but sympathise with the group of Liberal Churches which were striving to rescue Christianity from its corruptions, and make it known in its pure essence and show what marvellous power it has to regenerate and bless humanity. The late Liverpool Conference shows what unanimity there is amongst us. We are all becoming more at one in building upon the facts of the religious consciousness, and in giving Christ due honour and authority as the purest expression of the will and mind of God, and the inspirer of our religious life. Even the grand Theistic Church in India feels that it must link itself on to Christianity, as alone enabling it to do its divinest work.

Mr. BARTRAM thought it desirable not to elect the same president and vice-presidents year after year, but to go wider afield and endeavour to add representative men of various phases of thought amongst us.

Mr. D. MARTINEAU expressed his approval at having their old friend Sir J. C. Lawrence as President, and said that in selecting the vice-presidents and the committee an effort was always made to obtain gentlemen of various congregations and modes of thought.

The Rev. JOHN WRIGHT moved the appointment of the Treasurer (Mr. D. Martineau) and the Committee for the ensuing year. He felt a deep and increasing interest in the operations of the society, a society for working rather than talking. During the last few months he had seen something of the work of the Society, and so fully convinced was he of its worth that he was glad to have a hand in its work. We must recognise the peculiar position and wants of our suburban population, especially of the Unitarian families who have gone to live in suburbs where there are at present no Unitarian chapels. The large and increasing class of persons nominally in connection with Orthodox Churches but not really in sympathy with them, and gradually drifting away from religion altogether had special claims upon our efforts to give them a religion at once rational, practical and pious. He advocated aggressiveness against superstition, error, and false doctrine in order to spread truth, and aid in promoting the kingdom of God in no sectarian spirit.

Mr. H. EPPS in seconding the resolution referred to the warm interest which the society had taken in Avondale-road Chapel, Peckham, of which he was the secretary, and the good work it had enabled them to accomplish. One reason why Unitarianism had languished was that parents through their extreme but mistaken liberality had not brought up their children in the knowledge of their own faith.

Mr. HENRY JEFFERY moved the re-election of the two secretaries, Mr. Stanton Preston and Mr. Titford, who had so long filled the office with so much satisfaction and advantage to the society.

Mr. WATTS, of Edmonton, seconded the resolution, which like the others was carried unanimously.

Mr. S. S. TAYLER moved that the thanks of the society be given to the minister and committee of the New Gravel Pit Chapel for the use of their building for that meeting. He thanked the ladies also for the hearty hospitality they had given them.

Mr. I. M. WADE seconded the motion, and heartily supported it. He thought they were moving in the right direction, and were not ashamed of the Unitarian name, which for his part he was proud to bear.

A vote of thanks to the chairman, proposed by Mr. MARTINEAU, and seconded by Mr. ALAN WHITEHEAD, B.A., was carried by acclamation, and suitably acknowledged, and the proceedings were then brought to a close.

LEICESTER: WELCOME TO THE REV. J. MODEN.

A meeting of the members of the Free Christian Church was held on Tuesday evening to bid farewell to the Rev. J. C. Lunn, and to welcome the Rev. J. Moden. Tea was provided in the Waterloo-hall. The meeting was held in the chapel. Mr. H. Riley occupied the chair. Among those present were the Revs. J. C. Lunn, J. Moden, J. P. Hopps, and W. Agar (Leicester), R. A. Armstrong (Nottingham), C. H. Wellbeloved (Mansfield), E. P. Hall (Loughborough), and Dr. Laird Collier (Birmingham); Messrs. T. F. Johnson, E. Clephan, E. F. Cooper, T. Pratt, T. Roberts, J. Banbury, J. Cooper, J. Benton, and H. Dale.

The CHAIRMAN cordially welcomed their friends from a distance, and was glad to see members of the Great Meeting congregation who had come to show their sympathy with them as a Church. The purpose for which the meeting was called was twofold. By a conjunction of circumstances, which did not often occur in the history of a Church, they had met to take formal leave of their late minister, as such, and to welcome his successor as their minister for the future. One part of their duty, however, was mitigated by the fact that though they bid Mr. Lunn farewell, as their minister, they hoped to be favoured with the presence of himself and Mrs. Lunn for a long time to come and to have his counsel, and in some measure his guidance in conducting the affairs of the Church. Making a retrospective reference to the history of the church, the Chairman said that it was formed in 1866, so that they were now in their sixteenth year. He hoped that its present age was very young as compared with what it would attain, and that the usefulness it had hitherto achieved was small in comparison with what it would be in utility. Their first minister was the Rev. W. Mitchell, who was succeeded by the Rev. A. Macdonald, who after seven years' ministry gave way to the Rev. J. J. Wright. Although those gentlemen had left them, it was very satisfactory to say that there never had been a single misunderstanding between them and the congregation, and they were at present the firmest friends. With regard to Mr. Wright's successor, Mr. Lunn, he need scarcely speak of his merits, or of what he had done for the church. Under his ministry the church had been transformed, not only as far as external experiences were concerned, but the tone of the people was changed, a better spirit had been introduced, a true religious life had been cultivated. Having spoken of the principles under which their church was conducted, the speaker said that with regard to the future he had great hopes from the introduction of Mr. Moden as the minister. He trusted that that gentleman would carry on the work successfully which had been inaugurated by his predecessor, and that the future of the church would be more successful and worthier than the past had been. He then read letters from Dr. Crosskey, the Rev. V. D. Davis, the Rev. J. Wood, and Mr. E. Roberts, the treasurer, who regretted being unable to be present.

Mr. PRATT said he could heartily endorse the whole of the remarks of the Chairman in the graceful tribute he had paid to Mr. Lunn. When they knew something of the real characteristics of an individual they were able to form an approximate estimate of the nature of the work which he would likely attempt, if not actually achieve. It was apparent from the first that in Mr. Lunn they had a gentleman who possessed deep religious convictions, one of high personal character, sound judgment, culture, and experience. It was, therefore, natural to expect he would earnestly and vigorously attempt to make his religious convictions vital in the church in which he was to minister. They knew how heartily, generously, and efficiently that work had been done. They remembered the pecuniary circumstances of the congregation when their late minister entered upon his duties in that place. Most of them knew that the church was almost upon the verge of dissolution at that time. They were well acquainted with the help he had given of a pecuniary kind as well as of an intellectual and a spiritual character. In fact he had shown his interest in the church in every possible way. His aim was to build up a congregation of truly religious, worshipping men and women. They could assure him of their appreciation of his work, and they thanked him most sincerely for all his services. They had also to thank most cordially Mrs. Lunn for her readings of original poetry and for her lectures on art in the week evening classes; and, indeed, for great sympathy and real interest in the life of the church. They were exceedingly sorry they had now to say to them an affectionate farewell.

Mr. T. ROBERTS wished to say that he fully agreed with what Mr. Pratt had said of their late minister. He would bear his testimony to the fact, that the longer they had known Mr. Lunn they had liked him the better. He desired to thank him for the good he had done to the Church.

Mr. BANBURY said he felt that he ought not to let that opportunity pass without a few words. Mr. Lunn had been to them a friend, for he came to their assistance when they needed help. He had made great personal sacrifices for their good. The work he had done they should think about in years to come. They should think about him when they read those words on that wall, for he taught them to "worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness." Mr. Lunn would be remembered by them through the lessons he taught in the week evening classes, by the thorough manner in which he lectured upon pure mathematics, poetry, and English composition, and upon other subjects most interesting and instructive. Their late minister's great desire was to raise the moral tone of that Church. He referred to these things because they had made lasting impressions on his mind. In return for what had been received, silver and gold he had none to give, but such as he had he freely offered, and that was the deepest feeling of gratitude which he possessed, and a genuine wish for his future welfare. He would pray that "length of days might be in his right hand, and in his left riches and honour."

Mr. J. COOPER, the Superintendent of the Sunday-school, presented Mr. Lunn, in his own name and in the name of the teachers, a finely executed photograph of eighteen teachers. He hoped that picture would call to mind those who had worked together in such a genuine spirit, and tell for many a day to come of a friendship which steadily grew as the years passed on.

The CHAIRMAN, on behalf of the congregation, gave Mrs. Lunn a portrait of her husband.

The Rev. C. H. WELLBELOVED, as a minister of the North Midland District, spoke of Mr. Lunn's retirement from a congregation of their Association.

Mr. LUNN thanked his friends for their kind words, and for the presentations to Mrs. Lunn and himself. He said Mr. Moden was entering into a very different sphere of life and labour to that which he had entered into. Many changes, as had been said, had taken place since he became their minister. Then he told them that he did not mean to enter into any political arena, or to turn the pulpit into a rostrum, though he believed as much as any of them in politics, and was as anxious as any person in Leicester for the growth of literature, philosophy, and science. He considered, however, that the chapel was for the worship of God and for religious teaching only. There was a school-room now, where lectures might be given on week evenings, on science, philosophy and art; and lessons on all kinds of kindred subjects. Much had been done lately in this place for improvement and progress. It was true that the chapel had not a great deal of church architecture, though it had enough to show that it was now a Church. It was at present all sufficient for every theological and religious purpose, everything which an earnest congregation needed, that came to worship in truth and spirit, and to seek spiritual life. To a large general committee there had been added three honorary members, who were subscribers, but who were members of another congregation. There was also a General Purposes Committee and a committee of ladies. A series of rules for all practical purposes was passed, and now the old Trust-deed, which was as difficult to understand as the Athanasian Creed, was allowed to rest in peace. That church was still a necessity of the town. The time is not past for the advocacy of their theological theories. Multitudes still required to be told of the love and mercy of God—that Jesus became a Saviour through his own inherent truthfulness and holiness—and that all the children of men were heirs of everlasting blessedness. Many who declared that they were free born were still under the influence of Ecclesiastical decrees. And, if the leading ministers in all the churches had taken a departure from the popular creeds, as they were reported to have done, they were slow to make the revelation to their congregations. They were silent about the Trinity, Total Depravity, Vicarious Atonement, and Everlasting Punishment. They of that Church were to be true to their convictions if they were to be the worthy followers of men whom they delighted to honour. The Rev. Charles Berry and the Rev. Robert Hall were not silent in their day and generation. Of course moral, religious, and spiritual subjects would claim and have the greatest attention; the morality which is righteousness, the religion which is of love and mercy, and the spirituality which is direct communion with the highest and holiest One. Their churches need enthusiasm. And if their young people were well directed, this would come. There was a quiet, unassuming work too, of which few people heard, that told for the Christian life. Cottage services had been a blessing to many. They had led to family praise and prayer and had been a means to increase their congregations. They need not expect great and immediate popularity; but, that want of popularity did not come of their theology or their religion, but of the crass ignorance of the people and of their love of excitement. Scripture Lessons, Hymns, Anthems, and Sermons, Dedication and Communion services, had a grand work to do for the world, but the intense life of a Christian Church came from its worship. As prayer was the greatest privilege it was the divinest influence. Through it churches grew into the perfectness which was of God.

Mr. J. W. BURTON gave to the Rev. J. Moden a hearty welcome as minister, pastor, and leader of that church. More, however, than a warm welcome would be needed. Co-operation would be required in the work which would have to be done in that place, as it would be of a multifarious character. He ventured to say that help would be forthcoming when there was a demand for it. No doubt the various duties of the church would be congenial to the nature of their new minister. They were aware that the services every Sunday and the preparation for them would entail a large amount of time; but they trusted that he would also give them his counsel and help in the other undertakings which they carried on as a congregation. They could not pretend to be a people of wealth or leisure, as they were all actively engaged in business, but though their secular callings made incessant demands upon them, they were all willing to give their time and means in furtherance of the good cause of their Free Christian Church. He trusted that the minister would never have any cause to complain of their lack of interest. He was sure there would be no want of help on their part to show the people of Leicester that Unitarian Christianity had as much religious vitality as so-called Orthodoxy, and was as divine a faith as the faith of any church in Christendom. If they should be found wanting in any duty, they looked to their minister to direct them, and if they were deficient in zeal they trusted he would stimulate them. It was in the spirit of trust, and with hearts full of confidence in the future, that they gave their sincerest welcome.

Mr. CHATTAWAY and Mr. H. DALE having spoken to the same effect, the Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG also addressed the meeting, making special reference to the work of the Rev. J. P. Hopps in the Temperance Hall during the past season, and welcoming Mr. Moden on the part of the ministers of the North Midland District. The Rev. J. MODEN replied, expressing his desire to merit the good opinion which seemed now to be entertained respecting him, and his intention to follow as far as he could in the footsteps of his predecessor.

Mr. T. F. JOHNSON next spoke, paying a tribute to the energy and the success attained by Mr. Lunn in connection with the church, and expressing the belief that there was now a good future for the congregation.

Mr. E. CLEPHAN, as one of those who were present at the "christening" of the church sixteen years ago, had much pleasure in taking part in its "confirmation." He spoke of the circumstances which led to the establishment of the church, and traced its history up to the present time. He was one of those who had a hand in its foundation, being at the time thoroughly convinced that it was necessary in the town. He congratulated them on the work they had hitherto accomplished, and wished them God-speed for the future.

Dr. COLLIER, the Rev. J. P. HOPPS, Mr. E. F. COOPER, and other speakers followed. The choir sang an anthem and some hymns very effectively during the evening, and after a cordial vote of thanks to the chairman, the meeting was closed in the usual manner.

BRISTOL.—On Thursday evening, May 18, the annual soirée of the united congregations of Lewin's-mead and Oakfield-road Chapels took place at the Lesser Colston-hall, when upwards of four hundred of the members of the congregations and their friends were present. From six o'clock till half-past seven tea was served and a promenade concert was given by Mr. R. T. Ward's band, who played an attractive selection of music. The platform was decorated with plants, and in front was a series of coloured engravings issued by the Arundel Society, and kindly lent by Mrs. Thomas Thomas. On the walls and upon tables round the room were varied collections of photographs and engravings lent by Mr. C. J. Thomas, Mr. Herbert Thomas, Mr. Arthur Jones, Mr. Leipner, the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, and others. Messrs. Husbands, the well-known opticians of St. Augustine's-parade, sent a large collection of scientific instruments, including a dozen microscopes, kaleidoscope, with specimens, two galvanic batteries, which provoked much amusement; an interesting scientific toy, the "harmonograph," for tracing curves; specimens of Australian ferns, &c. The Rev. T. Hincks, late of Leeds, lent for exhibition the last autograph letter that Dr. Priestley wrote before leaving England, alluding in a Christian spirit to the reasons for his departure. Mr. Robert Bruce kindly contributed a set of sketches in oils and water-colours by his father, the late Mr. Robert Bruce, of Frenchay and Clifton; Mr. William Butcher, collection of Indian curiosities; Mr. G. W. Champion, portfolio of water-colour drawings; Mr. Harris, microscopes, with other objects of interest. Amongst those present were the Revs. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., W. Hargrave, M.A., J. Collins Odgers, B.A., T. Hincks, Messrs. Charles Thomas, Leipner, Harry E. Thomas, W. Butcher, Desprez, &c. After tea there was a concert given by the joint choirs, conducted by Mr. J. Y. Pearce, and at intervals short speeches were made by the Revs. A. N. Blatchford, W. Hargrave, and Collins Odgers.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.—The Treasurer of the London Domestic Mission heartily thanks the ministers and committees of the following chapels for again holding the annual collection for the society; with this welcome result:—Brixton, £32 2s.; Croydon, £10 6s. 4d.; Hackney, £9 4s. 7d.; Hampstead, £24 18s. 8d.; Kentish Town, £9 0s. 1d.; Little Portland-street, £18 15s.; total, £104 6s. 8d.

The Liberal Pulpit.

THE MISSION OF UNITARIANISM.

BY THE REV. R. HEBER NEWTON.

[The following remarkable sermon was preached by the Episcopalian minister of Anthon Church, New York, a Sunday or two after the death of his friend the Rev. Dr. Bellows. We print it with a few immaterial omissions.]

"The hour cometh and now is when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and truth; for such doth the Father seek to be his worshippers. God is spirit; and they that worship him must worship in spirit and truth."—JOHN IV. 23, 24.

Dean Stanley once gave this direction for the study of systems of belief: "Look at Augustinianism as it arose in the mind of Augustine, at Lutheranism as it was conceived by Luther, at Wesleyanism as it was set forth by Wesley. It will cease to be a phantom, it will speak to us as a man. If it is an enemy, we shall slay it more easily; if a friend, we shall embrace it more warmly."

This counsel holds a principle capable of an even wider application than that made by the noble student, himself so signal an illustration of its wisdom. Systems of belief are best studied, indeed, in the lives of their founders; they are well studied, however, in the lives of leaders other than the original founders. They are rightly studied only under the light of the strong personalities who have lived in them and made them vital; only when they cease to be "isms," the abstractions which the scholar defends or attacks in the library, and become the inspiring faiths of lofty and holy lives.

When a leader falls from the ranks of any branch of the Christian Church we seem summoned to study the convictions on which that great man fed his soul, for which he spent his intensest energies. Death hushes strife. Over the grave prejudices vanish. In a holy life men feel instinctively the welling up of the one Spring and Fount of all Goodness. The admiration for the man prompts to a juster admeasurement of the phase of religion he embodied. Providence thus places us in the attitude where best the Spirit of Truth may teach us what vital words, proceeding out of the mouth of God, on which men may live, were voiced in the "ism," which for the moment melts into the man confessed to be a Son of God.

A year ago we studied thus together, over the grave of Dr. Chapin, "The Mission of Universalism." To-day, in concluding my simple tribute to Dr. Bellows, I ask you to consider "The Mission of Unitarianism in American Christianity."

Dr. Bellows was perhaps the most conspicuous figure in this denomination, the man who, from a rare combination of gifts and circumstances, became its best known representative, its acknowledged mouth-piece of singular eloquence, its organising head of commanding power, its inspiring heart, pulsing through every member of this not too-well-compacted body the tides of his restless energy, of his exhaustless enthusiasm. In so far as such a sturdy band of independents could admit of a bishop, he was a true Episcopopus, with a more substantial sway than many learned dignitaries on whom all the grace of Apostolic Succession has not succeeded in bestowing a real rulership. Too large a man to be shut up in any "ism," he was yet with intelligent conviction and profound earnestness Unitarian; consecrating the finest of his fine powers and the utmost of his tireless zeal to the advancement of Unitarian beliefs.

It is no mere idle study of the dilettante in religion, no curious conning of a fine specimen of a well-marked species of theology, to which I invite you to-day, but the earnest study of men who want to have an intelligent comprehension of the significance of the various phases of our "Common Christianity," to use again a word of Stanley, to the end that they may not miss the leadings of the Infinite Spirit of Truth, who is guiding the world, surely though slowly, into the religion of the future, seen by the far-mirroring eyes of the Christ; wherein men are to worship God, neither on this mountain nor yet at Jerusalem, but, since he is spirit, in spirit and truth. To win unto this large light rising beyond, we need to rid ourselves of superstitions, of prejudices, of fears, and learn humbly at the feet of all strong minds devoted to truth, of all strong souls devoted to goodness.

Unitarianism is no very new ism in Christendom.

It has existed in separate congregations in England ever since the Reformation. It is to be found as opinions among the various churches of England during this same period, at times bidding fair to develop into large proportions, and seriously alarming all orthodox authorities. At the Reformation, its ideas and principles were far more widely spread than is generally imagined, and, but for what we call chance, would have assumed very influential proportions in the new life of Europe. It did actually take control of a considerable section of Eastern Europe, where it has continued the dominant form of faith to this day. It is traceable up through the Middle Ages, in the persons of great schoolmen, and reappears in early Christianity under various forms. Arianism, the view of the person of the Christ which promised at one time to become the orthodox doctrine of the Catholic Church, was a phase of Unitarianism. The whole period prior to the Council of Nice may be regarded as the Unitarian epoch of Christianity, during which the predominant opinion, however highly it exalted the Christ, stopped short of the ascription of proper deity to him. The whole Jewish section of the early Church was uncompromisingly Unitarian on this article of faith. And the general principles which underlie this special doctrine of Unitarianism, as all its other beliefs, are indubitably found, at least germinally, in no less an authority than Paul of Tarsus.

That religion can safely disengage itself when needful from the swaddling-clothes of institutions, and freely fashion for itself a new body of dogmas; that it is essentially spiritual; that it must be rational as well as reverent, must root in philosophy and science in order that it may burgeon and blossom into true worship—the epistles of the great heresiarch, to whom we chiefly owe it that Christianity is a successful schism from Judaism, labour to establish according to the knowledge of his age and in the vocabulary of his race.

But from this vast area let us draw back within the more compassable field of our own American Unitarianism; in understanding which, we shall interpret the various historic phases of this "ism" at least well enough to be just and charitable toward it.

If we could carry ourselves back to New England in the opening of the present century, we should find ourselves in a theologic climate which would seem ages removed from our era, a lingering relic of the glacial period of religion.

The flamboyant metaphysics of decadent Greece had wrought the framework of Christian theology, into which the superstition and savagery of senile Rome had breathed its spirit. The ignorance of the Dark Ages, finding no healthy external knowledge on which to feed, had turned inward upon this metaphysic, and Mediæval Scholasticism had spun the folds of a system as strong as subtle, in which reason and conscience lay hopelessly meshed. The Reformation did not effectually burst the gossamer-iron of this theology, and its intense spiritual experience recast itself in the molds of this tyrannous system. Puritanism worked over again, under the stress of a morbidly developed conscience, this essentially heathenish philosophy; and the result was the theology which landed from the "Mayflower" to seed down a new world.

We have no difficulty in rehabilitating the already obsolete theology which throned itself upon the brain of the Western world, New England. It exists as a curious fossil in our theological museums—the venerable Westminster Confession; secure against any unnecessary disturbance at the hands of its clerical custodians, and against any impatient demands for its inspection from the populace. But, in the opening of our century, this ghostly document was a living power, a grim shape of terror and oppression, which preached from the pulpit, wrote the hymns, presided at the prayer-meeting, led the family worship, frowned above the secular shelves of the library, haunted all life. Let me recall to you this remarkable system into which our nineteenth century was expected to pour its fresh, free thought contentedly.

At the basis of this system was posited a theory of the Bible still familiar to us.

"The light of nature" is "not sufficient to give that knowledge of God and of his will which is necessary unto salvation. Therefore, it pleased the Lord to reveal himself, . . . and to commit the same wholly unto writing. These former ways of God's revealing his will unto his people" are "now ceased." This book "immediately inspired by God, and by his singular care and providence kept pure in all ages," constitutes therefore a wholly unique and miraculous work, of which God himself is "the author." All that man needs to know is contained therein. "The whole counsel of God concerning all things necessary for his own glory, man's salvation, faith, and life, is either expressly set down in Scripture, or by good and necessary consequence may be deduced from Scripture." It is a complete encyclopedia of needful knowledge, never to be revised or re-edited, "unto which nothing at any time is to be added, whether by new revelations of the spirit or traditions of men." It is "the supreme judge by which all controversies of religion are to be determined."

Out of this miraculous book was drawn, as the first article of belief, the doctrine of the Trinity; which, as stated, was to the average mind, whatever refinements of interpretation the clergy might put upon it, practical tritheism, or in other words, polytheism, heathenism.

Of this God, or of these gods, was affirmed the "Eternal Decrees."

"God from eternity hath ordained and decreed whatever comes to pass; and, in this foreordination, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life and others foreordained unto everlasting death. . . . These angels and men, thus predestinated and foreordained, are particularly and unchangeably designed. . . . Not only the individual elect are singled out for salvation, but individuals by the same choice are singled out for damnation." This system elaborated a fitting complement of anthropology for such a theology. The Hebrew stories of the Creation and the Garden of Eden were of course read not as legends or myths, but as literal prose histories, and yielded the following science. About six thousand years ago, a pair of human beings were made in perfect development, and placed in a garden, where they at once proceeded to disobey the only command God laid upon them, and thus sin entered the race at the fountain-head, corrupting and destroying the divine work.

"The sin of our first parents was permitted by God, he having purposed to order it to his own glory. By this sin they became dead in sin and wholly defiled in all the faculties and parts of soul and body. They being the root of all mankind, the guilt of this sin was imputed and the same death in sin and corrupted nature conveyed to all their posterity, whereby we are utterly indisposed, disabled, and made opposite to all good, and wholly inclined to evil." Thus, the race was "bound over to the wrath of God and the curse of the law."

To remedy this state of things, the Second Person of the Trinity bodied himself in flesh, and came upon earth to make expiation for the sin of man, who "fully satisfied the justice of the Father and purchased salvation for the elect." This salvation was only for the elect.

"Neither are any other redeemed by Christ, effectually called, justified, adopted, sanctified, and saved, but the elect only." For the rest of mankind, however good, there is therefore no possibility of salvation. "Although they may be called by the ministry of the word, and may have some common operations of the spirit, yet they cannot be saved; much less can men not professing the Christian religion be saved in any other way whatsoever, be they never so diligent to frame their lives according to the light of nature and the law of the religion they profess. . . . Nay, God doth even blind and harden wicked and ungodly men for their former sins, and withholdeth from them his grace, whereby they might have been enlightened in their understanding and wrought upon in their hearts."

Rightly, doubtless, since "there is no sin so small, but that it deserves damnation."

A judgment-day winds up this administration of the government of earth, whereof it is affirmed:—

"The end of God's appointing this day is for the manifestation of the glory of his mercy in the eternal salvation of the elect, and of his justice in the damnation of the reprobate, who shall be cast into everlasting torments, and be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord."

This is the Westminster Confession Gospel, in merely reading which here-to-day one feels guilty of blasphemy. This monstrous system of "logic linked and strong" had run utterly to seed in such extremes as Hopkinsonianism, familiar to all readers of Mrs. Stowe's charming tales of New England life, wherein the test of a condition of salvation was the being willing to be damned.

This system sat like an incubus upon New England; a tyrannous authority, palsying the reason in its search for truth; a ghastly horror, chilling the sweet sympathies of the heart; its poison touch opiating conscience and drawing a cataract over the imagination. What need for reason to study nature and history, when every discovery was anticipated by a book in everybody's hands? What possibility for reason to find out anything new, when every discovery was to be squared with the views promulgated centuries ago in Israel? What breath could the imagination draw in a world over which a pall of such horror was spread, when to laugh seemed to suspect this "Dread of Isaac," and to do aught beyond saving souls was a mockery of the woe of his wretched victims prisoned beneath their feet? What vision could conscience have of an Infinite and Eternal Goodness on the throne of being, into whose hands it could trust the problems of destiny it could not solve?

Had this young nation entered its marvellous career under the sway of such a religion, it would ere this have thrown off religion altogether. In the revolutionary change which this century has introduced in the human outlook, Christianity, if identified with Calvinism, would have received from our people its déchéance.

A death of faith or a new growth of faith was inevitable.

There are creative epochs in the history of every people, epochs which sorely puzzle the materialistic philosopher. The opening of our century was one of these periods in our land. A yeasty life was stirring everywhere beneath the crust of traditionalism, in fermenting questionings and struggling aspirations. Bit by bit, every portion of the traditional system was honey-combed with the efforts of thought to get up to the light; the whole sodden body of belief was aerated, sweetness stole through the sour lump, and the dough turned to bread on which man's soul could feed and live.

This new life within the old churches was found to be everywhere questioning the same salient features of the received system, though with different emphasis on its various enormities. It was found to be working along certain common lines of thought and towards certain common ideals of reconstruction, though in all degrees of departure from the conventional opinions. A unity was perceived under the independent attacks being made upon the old system, as of some commanding idea marshalling the forces in the field. This recognition drew the attacking forces together in new fellowships and associations. Certain great phrases and words came to the front as leaders of the movement. One word, above all, betokened the inspiring force of the day, —Unity.

God is one. Therefore, unity links all life together. Nature reveals the same power with the Bible. Reason is divine as well as conscience. All races are of one blood. One true light lighteth every man that cometh into the world. One family bond constitutes all mankind brothers, children of one Father. One system of law governs all and adjusts destiny impartially unto all. Through all and in all, "one increasing purpose runs" toward its own completion. Rightly did this new movement, bodying the conceptions grouping on this faith of Unity, receive the name of Unitarianism.

The controversy between Dr. Channing and Dr. Worcester precipitated the inevitable separation of the new thought from the old; and Unitarianism became no longer a school of opinion, but a sect, a denomination, ranking in its discipleship the best life of New England, and thus influencing powerfully the nation. Its true work is not to be studied, however, in its denominational Year Book, or gauged by its statistical results. As a denomination, it could hope to win only the cultivated and strenuous minds, and indeed has made little effort to lay hold of the great masses of the people.

Its mission is to be sought in the insistent push of the thought it has quickened and the principles it has sown through the larger bodies of Orthodox Christianity.

(1) The first phase of this work has been that already indicated, the negative task of the solvent. The old theology began to disintegrate under the criticism called forth by the controversies attending the growth of this new "ism," and it has continued happily crumbling away ever since. New England rang with discussions of dogmas hitherto held unquestionable. All that the traditional system needed to disprove it was honest and fearless inquiry into its real basis. And this inquiry was forced upon the churches in very self-defence. Orthodoxy has never been the old tyranny since this controversy fairly opened. The existence over against the orthodox churches of a body of men loyal to the Christian name and traditions, yet freely examining every ancient dogma and institution in the light of the latest knowledge, holding no most venerable sanctity safe from inquiry, has perpetuated the agitation which it was hoped the schism would close. Israel camped over against Judah has established a chronic civil war along the whole line of the sacred soil, no most isolated spot of which was secure against the inroads of these northern free thinkers, who impiously claimed the very name of the elect people.

Three-quarters of a century of that constant agitation has changed the whole defensive line of Orthodoxy. Let any one who doubts this read, for example, the curious books of Rev. Newman Smythe, and the very fine distinction drawn between orthodoxy, which of course is altogether lovely and orthodoxism, which is a very naughty and dangerous thing, to be carefully shunned by all sound people. Orthodoxy has evidently experienced religion, and has had a change of heart.

Of course, I do not for a moment mean to credit Unitarianism with the sole credit of this blessed change. The change is wrought under climatic conditions of which Unitarianism itself is but a sign. The whole trend of thought during our century has been working disintegratingly upon the traditional theology. A mighty glacier, from the dark regions of eternal winter, drifting slowly down into the free and open seas, finds the tossing waves wear it away, the warm currents of the Gulf Stream thaw out its bases, the caressing air melts its jagged edges, and the all-searching sun eat out its very heart of ice, till it seems ready to topple over and disappear forever. But this must be honestly said, that the naturalising on our soil of the European criticism and science which has chiefly wrought the disintegration of Calvinism has been due to the stalwart body of thinkers who, thrown off from the old churches, have crystallised in the fellowship of Unitarianism.

To say this is to confess an inestimable debt of gratitude due to them from all in the old churches who love liberty and do worship to truth, who rejoice in the freer range of thought and the gentler air in which now they walk.

It was no easy task to brave the tyranny of public opinion, when that vox populi was verily vox dei; to question traditional beliefs, when to doubt was an evident token of foreordination to eternal woe. It laid these men under the suspicion of those they loved, called upon them to part with associations and friendships held very dear, branded them with ugly names, and clothed them with calumny.

The saintly Channing could find no pulpit open to him in this city. The devout Bellows was called, in this same city, "infidel." How hard this trial was to these brave souls we see in a touching glimpse of his inner experiences in those early days, given us in a letter of Dr. Bellows, where he sighs over the loneliness and isolation in which he found himself here.

All honour to these pioneers of free thought in our American Christianity!

When a tidal wave dashes against the rockbound coast of an isolated island and plows out a harbour, into which the navies of the earth may enter, bringing all the treasures of a world-wide life, we do not credit it with the might which works this beneficent change, but rather the deep throb of the ocean's vasty mass. Yet none the less do we owe all thanks to the drops which freely joined to form the forefront of this general movement, and rose into the superbly cresting billow that hurled itself against the sharp crags and steely walls of stone, spending itself to open a land to larger light and life.

(2) The second phase of the Mission of Unitarianism, as I read its story, is a positive essay of reconstruction. Its influence, I know, is usually regarded by the orthodox as purely negative. Men who are ready to concede that it has had a useful work to perform as a solvent of the old crystallisations cannot see that it has made any efforts toward a new, and higher crystallisation of thought. Its negations, they say, were needful and serviceable, however exaggerated; but its affirmations, if indeed it has any clearly formulated, are either a return to the sub-Christian truths, the great intuitions common to humanity, or a departure into anti-Christian doctrines.

Unitarianism has not ended in mere negations. If that were so, whence the positive and beautiful life it has fed? Did the saintly Channing feed his soul on any mere anti-trinitarianism? Did the strong-souled Bellows suck the juices of his rich spiritual being from the negation of the five points of Calvinism? Where such men grow, there must be roots into some very positive spiritual truths. Nor would it be a light yield to the cause of positive Christianity, if this movement had only thrown our religion back into its deepest roots,—the basic intuitions and instincts of mankind; and struck down these tap-roots into the alone true soil of any enduring and noble religion,—reason. Religion which runs out into excessive doctrinal foliage will surely exhaust itself, and sink into decay and death. The only remedy is the pruning-knife. It may even need to be cut down to its very roots. And this cutting down, which seems so destructive, is the most positive of reconstructive efforts. You do not charge the gardener with being merely a destructive, when he thus deals with a tree. No more should you charge the spiritual husbandman who thus forces theology back to a new sprouting. This is the positiveness of germinal force, holding the promise and potency of whole harvests of new fruit.

There are no negations so sweeping and dangerous as the affirmations of superstition. The most powerful plea against all faith is made by a church which imposes an elaborate system of oracular dogmas, which ring hollow to the knock of rational inquiry. Catholic Europe to day is illustrating the value of such positive doctrines. The only true positiveness in doctrine is reasonableness. Carry down the roots of faith below all secondary soils, external authorities of councils or of books, into "the constitution and nature of things," and you have struck hold in a soil sure to feed the future with beneficent and beautiful beliefs.

But indeed this is by no means all the contribution of Unitarianism toward a positive Christianity higher and purer than the effete theology which it has sought to supersede. It has not been content with going back of it to the few simple human verities of religion on which Christianity grows. It has endeavoured, with more or less success, to force forward a new sprouting of doctrine from the old trunk and branches. It has sought, with what results I do not now inquire, to educe from the traditional formulas fresh and living conceptions, new and higher forms of the substance of all beliefs. Read "Orthodoxy, its Truths and Errors," by the venerable James Freeman Clarke, and you will see with what earnestness the effort is made, not merely to point out the crudities and follies of the old beliefs, but to find out the soul of truth in things erroneous, and to clothe it with a new and more reasonable form. He lays bare unsparringly the unreason of the traditional dogmas one by one; but then, with rare wisdom and reverence, he seeks out the reasonable idea latent somewhere in every great belief that has inspired men, and thus extricates a spiritual body for the resurrected Christianity. Again, I say, we need not concern ourselves now with the success of his difficult and delicate endeavour, but only with the aim. And this shows Unitarianism seeking to throw away only the husk, in order to preserve the grain, striving after a new and higher expression of the old formulas. The Bible is denied as a miraculous book, infallible, oracular; but it is affirmed as the supreme and sacred book of religion, which is to feed the children of the future as of the past, and voice the worship of the coming generations as it has done that of the generations behind us. The Trinity is denied as the heathen tritheism which it practically becomes in the old dogmas; but it is affirmed as the expression of the manifoldness in unity of the Divine Being, as the natural symbol of that three-fold revelation of the One God which seems to sum up all possible modes of his self-manifestation, nature, history, and the individual soul. Dr. Rufus Ellis uses the Gloria in his service. Dr. Osgood told me that he did not change his conception of the Trinity in leaving Unitarianism and coming among us.

So with every other special doctrine. Reason dispossesses the pretensions of superstition, but re-enthrones the realities of religion; and every thought, royal by right divine, finds its domain still secure.

Concerning the heart of the Christian faith, as held in Orthodoxy, Unitarianism is not the mere negation it appears, but is an effort at a truer affirmation. Certainly, Unitarianism does deny the traditional conception of the person of the Christ outright. It grants to him no proper and absolute Deity.

But even here be it noted that Unitarianism differs very widely within itself from what used to be called Socinianism up to Arianism. Some, most, hold Jesus to have been a pure and proper man, though the highest and best of men. Some hold, or did hold, him to have been a pre-existent being, angel or archangel, as apparently did Channing. This latter view shades up into the ancient Arianism, between which and Orthodoxy there is the difference of metaphysic, into which I counsel you never lightly to stray; for there lies no end to the mind

"In wandering mazes lost."

But under no form is Unitarianism unable with honesty to use the Scripture language concerning Christ. How indistinguishably high it can come to Orthodoxy in reverence for the Christ you may see, if you will, in that rich book of Dr. Sears, "The Heart of the Gospel," or that fascinating story of Dr. Clarke, "Thomas Didymus."

In so far as Unitarianism rises above criticism into philosophy, and becomes not merely a science of religion, but a religion, it reaffirms the faith in the incarnation, finds a higher form for this ancient and basic belief of Christendom, and worships the divine immanence in man, of which Jesus is the supreme symbol.

This little tract in my hand, setting forth the beliefs of Unitarians, or better still the volume of sermons entitled "Affirmations of Unitarianism," suffice to satisfy any one that, whatever he thinks of these results, this movement has tended toward a new and higher constructive utterance. It is not the spirit which denieth, as Mephistopheles defined himself. It, too, in its way, is "the everlasting yea" of Carlyle.

Herein, also, is its mission, to induce and further the reconstruction of Christian belief to the end that a firmer and more positive "yea" may voice to the poor human soul the certainty of its hopes, the fidelity of its faiths. Such a reconstruction of the old beliefs into reasonable forms, consonant with our highest knowledge and conservative of the power which lay in the old old story is the crying need of our age, heart-sick with uncertainties, weary of doubts, hungering as man ever must hunger for some bona fide faiths on which he can meet the duties of life, resist its temptations, endure its trials with serene and patient confidence. The churches fear to essay this perilous task. They see the good land beyond the river, but "Linger shivering on the brink,

And fear to launch away."

All thanks to that body of brave men who, whether they be on the further shore or only in the river on their rafts, dare the attempt, rebuking thus our cowardice and pointing out the way.

(3) Thus, we reach that phase of the Mission of Unitarianism which the gifted Starr King presented as pre-eminently its characteristic, in his famous sermon in the Pitts-street Chapel Course.

This course of sermons was arranged to give a representative of each of the chief denominations a hearing on behalf of his Church. Starr King chose as the theme of his discourse "Spiritual Christianity," "which is independent of institutions and systems, which is the substance and soul in all creeds and organisations, which declares itself not through councils and catechisms, but through worship and life, and by which, as a common vitality through diverse fractions, the Church out of many members is made one body."

There is such a common Christianity in every sect of Christendom. That common life breathes from our hymn-books, exhales from such a thesaurus of prayers as our Prayer Book, is written in the biographies of the saints, shines luminously from the daily lives of hosts of men and women who, differing in creed and ritual and discipline, show one spirit, even the spirit which was in Christ Jesus. No sect has a monopoly of it. All sects live it forth.

But, in most sects, it is sorely encumbered with the means devised to promote its growth; it struggles against a heavy, superincumbent mass of dogmas and institutions. Time and attention are drawn away from the culture of the spirit to the care of the body in which it is housed. Secondary and subordinate elements in religion usurp the place of the one alone essential. Differences generated over these lower interests sunder sects in strife, and the very sense of unity is lost.

Truly, it is a noble claim for any church that its mission is to call the various sects on to that which they all concede to be the substance of their varying forms, and to reunite them in a religion of the spirit.

Unitarianism may not live up to this high ideal. It may drop into a new spirit of sectism, and become a dogma of undogmaticalness, an institution of institutionlessness, and anti-Trinitarianism as unspiritual as Trinitarianism often is. But upon the whole, allowing for human weakness and the peculiar strain of such an ideal, it has been true to its mission. Professor Swing regards it as succeeding where Quakerism has failed, because of its impoverished mental life and its maimed social life. Certainly, its typical representative in our land, Channing, was a splendid specimen of spiritual Christianity, its symbol in a life.

Is not the clue here to that posture of Unitarianism which most troubles good Christian people in the Orthodox Churches? Its negations concerning the Christ may grieve and hurt us at times, we may feel that its attempts to account for him are as unsatisfactory as the elaborate metaphysic with which the humanity is sublimated away into pure deity; but is not the essence of faith in the Christ, after all, somewhat back of and beyond all this strife of tongues about the mystery of his unique personality, in a loyal following of his life as the true ideal of character? Ab, my brothers! that is a faith in Jesus as much harder than the lofty formulas of the Nicene Creed as a life is harder than a philosophy. This, and not any negations of Orthodox Christology, is the essence of the Unitarian gospel of the Christ. Think about him as you can, it says, but believe in him as the "Master of Life," and follow him. Win as correct a theory of the Christ as possible, but win the Christly life.

And so we have the phenomenon, so puzzling to the mere dogmatist, of men without any belief about him which would pass muster in an Orthodox church showing his presence in them, of men of all shades of opinion concerning him alike breathing forth in spirit.

No sane man doubts that the future is to have a religion. Few wise men care to speculate as to the precise form of that religion of the future. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be." But the law of Evolution would seem to show beyond a doubt that the incoming future will prove a development of the outgoing past, a nobler and more spiritual phrase of the essential faiths now inspiring progressive civilisation—Christianity. The crowning task of Unitarianism I expect to prove the preservation of the historic continuity of progress in religion. And I count it the highest honour of Dr. Bellows that, above any other one man, it is due to him that this eager body of truth-seekers in the crucial hour of their denomination's history were held loyal to the Christian name in the lines of historic religion, whereby this noble mission in the future shall not be filched from them, nor Christianity's advance-guard be lost to it. Then showed he that rare wisdom of the prophet, "He that believeth shall not make haste."

As though Providence were preparing this body for such a mission it has from that hour, while moving steadily on, none the less experienced a new sense of continuity with the old bodies, a desire for elements it at first seemed to slight; and thus, in a higher sense than it perchance dreams, the Unity in which it believes is fulfilling itself through the inspiration of the Spirit.

NOTTING HILL.—A very handsome piano has been presented to Miss Humphreys by some of the friends of the congregation of The Mall Church, at this place, on the occasion of her retirement from amongst them. The testimonial is in memory of the services Miss Humphreys rendered to the church for many years as honorary harmoniumist and choir leader. The teachers and scholars, past and present, have also made known their attachment to the same lady by presenting her with a box of books,—Carlyle, Lamb, Dickens, "The Gentle Life," &c., fourteen volumes in all.

REV. W. R. SHANKS, Unitarian minister of Kings Lynn, has been elected a Fellow of the Royal Society of Literature.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—The chief wonder of modern times. —This incomparable Medicine increases the appetite, strengthens the stomach, cleanses the liver, corrects biliousness, and prevents flatulency; it purifies the system, invigorates the nerves, and re-instates sound health. The enormous demand for these Pills throughout the globe might cause astonishment were it not known that a single trial convinces the most sceptical that no medicine equals Holloway's Pills in its ability to lessen or remove all complaints incidental to the human race. They are a blessing to the afflicted, and a boon to all. The purification of the blood, removal of all restraints from the secretive organs, and gentle aperient action, are the prolific sources of the extensive curative range of Holloway's Pills.

THE FUNERAL OF EMERSON.

ADDRESS BY JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, D.D.

This assembly has come together not only to testify its respect for one of the greatest thinkers and writers of our time, but also it is drawn to this place by gratitude for the strength, help, and inspiration which has been given to us through the mediation of this noble soul. It is not for me, it is not for this hour, to say what ought to be said of the genius which has kindled the fires of thought in two continents. The present moments belong to reverential love. We thank God here for the influences which have made us all better. The voice now hushed never spoke but to lift us to a higher plane of generous sentiment. The hand now still never wrote except to take us out of "our dreary routine of sense, worldliness, and sin," into communion with whatever is noblest, purest, highest. By the side of this revered form, we thank God that through all these years we have been made better by his words and his life. He has been a preacher of righteousness to this and other lands. When he left the pulpit, he said, in his farewell sermon, that he did not relinquish his profession,—that he hoped, whatever was his work, to be still a teacher of God's truth. How well has he kept that promise! No one can say, till the day of judgment declares it, how large a part of the genuine faith in the things not seen but eternal has come to us from the depths of his spiritual insight. He was one of God's seers; and he was sent to us at a time like the one of which it is written, "The Word of the Lord was precious in those days; there was no open vision." Men lived by past inspirations, with no faith in the possibility of any new revelation to the soul of the divine will. No doubt they did well to resort to the words of ancient prophets until the day should dawn and the day-star arise in their own hearts. That day dawned anew when the sight of the divine truth kindled a light in the solemn eyes of Channing and created a new power which spoke from the lips of Emerson. Yet the young and hopeful listened with joy to this morning song, they looked gladly to this auroral light. When the little book "Nature" was published, it seemed to some of us a new revelation. Mr. Emerson then said what has been the text of his life, "Let the single man plant himself on his instincts, and the great world will come round to him." He did not reply to his critics. He went on his way. And to-day we see that the world has come round to him. He is the preacher of spiritual truth to our age. We understand through him what Jesus meant when he said, "You must eat my flesh and drink my blood." Our souls have been fed by his life. We have been nourished by his character more than by his words. He has been bread and wine to us—the bread of strength, the wine of joy.

The saying of the liturgy is true and wise, that "in the midst of life we are in death." But it is still more true that "in the midst of death we are in life." Do we ever believe so much in immortality as when we look on such a dear and noble face, now so still, which a few hours ago was radiant with thought and love? "He is not here: he is risen." That power which we knew,—that soaring intelligence, that soul of fire, that ever-advancing spirit,—that cannot have been suddenly annihilated with the decay of these earthly organs. It has left its darkened dust behind. It has outsoared the shadow of our night. God does not trifle with his creatures by bringing to nothing the ripe fruit of the ages by the lesion of a cerebral cell or some bodily tissue. Life does not die, but matter dies off from it. The highest energy we know, the soul of man, the unit in which meet intelligence, imagination, memory, hope, love, purpose, insight,—this agent of immense resource and boundless power,—this has not been subdued by its instrument. When we think of such an one as he, we can only think of life, never of death.

Such was his own faith, as expressed in his paper on Immortality. But he himself was the best argument for immortality. Like the greatest thinkers, he did not rely on logical proof, but on the higher evidence of universal instincts,—the vast streams of belief which flow through human thought like currents in the ocean; those shoreless rivers which for ever roll along their paths in the Atlantic and Pacific, not restrained by banks, but guided by the revolutions of the globe and the attractions of the sun.

Mr. Emerson stated such indications of immortality as these: That all great natures love stability and permanence. "Everything here," he says, "is prospective." "The mind delights in immense time." "We are not interested in anything which ends." "All I have seen teaches me to trust the Creator for what I have not seen." "All the ways of virtuous living lead upwards and not downwards."

In his "Threnody" he shows us how the Deep Heart said to him:—

"When the scanty shores are full
With Thought's perilous, whirling pool;
When frail Nature can be more,
Then the spirit strikes the hour;
My servant Death, with solving rite,
Pours finite into infinite."

There are few who remain who remember the beginnings of this long progress. The first time I saw him I went with Margaret Fuller to hear him preach in the church on Hanover-street. Neither of us then knew him. We sat in the gallery, and felt that a new influence, sweet and strong, had come. Then I recall his kindness, after I came to have his acquaintance, and how he gave me to print in a Western magazine four of his early poems, the first ever printed. Next, I think of the group which always collected at his lectures, ever the same persons, those who came to be fed, and never went away hungry. After that were the days of the Transcendental Club, which we called the "Like-minded."—I suppose because no two of us thought alike. One summer afternoon we came to Concord and had one meeting in his parlour. There was George Ripley, admirable talker, most genial of men; and Orestes A. Brownson, full of intelligence, courage, and industry, who soon went over into the Roman Catholic Church; and James Walker, of whom Mr. Emerson once said to me, "I have come to Boston to hear Dr. Walker thunder this evening"; Theodore Parker and many others. Days of enthusiasm and youthful hope, when the world seemed so new and fair, life so precious, when new revelations were close at hand as we thought, and some new Plato or Shakespeare was about to appear. We dwelt in what Halleck calls "the dear charm of life's illusive dream"; and the man who had the largest hope of all, yet joined with the keenest eye to detect every fallacy, was Ralph Waldo Emerson. We looked to him as our master. And now the world calls him its master—in insight, judgment, charm of speech, unflinching courage, endless aspiration. We say of him as Goethe of Schiller:—"Lo, he went onward, ever onward, for all these years,—then, indeed, he had gone far enough for this earth. For care is taken that trees shall not grow up to heaven." His work, like that of the apostle, was accomplished by the quantity of soul that was in him,—not by mere power of intellect, but "by pureness, by knowledge, by long suffering, by kindness, by the Holy Spirit, by love unfeigned, by the word of truth, by the armour of righteousness on the right hand and the left."

Let us then ponder his words:—

"Wilt thou not open thy heart to know
What rainbows teach and sunsets show?
Voice of earth to earth returned,
Prayers of saints that inly burned,
Saying, *What is excellent,
As God lives, is permanent;
Hearts are dust, hearts' loves remain;
Hearts' love will meet thee again.*"

House and tenant go to ground,
Lost in God, in Godhead found."

A SONNET ON EMERSON.

BY A. BRONSON ALCOOT.

His harp is silent: shall successors rise,
Touching with venturous hand the trembling string,
Kindle glad raptures, visions of surprise,
And wake to ecstasy each slumbering thing?
Shall life and thought flash new in wondering eyes,
As when the seer transcendent, sweet, and wise,
World-wide his native melodies did sing,
Flushed with fair hopes and ancient memories?
Ah, no! That matchless lyre shall silent lie:
None hath the vanished minstrel's wondrous skill
To touch that instrument with art and will.
With him, winged poesy doth droop and die;
While our dull age, left voiceless, must lament
The bard high heaven had for its service sent.

GLoucester.—On Monday, in connection with the re-opening services held on Sunday, a public meeting was held at the Masonic Hall, when about two hundred sat down. Major W. E. Price, who had only just arrived in England from a visit to the Canary Islands, presided, and was supported on the platform by Mr. W. P. Price and the resident and visiting ministers, the hall being well filled. During the evening a small choir sang some pieces, and one or two solos, duets, and quartets were also given. In opening the proceedings, the Chairman remarked that the attendances at the service on the previous day had testified to the undoubted interest the Gloucester people had taken in the propagation of the doctrines held by the Free Christian or Unitarian Church. Though they as Unitarians differed widely from many of their Nonconformist brethren on points of doctrine and practice, he thought Nonconformists had some interests that were identical, and he was glad to notice that they had striven together in the cause of religious and political freedom. They as Unitarians gloried in that they carried their individual freedom into their Church, and were not bound to any particular creed, but were allowed freedom in thought and belief. Mr. W. P. Price, who next addressed the meeting, referred to his association with their place of worship, where, he said, he had received his first religious impressions, and within the boundaries of which rested the mortal remains of his father and grandfather. He should never cease to regard it with affection, and it occurred to him as a matter of reproach and rebuke that their chapel, which was the oldest Nonconformist place of worship in the city, had not met with that support which ought to have been accorded to it. He referred to the different controversies that had troubled the Christian Church on points of doctrine, and remarked that, though they had been taunted with wresting the Scriptures to their own views, they had been borne out in the construction they had put upon different texts by the rendering given by the revisers of the New Testament. He paid a high compliment to the scholarly ability with which the chairman of the Revision Committee (the Bishop of this diocese) had conducted his coadjutors through their labours, and thought Unitarians had nothing to fear from the Revised Version, but, on the contrary, had every reason to accept it with gratitude. A religion that knew how to accept every fresh revelation of nature, thereby becoming more and more acquainted with Nature's God, must prosper. They would find that as time went on they would be held in greater respect, and that their views would become more and more acceptable. Mr. G. St. Clair, F.G.S., of Birmingham, then gave an address on "Our Church work as affected by modern biological discoveries." The Rev. W. C. Walters, of Kidderminster, followed with an address on the proceedings of the conference recently held at Liverpool. The Rev. A. N. Blatchford, of Bristol, spoke on "Western work, western history, and western prospects." The Rev. J. C. Hurst, of Cheltenham, spoke on the subject, "Success to the Gloucester Church." The Rev. G. Knight replied, reciprocating the kind expressions used towards the Gloucester Church by Mr. Hurst. Dr. Bond then made a few remarks, based on "Success to our neighbouring churches." The Rev. W. Birks, of Stroud, replied. Mr. J. Ashbee proposed a vote of thanks to the visiting ministers and other speakers, and Alderman Reynolds proposed a vote of thanks to the Chairman. The compliment was acknowledged, and the proceedings were brought to a close by the singing of "God Save the Queen."

PORTSMOUTH.—We regret to learn that the Rev. T. Timmins, minister of the Unitarian Church, High-street, is suffering from nervous debility and depression induced by overwork and anxiety, and has been recommended by his medical adviser to relinquish his ministerial work for the present. Rest for some months and change of scene are considered necessary; and we are sure that it is the sincere wish, not only of the reverend gentleman's congregation, but of the community in which he has actively engaged in good work, that he may soon be restored to his usual health. He will leave Portsmouth in a few weeks for a lengthened and much-needed holiday.—Hampshire Telegraph.

MIDLAND CHRISTIAN UNION SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.—The sixth annual meeting of the members of this Association was held on Saturday afternoon last, at the schools attached to the Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, Birmingham, Mr. Councillor H. Payton, President, in the chair. About 180 persons were present, among whom were the other officers of the Association, viz., the Rev. W. Carey Walters and Mr. W. J. Cross (Vice-Presidents), Mr. H. New, jun. (Hon. Sec. and Treasurer), Mr. H. Parker (Auditor), and Mr. J. H. Dance (Visitor); the Rev. Dr. Crosskey, Dr. Laird Collier, Dr. Maginnis, H. Eachus, J. B. Gardner and Thomas Pipe;

Messrs. J. Reynolds (President of the Manchester District Sunday School Association), W. Gill (from the North Midland Sunday School Association), D. Heap, T. G. Lee, E. H. Lee, J. Cross, S. Greenway, G. Austin, T. Marsh, T. W. Ryland, W. J. Tranter, Geo. Titterton, T. H. Russell, J. Stooke, Dean, Edmunds, &c., and several ladies. The annual Report and Treasurer's Account having been printed, were distributed among those present and taken as read. Mr. Dance (Visitor) read his report. On the motion of the Chairman, seconded by Mr. Edmunds (Old Meeting), the reports were adopted. On the motion of the Chairman, seconded by Dr. Crosskey, the thanks of the meeting were given to the retiring officers, and the following were elected for the ensuing year:—President: the Rev. W. Carey Walters. Vice-Presidents: the Rev. Thomas Pipe (the Lye) and Mr. T. G. Lee. Secretary and Treasurer: Mr. H. New, jun. Auditor: Mr. T. F. Derrington. Visitor: Mr. Geo. Titterton. The Chairman and Mr. W. J. Tranter (Church of the Messiah) were appointed delegates to the Sunday School Association annual meeting on June 2. On the proposition of the Chairman, seconded by the Rev. W. Carey Walters, a cordial welcome was given to Messrs. J. Reynolds and W. Gill, and these gentlemen having acknowledged the compliment on behalf of their respective associations, the first part of the meeting terminated. The company were entertained at tea in the lower schoolroom by the kindness of the Church of the Messiah teachers and friends, and after this was over they returned to the upper room. After singing a hymn a paper was read by the Rev. J. B. Gardner on "Why do so many of our Elder Scholars leave us?" The discussion was opened by Mr. Titterton, who was followed by the Revs. W. Carey Walters and Dr. Crosskey; Messrs. W. Gill, J. Reynolds, W. J. Cross, W. J. Tranter, J. H. Dance, the Rev. Dr. Collier, Mr. Hemming, and the Chairman. Mr. Gardner having replied, a vote of thanks to the Church of the Messiah teachers and friends for their hospitality was moved by the Rev. H. Eachus, seconded by the Rev. Peter Dean, and carried, and the meeting concluded.

HINCKLEY.—On Sunday morning, May 14, a memorial service was held in the Great Meeting to inaugurate a tablet to the late Mr. A. Atkins. There was a large congregation, benches being required to supplement the crowded pews. The preacher was the Rev. J. C. Lunn, of Leicester, who had known Mr. Atkins for many years. His very appropriate and thoughtful sermon, from the text "There is no night there," was greatly enhanced by a most impressive and sympathetic delivery. Some friends assisting the choir sang Elvey's Anthem "The souls of the righteous are in the hands of God." The tablet of white marble, carved in relief with lilies and sprays of ivy, bears the inscription:—"In grateful remembrance of Arthur Atkins, who died Jan. 5, 1882, aged forty-one years, greatly beloved and mourned by his family and fellow-townsmen. Of simple manners and pure speech he had great tenderness of heart. Practical wisdom and an upright intelligent soul, and all his gifts he freely used for the good of those about him. This tablet was given by his workpeople and friends who worshipped with him here, by whom his example is held ever worthy of imitation. One of those benignant souls who, without astonishing posterity, make a happy difference in the lives about them, and in this way left the average of earthly joy."

ROCHDALE.—On Sunday evening last Blackwater-street Church was crowded to hear a lecture by the Rev. T. Carter, on "God not Wicked: God is Good." Most of the Secularists from Rochdale and neighbourhood were present, and their leaders took active part in the after proceedings. The lecture was prompted by one given the previous Sunday on "The Wickedness of God," by Dr. Aveling. After the regular service nearly all the congregation remained to a conference on the subject of the lecture. Then ensued a very animated discussion on the points raised in the lecture, and mostly between the leading Secularists present and the lecturer, and which was listened to with the keenest interest by the congregation. After one and a-half hour's spirited debate, an unexpected vote of thanks was unanimously tendered to Mr. Carter. In acknowledgment, Mr. Carter said it was with much pleasure he received so cordial an expression of their kindly feeling, and that it would be to him a far greater pleasure if all his hearers could arrive at a settled and inspiring belief as he had in an All-Wise and All-Good God, for he was assured that were it so, such a belief would add immensely to their satisfaction, comfort, and happiness, and nerve their lives to even nobler purposes.

MORAL REFORM UNION.—A crowded drawing-room meeting of ladies was held on the 24th inst., under the auspices of this Society, at 58, Porchester-terrace, to hear an address from Dr. E. Blackwell, on "Wrong and Right Methods of Dealing with Social Evil." The address, based on facts elicited in evidence before the Select Committee of the House of Lords on the Traffic in Girls, was followed by a resolution adopting a petition, which had been previously formulated, for raising the age of the protection of minors, and which embodied the principle that person should be considered as sacred as property. The petition will be sent to both Houses. The address lasted an hour and a half, and was listened to with unbroken attention. At its close a unanimous desire was expressed that Dr. Blackwell should repeat it at a later date, and it was proposed to be then given before a mixed audience of gentlemen and ladies.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE.—The distribution of prizes in connection with the Faculty of Medicine took place at University College on Wednesday week. The Earl of Kimberley, President of the College, was in the chair. Mr. John Eric Erichsen, F.R.S., distributed the prizes. Entrance exhibitions had been obtained by W. M. Bayliss, J. R. Bradford, and Raymond Johnson, all of London. The Atchison Scholarship was awarded to W. C. Wilkinson, of Sydney; and the Atkinson Morley Surgical Scholarship and the Bruce Medal to S. H. C. Martin, of Jamaica. Gold medals were taken by J. W. Carr, of London (anatomy); P. Flemming, of London (physiology); P. V. Appleby, of Blackheath (chemistry); E. W. von Tunzelmann, of Wimbledon (medicine); and S. H. C. Martin, of Jamaica (surgery). The silver medal of zoology and comparative anatomy was awarded to F. W. Oliver, of Kew; the gold Fellowes medal, for clinical medicine, was taken by W. C. Wilkinson, of Sydney; and the Liston gold medal, for clinical surgery, by E. N. Sheldrake, of Ipswich.—Mr. Erichsen addressed the students, remarking that the medical profession, like that of letters, was a republic, and that there was no profession in which family influence or connection availed so little. There was no door in that profession which could be shut in the face of a man of ability, energy, and character. Medicine was never stationary, and it required diligent study to keep abreast. A student must be prepared to clear his mind of what was old and effete, and must expect constant revolutions.—The Earl of Kimberley, in moving a vote of thanks to Mr. Erichsen, expressed the pleasure which he felt in seeing that so many of the students were from the colonies. Reference had been made to changes in medicine, but it was also true that change was going on in thought, politics, and science. He believed in progress, and he believed it would work for good.—The vote of thanks was cordially passed, and the proceedings terminated.

MISS PHILP'S CONCERT.—The announcement of Miss Elizabeth Philp's Concert at St. James's Hall, attracted a numerous and fashionable audience on the 19th inst., and judging from the general and at times enthusiastic applause with which the greater portion of the lengthy programme was received it may very fairly be assumed that the concert was a success. The vocalists were Mrs. Hutchinson, Mrs. Pearsall Clarke, Miss Elizabeth Philp, Madame Antoinette Sterling, and Madame Isabel Fassett; Mr. Percy Blandford, Mr. Theo. Marzials, Mr. Maybrick, Mr. Arthur L. Oswald, and the London Vocal Union under the direction of Mr. Frederick Walker. The first part opened with a part song, "This Pleasant Month of May," by the London Vocal Union, which, together with the other part songs allotted to that talented company, viz.: "What is Love," and "The Owl sits up in the Ivy Bush," both of which are Miss Philp's composition, were well rendered. Madame Antoinette Sterling sang Blumenthal's "Sunshine and Rain," and E. Philp's "The Poacher's Widow," the first being encored, for which was substituted "Down the Long Avenue." Madame Isabel Fassett's rendering of Lover's song, "What will you do, Love?" and E. Philp's new song, "Little Wanderers," with organ accompaniment, was very pleasing and effective. A large proportion of the vocal music was the production of the Beneficiare, and fully maintained her reputation as an original and pleasing composer. Mrs. Hutchinson was encored in E. Philp's "Voices of Nature," and Mr. Maybrick in Stephen Adam's "Little Hero." The Instrumentalists were, Miss Annie Waugh (pianoforte), deservedly encored for her execution of "Souvenir de Versailles," by Jules de Sivrai, and Monsieur Ondrick (violin), who declined a similar honour for his splendid performance of Ernst's "Airs Hongrois." Perhaps the most noticeable feature in the evening was a duet for two pianofortes, called "Danse Macabre," by Saint Saëns, the executants being Miss Ada Brown and Miss May Johnston (pupils of Madame Man-gold Diehl). The piece may be called an Idyll in music; it is more curious than beautiful, but is well calculated to exhibit the unmistakable talent of the young ladies to whom its representation was entrusted.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The Rev. P. J. Forsyth's and the Rev. J. Orr's letters, together with other communications, are unavoidably postponed.

Our Calendar.

SUNDAY, MAY 28.

LONDON.

Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, at Little Portland-street Chapel, at 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M.
Rev. CHAS. VOYSEY, at Langham-hall, 43, Great Portland-street, 11.15 A.M.
Rev. DR. J. FREEMAN CLARKE, at Rosslyn-hill Chapel, Hampstead, 11.30 A.M.

TUESDAY.

General Baptist Anniversary at Bethnal-green. Preacher: the Rev. T. B. W. BRIGGS, of Dover, 11 A.M.

WEDNESDAY.

British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Unity Church, Islington. Preacher: the Rev. J. FREEMAN CLARKE, D.D., 11 A.M.
Annual Meeting at 1 P.M.

THURSDAY.

Conference at Essex-street Chapel at 10.30 A.M.
Soirée at Cannon-street Hotel at 6 P.M.

FRIDAY.

Sunday School Association at Freemasons' Tavern, 9 A.M.
Ministers' Conference at Dr. Williams' Library, 6 P.M.

* Notices of Sunday Services are inserted in this Calendar at 6d. a line, and of other Meetings and Services gratis, provided a detailed Advertisement appears.

SELECTED BOOKS.

Adams's (W. H. D.) Curiosities of Superstition, 5/
Bray's (Mrs. C.) Elements of Morality in Easy Lessons, 2/6
Davidson's (A. B.) The Epistle to the Hebrews, 2/6
Donnelly's (J.) Atlantis, 12/6
Dickens, by A. W. Ward, 2/6 (English Men of Letters.)
Grindon's (L. H.) Country Rambles and Manchester Walks and Wild Flowers, 6/
McCarthy's (J.) Epochs of Reform, 1830-1850, 2/6
Mozley's (Rev. T.) Reminiscences, chiefly of Oriel College and the Oxford Movement, 2 vols., 18/6
Schmidt (Prof. P. W.) and Holzendorff's (Prof. F. von) Short Protestant Commentary on the Books of the New Testament, trans. from the German, by F. H. Jones, vol. 1, 10/6
Smyth's (N.) Orthodox Theology of to-day, 2/
Smith (T. R.) and Slater's (J.) Architecture, Classic and Early Christian, 5/
Stuart's (J.) Our Social Errors, 5/
Thomas & Kempis Birthday Book, 3/6

MR. WALTER MAWER, Sunday School Association Office, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C., will supply any of the above-named new books and new editions, at the prices named, carriage free, on receipt of Post-office Order, payable at the East Strand Post-office.

MARRIAGE.

SHELLY—SOLLY.—On the 20th inst., at St. Nicholas, Chiselhurst, by the Rev. F. H. Murray, Rector, assisted by the Rev. H. L. Russell, Percy, third son of the late J. W. Shelly, Esq., of Great Yarmouth, to Charlotte Agnes, youngest daughter of the late Samuel Solly, F.R.S.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ENGLISH LANGUAGE and LITERATURE, COMPOSITION and READING.
Miss LOUISA DREWRY has some time Disengaged for Lecture—or Practice Classes in Schools. She would also read with Private Pupils.—143, King Henry's-road, South Hampstead, N.W.

"THE FORT, MARGATE."—APARTMENTS in a well-furnished house, facing the sea, on moderate terms.
Address, Mrs. Stabback, Lansdowne Lodge, the Fort Margate.

BRIGHTON.—Apartments, with or without Board, at Miss Wood's, 12, Lower Rock Gardens. Three minutes from Madeira-walk and the Chain Pier.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY:

FOR JUNE, 1882, Price 2s. 6d.

Home Rule. (1) By the Marquis of BLANDFORD. (2) By JUSTIN MCCARTHY, M.P.
Peel and Cobden. By Professor GOLDWIN SMITH.
Thought-Reading. By Professor BARRETT, EDMUND GURNEY, and FREDERIC W. H. MYERS.
The Tower of London. By ALGERNON B. MITFORD.
Shakespearian Criticism. By WALTER HERRIES POLLOCK.
The Friends of the Farmer. By J. WOULFE FLANAGAN.
The Birmingham Caucus. By W. T. MARRIOTT, M.P.
The Allies: a Political Dialogue. By H. D. TRAILL.
Ireland. By the Right Hon. EARL GREY.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO., LONDON.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

COLLYER'S SERMONS again reduced in price, for giving away to friends and inquirers, &c., &c.

SERMONS, by ROBERT COLLYER, "Nature and Life," and "The Life that Now Is," in One Volume. Price 2s., post free, if prepaid; or for Twelve Copies and upwards, 1s. 6d. each, carriage free.

TEXTS AND MARGINS of the REVISED NEW TESTAMENT. By Dr. G. VANCE SMITH, 1s.

POSITIVE ASPECTS OF UNITARIAN THOUGHT AND DOCTRINE. Cheap Edition, 1s.

Address, Miss PHILPOT, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London.

THE MORAL REFORM UNION, Established in the Interests of Pure Family Life. Motto:—"Thou shalt love thy Neighbour as thyself."—MATT. xix. 19. The First Annual Report, embodying the Prospectus and Priced List of Literature sanctioned for sale, can now be had, price 3½d., post free.

HIGH SCHOOL, STOKE GREEN, NEAR COVENTRY, established (1865) by the Rev. G. HRAVIDSE, B.A., of University and Manchester New Colleges, London, promotes a Liberal Education at a moderate cost.

MOUNT VERNON HIGH SCHOOL, NOTTINGHAM.

Boys carefully prepared for the Universities, Public Schools, or for Business. Vacancies.
SCHOOL RE-OPENS, May 8, 1882.

EDWIN SMITH, M.A., Head Master.

BRENTWOOD, WORSLEY, near MANCHESTER.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal ... MRS. F. SHAWCROSS,

late of Brook House, Knutsford.

The NEXT TERM begins MONDAY, May 8.

For prospectus, apply to the Principal.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK.—Current Accounts opened according to the usual practice of other Bankers, and Interest allowed on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £25. No commission charged for keeping Accounts.

The Bank also receives money on Deposit at Three per cent. Interest, repayable on demand.

The Bank undertakes, for its Customers, free of charge, the custody of Deeds, Writings, and other Securities and Valuables; the collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the purchase and sale of Stocks and Shares.

Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued.

A Pamphlet, with full particulars, on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCHROFT, Manager.

Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane.

THE BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY'S ANNUAL RECEIPTS EXCEED FOUR MILLIONS.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH, with Immediate Possession, and no Rent to pay. Apply at the Office the BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH, with Immediate Possession, either for Building or Gardening purposes. Apply at the Office of the BIRKBECK FREE HOLD LAND SOCIETY.

A Pamphlet, with full particulars, on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCHROFT, Manager.

Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION SOCIETY.

ANNUAL MEETING, MAY 17, 1882.

GEORGE'S-ROW.

The Rev. STOPFORD A. BROOKE, in the Chair.

The following Resolutions were passed:—

1. Moved by DAVID AINSWORTH, Esq., M.P., seconded by the Rev. Dr. MARTINEAU, and resolved:—

"That the Reports of the Treasurer and Committee be received, approved, and adopted, and together with the Reports of the Missionaries, be printed and circulated."

2. Moved by FREDERICK NETTLEFOLD, Esq., seconded by Dr. ASPLAND, supported by J. ALLANSON PICTON, Esq., M.A., and resolved:—

"That this Meeting, while recognising with gladness the improvement slowly taking place in the condition of the people by means of increased educational and other philanthropic agencies, affirms the supreme importance of attempting to provide for their moral and religious needs on the principles of the London Domestic Mission, and requests the Committee to consider the best means of extending the work of the Society."

3. Moved by Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, seconded by Dr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, and resolved:—

"That this Meeting, conscious of the great difficulties of Missionary work under many of the conditions of London life, offers to the Revs. W. A. Pope and F. Summers and to their fellow-labourers in the Mission stations at Spicer-street and George's-row, its hearty thanks for their earnestness and zeal, and its continued sympathy with them in all their endeavours to carry the truths and influences of religion into the hearts and homes of the neglected poor."

4. Moved by S. S. TAYLER, Esq., seconded by Rev. T. L. MARSHALL, and resolved:—

"That the following gentlemen be the Committee and Officers for the ensuing year:—Treasurer, Mr. P. M. Martineau; Committee, Messrs. Barrow, Brabner, Corkran, Rev. J. Drummond, Messrs. Lewis, Lister, H. Martineau, A. Preston, F. S. Schwann, I. M. Wade, and Wilson; Secretary, Rev. J. E. Carpenter; Auditors, Messrs. R. Worsley and H. Clarke."

5. Moved by ALFRED PRESTON, Esq., seconded by Rev. J. E. CARPENTER, and resolved:—

"That the best thanks of this Meeting be given to the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, T. Smith Osler, Esq., and David Ainsworth, Esq., M.P., for their valuable services in the Chair."

BLACKFRIARS MISSION.

Subscriptions towards the CHILDREN'S TRIP gladly received by Miss PHILPOT, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, and by the Minister, the Rev. Geo. WOOLLER, 21, Great Charlotte-street, Blackfriars-road, S.E.

LONDON.—WEST-CENTRAL TEMPERANCE HOTEL, 97, 99, 101, Southampton-row, Russell-square.—Patronised and highly commended by the Rev. D. S. Govett, M.A., English Chaplain, Gibraltar; Rev. H. M. Holden, M.A., St. Bartholomew's, Bradford, Yorkshire; Rev. Canon French, M.A., Killaloe, Ireland, &c. Central, quiet, exceptionally clean, moderate in charges. Visitors' Drawing Room. Breakfast or Tea, 1s. 3d. Beds from 1s. 6d. Printed Tariff Card on application.

FREDERIC SMITH, Proprietor.

Possessing all the properties of the Finest Arrowroot,

BROWN AND POLSON'S CORN FLOUR

Is a World-wide Necessary

FOR

THE NURSERY, THE SICK-ROOM, AND THE FAMILY TABLE.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE ANNIVERSARY MEETINGS,

MAY 31st and JUNE 1st, 1882.

The FIFTY-SEVENTH ANNUAL MEETING of the Association will be held on WEDNESDAY, May 31st, in UNITY CHURCH, UPPER-STREET, ISLINGTON, LONDON. The Service to be commenced, at Eleven o'clock, by the Rev. WILLIAM M. AINSWORTH, of Lancaster.

The SERMON will be preached by the Rev. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, D.D., of Boston, U.S.

The usual COLLECTION will be made at the close the Service in aid of the Funds of the Association.

After a short interval, the MEETING will be held for the transaction of the Business of the Association; DAVID AINSWORTH, Esq., M.P., the President, in the Chair.

The CONFERENCE will be held on THURSDAY MORNING, June 1st, in ESSEX-STREET CHAPEL, STRAND, LONDON, at Half-past Ten. Subject:—"The Duty of our Churches in relation to the Masses of the People." To be introduced by the Rev. JAMES T. WHITEHEAD, of Hackney, and the Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, of Stamford-street, London.

In the Evening of the same day, June 1st, a SOIREE will be held in the CANNON-STREET HOTEL. Tea and Coffee at Six o'clock, Music at 6.30, and afterwards the Meeting. The President, DAVID AINSWORTH, Esq., M.P., in the Chair.

Tickets for the Soiree (One Shilling each) should be taken early. On and after Monday, May 29th, the price will be 1s. 6d. To be had at the Office of the Association, or in the London Church Vestries.

HENRY IERSON, Secretary.

37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London.

THE FORTY-EIGHTH ANNUAL MEETING

OF THE

SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION

WILL BE HELD AT THE

FREEMASONS' TAVERN, GREAT QUEEN-STREET, LINCOLN'S-INN FIELDS, LONDON, on FRIDAY, 2nd JUNE NEXT.

E. LAWRENCE, Esq., LL.B., will preside, and the Rev. F. E. MILLSON, of Halifax, will read a Paper on "The Changed Methods for the Changed Conditions of Sunday School Work."

Breakfast at half-past eight for nine o'clock. Tickets 2s. 6d. each, to be had at the Rooms of the Association and of the Stewards.

STEWARDS:

FREDERIC ALLEN.
W. CHAS. BISS.
HOWARD C. CLARKE.
W. H. DRUMMOND.
T. N. DYER.
ERNEST MOORE.
PHILEMON GRIFFIN.
C. F. PEARSON.

FRANK PRESTON.
ION PRITCHARD.
FRANK ROBINSON.
THOS. ROBINSON.
HUGON S. TAYLER.
JOHN S. TOYE.
J. ALAN WHITEHEAD.
F. WITTHALL.

LITTLE PORTLAND-STREET CHAPEL

On SUNDAY, JUNE 4, Rev. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, D.D., of Boston, U.S., will Preach in the Morning, Services at 11.15 a.m. Collection on behalf of the Portland British Schools; and in the Evening, Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS, Subject, "The Sword of Jesus." Services at 7 p.m.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY of GENERAL BAPTISTS will be held on WHITTUESDAY, MAY 30, at the NEW CHAPEL, Bethnal-green-road, Shoreditch, London.

The Proceedings will commence at Eleven o'clock with Divine Service, conducted by the Rev. J. A. ANDREWS, of Headcorn; the Sermon by the Rev. T. B. W. BAIGES, of Dover. The Communion of the Lord's Supper will follow the Service.

The BUSINESS MEETING will be held at half-past Two.

At Seven a CONFERENCE will be held, on "The Best Means of Inducing the Young to Join the Church." The Subject to be introduced by the Rev. C. A. HODDINOTT.

Refreshments will be provided in the Chapel. Dinner, after the Service, 1s. 6d.; Tea, at Six o'clock, 6d. each.

Printed by WOODFALL and KINDER, of Milford-lane, Strand W.C.; and Published for the Proprietors by WALTER MAWER, at the Offices of the SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London, W.C.—Saturday, May 27, 1882

The Inquirer.

A Religious, Political, & Literary Newspaper, & Record of Reberent Free Thought.

[REGISTERED AT THE GENERAL POST-OFFICE AS A NEWSPAPER.]

No. 2084.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 3, 1882.

[PRICE 5D.]

CONTENTS.

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:—

The Anniversaries	349
The Church Attendance Problem...	349
The Poor in Great Cities	350
Our Manchester Letter	351
The Duty of our Churches in Relation to the Masses of the People	352
Changed Methods to suit Changed Condi- tions of Sunday School Work	354

OCCASIONAL NOTES

CORRESPONDENCE:—

The Rev. P. T. Forsyth—Explanation ...	356
--	-----

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE:—

British and Foreign Unitarian Association	357
The Sunday School Association	366
The Manchester Domestic Mission	368

REVIEWS:—

Christ our Ideal: an Argument from Analogy	368
Short Notices	370
The Magazines	270

THE ANNIVERSARIES.

YEAR after year we have had the gratification of recording the growing interest and success of our anniversary meetings, and every year of late we are almost irresistibly compelled to say that this is the best of the long series. This year the annual meetings of our two principal societies have been full of interest and animation, and certainly indicate an increasing, instead of a diminishing interest in the liberal cause, both in religion and education. The Liverpool Conference, as we anticipated, so far from unfavourably affecting the attendance at our London meetings, has given them new life and vigour, and the presence of such distinguished representatives of brethren and fellow-workers in America and Holland as Dr. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE and Dr. HUGENHOLTZ added new dignity and wider interest to the various proceedings of the week. They brought home to us in the most effective way possible that we are not members of a small English denomination with somewhat circumscribed Nonconformist traditions, but that we are taking part in that great and widespread liberal religious movement which is represented by some of the foremost theologians and the freest and most progressive Churches in America, France, Germany, and Holland, and which has also a few isolated representatives in Italy, Sweden, Spain, and Iceland.

The full reports we have given of the meetings will sufficiently tell their own tale this week, and we must reserve our estimate of the actual results and hopeful promise for another occasion.

Dr. FREEMAN CLARKE in his noble sermon on Wednesday, of which we give a full abstract, and which will soon be in the hands of our readers, struck the right key note, and clearly pointed out the great work that lies before us when it said that "men want more religion and not less, and until we can give them more we have no real hold on them." Unitarianism under its present leaders and with the higher tone and impulse given to it by our own revered MARTINEAU, and by divines of only less genius and influence in America, is rapidly moving in this direction. It was only the unavoidable necessity of a stormy controversial age that forced us into an attitude of antagonism and consequent isolation. We are thankfully entering into the labours of our fathers, and learning the deeper lesson that every great reform comes not to destroy, but to fulfil. The world is longing not so much for a new theology—that is coming through all the varied influences of science, art, literature, and philosophy—it is longing for a new and higher religion, in which purely logical and intellectual differences, important as they are for individual thinkers, will be subordinated to a deeper unity of the spirit in the bonds of an all-pervading charity.

The Report of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association tells its own story of good work vigorously undertaken and faithfully carried on, not always under circumstances of encouragement as to immediate visible success. The rule we would urge upon the attention of the Committee,—if it is not presumptuous to offer any advice to so experienced a body,—is never to attempt to establish a new congregation without a reasonable prospect of success, and never to allow an old-established congregation to fall without making every effort to sustain it. The speeches on the various resolutions that followed the report were of a high order, and the animated discussion on the Oath question will serve to show that the denomination, as a whole, is thoroughly sound on the principle of full and unfettered religious liberty. The action of the Association in this matter will not, we hope, be mistaken by any candid observers outside our own communion. It indicates a profound faith in God and the triumph of His truth, and a belief that this faith is strongest and deepest when combined with the fullest liberty, political and religious, for those who reject it. We confess that for our own part we should have preferred a somewhat different wording of the amendment which Mr. GORDON succeeded in carrying, with the evident general concurrence of the meeting. The words "profession of Atheism" limit the question unnecessarily to those who dogmatically reject all belief in God—a much smaller number than those who maintain that there is no sufficient evidence of the existence of GOD. Granting that a resolution was desirable as indicating the desired opinion of a religious body, we have reason to believe that many of our friends would have preferred to take the broader ground, that "no religious test should be allowed to deprive any man of his full civil and political rights and privileges."

The Conference on Thursday was also a deeply interesting and animated meeting, and was a decisive proof of the new conviction that has lately grown up amongst us, that no Church deserves to live unless it works for the people and not for a class only, and makes its appeal first of all to the deep religious sentiments and wants of our common humanity. It was gratifying to find that at this Conference the number of laymen who spoke greatly exceeded the number of ministers, and their excellent speeches sufficiently disproved a humorous remark of one of the speakers at a subsequent meeting, that our laymen cannot talk—not always quite so well perhaps as himself.

The Soiree at Cannon-street Hotel was also a great success, both in regard to numbers, and the character of the very able speeches of our distinguished visitors and of some of the most prominent of our own ministers. We have seldom, if ever, seen so large a number present at any meeting of Unitarians in London; and a very gratifying and successful feature in the proceedings was the delightful concert, most efficiently conducted by amateurs belonging to three of our Churches—including one of our best known ministers—and by two or three eminent vocalists and instrumentalists.

The Sunday School Association is holding its annual meeting while we are writing these lines, and whatever comments may be needed must obviously be reserved for our next number.

And so another year's meetings have come and gone, inspiring those who took part in them, and those who read our full reports, with new heart and hope for the duty that lies before them, in which the higher religious reformation is to go hand in hand with practical work in the larger service of humanity.

THE CHURCH ATTENDANCE PROBLEM.

I.—NON-ATTENDANCE OF YOUNG PEOPLE.
THE important matter of the attendance of the people on public worship is engaging the serious attention of all sects and parties at the present time. The Independents made it a prominent topic at the late meeting of the Congregational Union in London. The complaint of non-attendance is not confined to any denomination; all suffer from it in varying degrees, so that it is evident the causes of this great defection lie outside the methods and services of all Churches alike. The Independents discussed it pretty fully at their recent anniversary. Three papers were read bearing on the question; the first on "The Failure of the Churches to Retain the Young People brought up in the Sunday-Schools," the second on "Intellectual Obstacles to Attendance on Public Worship," the third on "Moral Obstacles." The reading of these papers was followed by an interesting discussion, in which several leading ministers took part. We purpose reviewing briefly what was said, and adding such comments of our own as the opinions expressed may suggest.

The first paper, by the Rev. W. HEWGILL, of Farnworth, dealt with an aspect of the question which has frequently been the subject of grave consideration. How to retain the young people and induce them to become members of the congregations is no new difficulty. Fifty years ago it was felt and deplored, and was a stock subject at congregational meetings and Sunday-school conferences which were then held. Accordingly, Mr. HEWGILL starts with saying there is nothing new in his theme. It is an old trouble which has been lamented year by year with, it would seem, very little beneficial result. We quite agree with him that "this question of the retention of young people in connection with our Church life and work is not one that can be settled in an off-hand sort of way by reference to some individual case, or on the basis of a few individual observations." The broad facts appear to be these:—According to the statistics of Sunday-school societies it is reasonable to assume that three-fourths of the existing population of Great Britain have been connected with Sunday-schools, and have received the religious training offered by these institutions. If the recent newspaper statistics, as tabulated by Mr. MEARNS, be at all a fair representation of what exists all over the country, there is not more than one-fourth of the population in attendance at public worship. In other words, for every person trained in Sunday-schools who has become connected with some Christian Church as worshipper or communicant, three who have thus been trained have dropped away into the world, and become, if not hostile, at least indifferent to the claims of religion upon their personal allegiance and service. So that only one out of four who have been the object of Sunday-school instruction and care retain any permanent connection with a Christian congregation. Commenting on this state of things Mr. HEWGILL remarks:—

There is hardly a graver problem for any of our Churches to consider than this, hardly one of more vital importance to any of them, be they Free Churches or Churches of the Establishment. Since all are alike affected by the state of things which is so general, we can hardly say that the said result has been brought about by any thing that is peculiar to one set of churches or another. The Church Catechism, the Assembly's Catechism, Watts's Catechism and Palmer's Catechism, the Prayer-book and Wesley's sermons, when these have been made the basis of Sunday-school instruction, or family training, have been followed by the same general result, as we see when none of these means have been employed. Apparently it is the same when the instruction has been supposed to be simply Biblical. If special theological and ecclesiastical opinions have been taught in the Sunday-schools and families of the Christian churches of this land, things have not fared any better than they have, where, as regards theology and church polity, the teaching has been perfectly powerless and colourless. Here the services of the Church have been elaborate, there they have been simple; in this Church they have been highly ritualistic, in that they have been as highly rationalistic with the same result."

We are sometimes told that what is wanted amongst ourselves to impress the minds of the young and keep them with us is more distinct doctrinal teaching—that one chief reason why so many of our young people leave us is because they get so little definite instruction in our views and principles. Their minds are not equipped or fortified on these matters, and hence they are easily led away to other Churches or become indifferent to all religious association. This appears plausible enough—but here is an orthodox minister who candidly admits that definite dogmatic teaching is followed by no better result than when such teaching is not given. Those who have been taught the Catechism and those who have simply read the Scriptures have alike fallen back into the world and become in after years lost to the Church. How great the falling off has been is evident from one fact, the present state of most church and chapel congregations which have had connected with them flourishing Sunday-schools for many years. A Sunday-school generation is reckoned at ten years. Every ten years there is a new generation of scholars. What a vast number then must pass through our large schools say in forty years. What becomes of them? Take Birmingham for example, where we have had large and flourishing schools for many years. If only half of those educated in them subsequently joined the congregations our present church buildings would not be half enough to accommodate the number of worshippers. The same no doubt may be said of our Sunday-schools in other towns, and this is the most discouraging fact in connection with them. On this point Mr. HEWGILL says:—"Those who should have been crowding our sanctuaries are conspicuous by their absence. We have large schools and small congregations; we spend much labour upon the young, and when they come to years of maturity they and the church are strangers to each other. Public worship seems to have no charm for them, and religious associations and institutions have no inspiring or restraining influence for them." Is this our misfortune or our fault? We think, indeed, it is less our fault than our misfortune. "It is easy," as our friend says, "to enumerate a variety of causes which tend to produce the result we all deplore, but I do not think it is quite so easy to put one's finger on any one particular cause and say, 'There is the seat and heart of mischief; cure that, and all will be well.'" One cause, no doubt, is the irreligious character of the homes of vast numbers of the people. The home influences are not of a kind to strengthen the impression which it is sought to make in the school on Sunday. Quite the contrary. A better result can scarcely be expected till school teaching and influence are seconded by home teaching and influence. The parents must co-operate with the school teachers, set them the example of attendance on public worship, and encourage them to take an interest in the congregation and its work. At present how few parents do this! The vast majority are content with packing the children off to school, more to get them out of the way than for anything else.

Another point is this: the leading members of our congregations take too little personal interest in the Sunday-school. How often is it the case that they are never seen there from one year's end to another. The whole thing is left entirely, as far as personal interest is concerned, to the superintendent and to the teachers. If they visited the school, took notice of the scholars, and as they saw them growing up to manhood and womanhood manifested a warm personal interest in their welfare and prospects, we are assured that many would be kept with us who now wander away.

Again, might not the present Sunday-school teaching be supplemented by some higher kind of instruction suitable to the growing intelligence of the age, and adapted to the wants of young people? Is there not great room for improvement in this direction? Such instruction, however, can be given only by the most cultured members of our congregations, and unfortunately it is they who so seldom take a personal interest in the school.

Once more, there should be more frequent communion between the elder scholars and the adult members of the congregation. They should be brought more into contact. The young should be introduced to the elder members of the congregation, and be led to feel that they are their friends. The School and the Church keep too much apart. There needs to be a strong tie between them, and only personal interest and sympathy can create that tie. A simple confirmation service has been recommended as a kind of formal step from the school to the congregation, and certainly it is worth a trial. But its good effect will depend on its being supplemented by the personal sympathy and consideration to which we have referred. If these means were adopted generally by our congregations, though they would not cure the defection we deplore, they would, we are persuaded, lessen it in an appreciable degree.

THE POOR IN GREAT CITIES.

THE recent highly interesting meeting of the London Domestic Mission was productive of an informal discussion as to the remedies called for in relation to the dwellings of the poor and the enormous rents exacted from them. Mr. POPE, in his report, undesignedly started the discussion. Struck, as every sensitive visitor must be, by witnessing the state of the poor in their homes, and the exorbitant price they must pay to secure shelter and space for their families, he naturally turned his thoughts to the powers the Legislature can exercise, and suggested that from that source an adequate remedy should be sought. To this suggestion Dr. MARTINEAU took exception, pointing out forcibly that the evil of overcrowding ultimately sprung from the absence of self-restraint, such as is widely practised by the middle classes in relation to marriage. Mr. PICTON, on the other hand, contended that, though the standard of living had risen with the advance of Christian civilisation, it had not risen in proportion to the needs of the working-classes, and did not, as it ought to do, enable them to provide for the education of their children. He further contended that the rich in this country, especially the owners of house property, demanded more for their capital than they were entitled to. The discussion thus initiated was necessarily brief and incomplete, and left ample room for further development as well as criticism.

First, then, as to overcrowding and high rents. Can the Legislature prevent either the one, or the other, or both? Can it step in and say to the landlord, "You shall only exact so much," and to the tenant, "You need only pay so much"? The present Government is attempting this experiment in Ireland as regards land, under fearful pressure. Its success or failure cannot yet be safely predicted. If economic laws be valid in Ireland, as elsewhere, we fear that a large measure of failure must eventually result from Government interference. The Land Act cannot lessen the competition for land. The competitors may continue to be as numerous as ever, and a year or two of unfavourable seasons may see the new arrangements break down from the incompetency of the tenant—perhaps his reluctance—to pay the rent fixed by the law. But no one as yet proposes that in this country the principle of the Irish Land Act should be applied to house property. The one, indeed, inferentially suggests the other. But we are not without an actual experiment in regard to house property—issuing from the Act passed some few years ago, and known as the Artisans Dwelling Act, promoted by Sir RICHARD CROSS. So far as that well-intended measure was designed to remove unhealthy dwellings, it has partially succeeded in the metropolis; but so far as it was designed to raise artisans' dwellings of a suitable kind on the spaces cleared, it has as yet proved a total failure. Nay, even in a sanitary point of view, it has proved a strong temptation to owners of small property to allow such property to fall into a ruinous and even filthy state, in order to come under the provisions of the Act, which entitle the owners to compensation for its removal. Then the clearings on a large scale, as in Whitechapel, for example, have operated in two ways detrimental to the interests of those for whose benefit the Act was passed. The removal of so many dwellings only increased the competition for houses and rooms in the surrounding districts, and raised the rents of large numbers of tenants not otherwise interested in the Act; and, further, the cleared land acquired a sudden and greatly-increased value—a value altogether too high to serve as building sites for the working classes. The Peabody trustees have, indeed, acquired some of the sites thus cleared at much below their commercial value; and the ratepayers of the metropolis will have to pay the difference between the lower amount and the market price of the land. In fact, the Artisans Dwelling Act is, so far, a failure, and a warning against Legislative interference in this direction. The several companies that have taken this matter in hand have been doing the work far more effectually on a simply commercial basis, impelled, no doubt, by motives of benevolence as well. Indeed, the Peabody Fund, if it had been administered from the beginning on these twofold grounds, would have proved far more efficient in promoting the object of the munificent donor. A larger annual rental from its dwellings, inhabited by a class quite above the very poor, and well able to take care of themselves, would have enabled the trustees to build more dwellings, and in this way have reduced the excessive competition that arises from a wholly inadequate supply of house room.

Mr. PICTON broached an idea, to us very singular as coming from a man of his clear and forcible intellect, namely, that the "rich demanded more for their capital than they were entitled to." Surely labour falls under the economic law of supply and demand as much as house property; and there is as much competition amongst capitalists themselves as amongst any other class. It is not in the power, save in rarely exceptional cases, for the capitalist to fix his own profits. He has to study the state of the market for his goods, and he has to meet the wants of the buyer. A small addition to the price of an article, such as cotton goods, for instance, might materially check its sale, and compel the master possibly either to reduce wages or close his mills for a time, unless he is to see his capital wasted altogether. It is not always by the articles he makes that his wealth accumulates. A small profit derived from each workman, where a large number of hands are employed, will give him, it may be, a good surplus at the end of a prosperous year. This surplus he either devotes to increase his business or invests in some other speculation and, if fortunate, he will thus add more and more to his income. It should also be borne in mind that profits and accumulations, however large, are not hoarded, but are placed chiefly through banks in other hands, at interest, to carry on other branches of trade, and in this way give it employment to hands not the employer's own. At all events, we hold that Mr. PICTON's idea of an employer's duty to give more wages than the state of the market practically fixes for him is inadmissible. As an act of benevolence an employer may, if so disposed, give an occasional bonus to his workpeople; but if he does this systematically in the shape of permanently higher wages than the labour market admits, he would very probably before long exhaust his capital, and have to dismiss his hands altogether.

In speaking of the "standard of living," as not admitting of a working man's children being educated, save at the cost of the State or from private benevolence, Mr. PICTON has to be reminded of the "Drink Bill." About two years before the School Board was founded in the metropolis Mr. G. T. BARTLEY published a remarkable little pamphlet called "A Square Mile of East London." Mr. BARTLEY gave in this production his own actual experience of several days' residence in the East End. He carefully investigated and tabulated his personal observations and calculations. He brought out this fact, amongst others, that there were 320 public-houses and beer-houses in this square mile; he estimated their receipts, under the mark, we believe, at £450,000 per annum. He found the educational needs of the district very low; but, he said, in substance, let only one penny in each sixpence be saved from drink, and it will give me a sum by which I will undertake to provide for the education of every child now neglected, including the building of schools and all needful appliances, personal and otherwise, in the square mile thus investigated. Now, it is true that, even if the whole of the drink expenditure were thus saved, it would scarcely provide the ninepence per week—about the amount needful for the cost of each child's education. Yet it may be assumed that the self-denial and self-restraint consequent on such an application of the drink money would equally affect other relations of human life; and the really thrifty, self-denying parents, whose marriages would not be of the kind referred to by Dr. MARTINEAU, would not, after all, find the education of their children out of their own resources an impossibility. Indeed, a large class of the community, whose incomes are, perhaps, not much above those of the higher working classes, have hitherto done and still do this—we mean the lower middle class. Finally, we entirely go with Dr. MARTINEAU in his view of not turning the minds and expectations of the people to the State to do for them which it is their primary and imperative duty to do, if possible, for themselves. The "moral wrong" to which Mr. PICTON referred lies, after all, not so much ultimately in the mass we call "Society" as in the individual men and women constituting that mass. Their power over themselves and their happiness is even greater than that of Queen, Lords, and Commons.

C. L. C.

OUR MANCHESTER LETTER.

MAY 31, 1882.

Manchester must have a stimulating atmosphere, for nothing can be done here without plunging into it as if it formed the one sole object of life for the time being. Here, for instance, we have Whitsuntide, which might not inappropriately be termed the children's week. From Sunday morning till late on the following Saturday night the pursuit of pleasure is kept up with a vigour, the consequences of which are seen in the languor and thin attendance at our Sunday-schools and churches on the Sunday succeeding—teachers and scholars alike having exhausted themselves. In these things, as usual in all other things, the Unitarians lead the way, however they may be followed and surpassed by others. On Sunday last the schools belonging to our various churches walked in separate processions to the Free Trade Hall, where the annual service was held. The famous and capacious hall was crowded by the children, their teachers and relatives. As each person had a flower in their dress, and the platform was set out with a handsome decoration of shrubs and flowers, the sight of the whole was a very pleasing one. But the sweetest and most beautiful flowers of all were the healthy smiling faces of the children themselves. I could not help thinking of the lines of Ebenezer Elliott in the People's Prayer as I looked at them:—

"Flowers of Thy Heart O God are they,
Let them not pass like weeds away,
Their heritage a winter's day."

How radiant they looked, and how their little hearts seemed full of joy—there was not one in the thousands there that I saw that did not seem to overflow with happiness. And though neither the hymns that were sung nor the tunes to which they were set were equal to some of the former years—at least, to my liking—yet the voices by which they were sung, and the harmony kept was so wonderful, considering the number of the different schools present, that it became so intense a delight listening that one fairly forgot to share in the singing a great part of the time. If some of our "fearsome" friends who suppose we have no hold over the future could have been present, perhaps they might have been disabused of some of their hopelessness, and have sent a silent prayer of thankfulness to heaven that they had found out their mistake. The Rev. T. E. Poynting conducted the devotional service, and the Rev. J. T. Marriott gave the address. Everybody left the hall in excellent spirits, some to hasten to the evening services at their own special place of worship, and others to ramble in the parks, and others again to take tea and spend the evening with friends and talk over the events of the day.

On the Monday forenoon the forty schools belonging to the Episcopal churches in Manchester had their turn out and procession from Albert-square to the Cathedral. Over 20,000 met in the fine square and sung their hymns there. The singing was far from what it ought to have been for so musical a city as Manchester. Each school seemed to have its own idea of the time which ought to be kept, which perhaps symbolised the present theological state of "the church;" or was it too much to expect so large a number of children should sing together harmoniously? However that may be, I have heard years ago as large a number, if not larger, do so in the Piece Hall, Halifax. Of course only a select portion of the 20,000 could get into the Cathedral, where an address was delivered by the Rev. James Hope, vicar of St. Margaret's, Whalley Range. Of course I was not admitted, but judging of the report an Episcopalian friend gave, it was historical, exhortative, and orthodox to the full length. One thing I noted specially in the processions, both in our own and in that of our Episcopalian brethren, the almost entire absence of the elder scholars. Whether it was so in former years I do not remember, but this year they were conspicuous by their absence. Now what does this mean? Is it that our young people are getting ashamed of their connection with the Sunday-school? If so, it is an exceedingly bad sign of the times; for they who are ashamed of their connection with the Sunday-school this year will next year become ashamed of their connection with the church—any church at all I mean, whether liberal or orthodox. Or is it that the age is getting weary and ashamed of pageants and public show, and fuss, in any shape, and forming an instinctive preference for quieter methods? or is the hurry and drive of life as a general thing leading to a dislike to public display? If this is so, it is strange that it should begin with the young in the first flush of their morning energy and enthusiasm. At all events, I do know this, that one of the youths, who is a member of an elder class in one of our own schools, being asked why he was not in his place in the procession as he ought to have been, and if he was becoming ashamed of his principles and of his school, he answered quite promptly, "Neither of one nor the other, but I hate a great fuss and row, and I do not see the use of this thing." Of course he was reasoned with, but he could not be made to see his error. This one young man, I dare say, let out the state of mind of many others. However that may be, I think it should be seen to in the meantime against another year.

On Friday the Roman Catholic Sunday-schools are to have their procession, and they will turn out to the number of several thousands. In previous years they have walked through the densely populated district of Ancoats and neighbourhood; but such is the supposed state of exasperation of feeling against the Irish it is reported that they do not intend taking their usual route this year. Of course it is the duty of the police authorities to protect them as well as others, and I hope they will not turn out of their usual course. I do not believe that any attack will be made upon them, for though the murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke has produced a great deal of feeling, yet reason has been allowed so to predominate that the great bulk of Irish people have been exonerated from blame for the foul crimes of the few. If our Irish brethren would be a little less loud and a bit more reasonable in their speech and conduct—I mean those who reside in our midst—I, for one, have not the slightest doubt that the difference between the two islands would soon be adjusted. But it is a curious illustration of the unexpected issue of events that the cowardly murder of two men in Dublin should thus interfere with a Sunday-school procession in Manchester.

For the rest of the week (I write this on Wednesday morning) the Sunday school children of Manchester will be making excursions to near and distant places by lorry, rail and water. Up early in the morning many will go as far as the Cumberland lakes, others to different parts of Wales; while Derbyshire is considered only next door. Only with late Saturday night or early Sunday morning will the Whitsuntide "outings" be considered at an end.

Some of our friends in different parts of the country may perhaps be wondering that the two churches, Longsight, Ardwick and Miles Platting, have not laid the foundation-stones of their new buildings before now. It is a long time now since the big bazaar in the Free Trade Hall, and there is yet no public sign of the first object for which it was held being begun. I assure you, sir, that the preparations for beginning are almost completed, and in a week or two announcements will be made that will put all who are interested in possession of the knowledge when and how the project will be carried out. The plans are fixed upon, but some preliminaries, such as getting them passed by the Local Board, have yet to be gone through.

Another matter I may as well mention. A committee has been formed for the purpose of presenting a testimonial to the Rev. G. H. Wells, M.A., late of Gorton, now of Brooklands, Cheshire. He is a man to whom our liberal churches owe much in Lancashire. For forty-four years he was minister of Gorton. When he came to it he found a small church, a small building to meet in, and a small Sunday-school. At the end of his ministry he leaves one of the handsomest church edifices belonging to the body, a large church, and Sunday-school, and everything in a flourishing condition. His fine business abilities have enabled him as secretary to the Widows' Fund to add to its wealth, and make it really a boon and a power in connection with our denomination in Lancashire and Cheshire. He has well earned his retirement, and the ease of his later days—if so ardent a worker knows how to take it—and his friends can but hope that he will be spared many years to enjoy it before he is called to his final rest. The form the testimonial will take will be a portrait painted by an eminent artist, and is to hang in the Memorial Hall, forming a constant incentive to the students of the H. M. B. to follow so worthy an example.

May I be allowed to mention that we have had two books published in Manchester just lately, which though they bear local titles are of general interest? The first is by Leon H. Grindon, the eminent Manchester Botanist, "Country Rambles, and Manchester Walks and Wild Flowers." It is characterised by all the wealth of a chaste poetic imagination, and the special and reliable facts, stated in a clear and popular style, belonging to the author's professional pursuits. It is a delightful book, and might help to disabuse the minds of some of your readers of the idea that Lancashire is a region bare of vegetation, and always enveloped in a thick fog of smoke, and with none but rivers like the Irwell and Medlock as they run through Manchester. The second is a book alike for the theologian, the lover of real history, and for all who have an interest in seeing how the supernatural in man's nature throws itself out into the physical world around and invests the outward with its own life. The material world has shown itself in many shapes to the eyes of ignorance, and in the twilight of the mind has taken strange forms, for when the eyes of intellect are dim they see things in a distorted shape. The book I allude to is "Lancashire Legends," by John Harland, F.S.A., and T. T. Wilkinson, F.R.S.A. It is a book to help the thoughtful reader to understand the ideas, the habits of thinking, the manners and customs of our ancestors, far better than the kind of events which historians generally record about kings, generals, bishops, and similar orders of beings. The two books ought to go together in order that the outsider may be led to get a little clear understanding of Lancashire. W. M.

THE DUTY OF OUR CHURCHES IN RELATION TO THE MASSES OF THE PEOPLE.

BY THE REV. J. T. WHITEHEAD.

This subject appears to me almost identical with the one on which papers were read at the recent Conference in Liverpool by Mr. Armstrong and Mr. Bartram; and I should probably have avoided it on that ground, had the choice of a topic been left entirely to myself. But when your Committee did me the honour of asking me to open this morning's conference, they especially suggested this subject as the pressing one of the time, and one on which, in their opinion, much more needs to be said; and I willingly submit to their judgment. In one respect the previous discussions may be of advantage, inasmuch as they render it unnecessary for me to re-open the question ab initio. I shall not attempt to add anything to what has been already well said as to the responsibility that rests upon us in this matter, the need of genuine earnestness and enthusiasm as our motive power, and the certainty of failure unless we are willing to make some personal sacrifice of time, money, or labour. Assuming (as I trust I may safely do) that we fully recognise the fact that we have a duty in relation to the masses of the people, I would rather direct your attention to the practical difficulties which lie in the way of our fulfilment of that duty, in order that we may take counsel together how best to overcome them. The resolution of your Council, referred to in yesterday's Report, instructs the Executive Committee "to consider and report upon the practicability of an organised effort for giving services in some of the centres of trade, especially in London." I take it that the people whom we chiefly desire and hope to attract to such services are the hard-working, intelligent, respectable class of artisans. It is to them, we think, that our rational and practical views of religion would commend themselves if they could be induced to hear and consider them.

We have here no orthodox prepossessions to eradicate before we can sow our seed; we are not seeking to empty other churches in order to fill our own; for the class of which I speak, with few exceptions, stand aloof from all existing religious organisations, and are far more inclined to scepticism than to orthodoxy, to indifference than to bigotry. I take it also that we should not be content merely to bring together large numbers to hear the exposition of our opinions, and then allow them to drift away again into the outer darkness, forgetting and forgotten. We desire to bring them under permanent religious influences, and to induce them either to join our existing congregations or to form new ones.

And with reference to the former alternative, let us first ask why the result desired has not hitherto been obtained. Our churches have not been so crowded as to have no room for large accessions from the working class; they have not been closed against them; but yet the men and women of that class have, as a rule, stayed away and left us to ourselves. Why is it? If you ask them the question, you may receive varying replies; but the one which I have always found predominate is this—"We keep away from church and chapel because we feel are not wanted there, and are out of our place while there. Your handsome buildings, and elaborate services, and highly-educated ministry, are not for such as we. The cultured, intellectual, well-bred gentlemen and ladies who form the bulk of your congregations and manage their affairs have nothing in common with us. We might go to the same church for years, and they would hardly be conscious of our existence. And we have too much pride to expose ourselves to this humiliation." No doubt there is considerable exaggeration in this, but is there not also a basis of truth? Before our ministers are asked to make special efforts to draw "the masses of the people" into closer relation with our churches, would it not be expedient for our laity to put the question seriously before themselves, whether they are prepared to welcome them frankly and heartily, to accept them as co-partners in congregational work and congregational government, and to merge distinctions of class, and birth, and culture in the unity of a common discipleship to Christ, and a common brotherhood as sons of God? It is only on this condition, I feel firmly convinced, that any large additions can be made to our present congregations from the class in question. The feeling of caste is not, I hope, so strong as it once was, but it exists still; and though much has been done of late years to break down the barriers which separate one class from another, they have by no means been destroyed, nor can they ever perhaps entirely disappear, being to a certain extent natural and inevitable. We must go, however, much further than we have gone hitherto in the direction of toning down class-distinctions and class-prejudices, before "the masses of the people" will feel thoroughly at home with us. Even more difficult than the task of conquering these prejudices in ourselves will be the task of bringing the people to believe that they are conquered—that the old spirit of exclusiveness is gone, never to return. I must say I do not think that so vast a change can be speedily accomplished; and I do not, therefore, anticipate an immediate or considerable absorption of the working-class element into our more wealthy congregations. Nor am I quite certain that such an amalgamation, if it were possible, would be found to work well in practice. Our form of worship has gradually grown up in conformity with our wants and tastes; will it suffice for the wants, or suit the taste, of those whose education, circumstances, tone of thought, are necessarily so different from ours? And if we alter it to suit their needs, may it not cease to meet our own? Is it possible to frame a service, or to preach sermons, which shall be equally acceptable to the cultured and the uncultured, to the learned and the unlearned? Do not misunderstand me. I am not upholding the artificial distinctions of modern society, which I heartily dislike and despise; I speak of real differences, which it would be folly to deny or to overlook. Nor am I inventing imaginary difficulties; I believe more than one case might be cited where the admixture of diverse elements has proved disastrous to the welfare of a congregation.

But can we not (it may be said), without interfering in any way with the work and worship of our established congregations, give in addition special services, to which "the masses of the people" may be invited, and which may be made both attractive and instructive to them? I need not discuss the question; it has been practically answered in the affirmative at Leicester, at Nottingham, at Kidderminster, and elsewhere. It has been proved that the very people to whom we wish most to deliver our message will come to hear it if proper means are taken to draw them together; and we owe a deep debt of gratitude to those who have by their courage and earnestness solved what some thought an insoluble problem. But when we have organised our special services, whether in public halls or in our own chapels; when we have brought hundreds, and even thousands, for the first time within reach of our influence what is to be the outcome of our efforts? These services, as was said at Liverpool, impose on the ministers who undertake them an additional burden of work, such as only the strongest can bear; and if they are genuinely and permanently successful, they involve nothing less than the establishment of two distinct congregations under one ministry, each with its own separate institutions and activities. No minister, however vigorous and devoted, could long sustain such a demand on his powers; while the influence he has acquired over his audience may be so largely personal that he may not find it easy to transfer it to a coadjutor. Courses of occasional lectures present no such difficulty; they are comparatively easy to organise, but they are in like proportion ineffective and disappointing. Our duty in relation to the masses of the people will never be adequately discharged by their agency alone.

All these various considerations appear to point in one direction; towards the desirability, namely, of establishing in our centres of trade, and particularly in London, large working-class congregations, independent of those already existing, and intended to become self-supporting. That the materials for such congregations exist in abundance we have long known; that we can work on those materials, if we set about it in the right way, and with the requisite energy and faith, the experiments just alluded to sufficiently prove; that a congregation composed entirely of these materials may live and flourish without external support is shown by many examples in the populous manufacturing districts of the north. Our Domestic Missions, admirable as they are in their own sphere, do not exactly meet the case we are now considering, nor need the fact that they do not gather large numbers of the artisan class within their influence discourage us from further effort. They are intentionally located in the very poorest districts, they seek to aid and instruct the very poor; and, as was said three years ago by one of our oldest and most experienced missionaries, they have been sought by many "mainly as a kind of out-door relief institution." Now the people whom we want to reach and to interest ask for no charitable doles, and will not connect themselves with anything that bears on its front an eleemosynary character.

To carry out effectually such a scheme as I have mentioned we need (1) ample funds, (2) a good and bold leader, and (3) energetic and devoted helpers. There are men among us who are both popular speakers and excellent organisers, who are able to explain their religious belief clearly and simply, who are, above all, full of fire and earnestness, and therefore able to kindle the fire of devotion in others. If one such man could be induced to undertake the task of bringing together "the masses of the people," with the object of ultimately building up a permanent religious society, there ought to be no difficulty, either in London or any of our large towns, in providing him with proper means for his noble work. If we are really in earnest about the matter we should both pay him liberally and support him heartily; if we are not, we only waste time in discussing the subject at all. He would need personal help at the very outset, for his first action would probably be to organise a house-to-house visitation in the district selected as his field of labour, with direct personal invitation to come and hear him; and for that he would have to depend on the members of neighbouring congregations. Are our younger men and women ready to do their part with generous enthusiasm? Are our wealthier men prepared to say that such an enterprise shall not languish for want of money, that it shall be carried out ungrudging and unflinchingly? If they are, I cannot doubt that it would succeed; but a half-hearted, timid attempt to deal with a problem so great and important would ensure and deserve failure. We had far better do nothing.

The prominence given of late to this and kindred subjects seems to show that we are awakening to a perception of the work that lies before us, and the necessity laid upon us. It is impossible to believe that a large class of men, neither morally degraded nor intellectually deficient, can be content with their present condition of irreligion. The old creeds have lost their hold upon them; the old forms do not attract them; but depend upon it, they are waiting and longing for some truer and brighter religious faith. Have we not that to offer to them which no other Christian Church can offer—a belief that rests on no outward authority, and shuns no inquiry, and dreads no increase of knowledge—a devoutness which has no tinge of superstition, and a zeal without sectarian bigotry? And is not the feeling growing and strengthening among us, that somehow or other that offer must be made?—that we have a long neglected duty to fulfil, which will brook no further delay? I have tried to the best of my ability to give a practical direction to this feeling. Very possibly I may be mistaken in the conclusions at which I have arrived, but I lay them before you as my contribution to the discussion of a question at once supremely important and supremely difficult, and it is by speaking out each our individual thought, and then amicably and frankly comparing our ideas, that we shall best arrive at a true and wise conclusion.

BY THE REV. W. COPELAND BOWIE.

The subject which we are met this morning to discuss has already occupied the attention of our churches, and it has also been the topic of the day at several of the annual meetings of other religious bodies. It is hardly possible, therefore, for one who has had such a short ministerial experience as myself to throw any new light on the problem, or suggest any original methods for dealing with it. My lot has been cast among the masses of the people in London; but though I have had a few opportunities of studying their religious wants, I appear here as a learner, and not as a teacher, on this large and difficult theme.

The first essential towards any fruitful treatment of the subject is a determination not to give way to any feverish excitement. The religious condition of the masses is deplorable enough, but there is no occasion for losing our heads and hearts over it. I altogether dissent from the notion that the moral and spiritual life of the working classes in this country is in a state of decline. Except during a few periods in which great awakenings took place, the masses of the people in England have never been deeply attached to any religious organisation. The ages in which religion seems to have had a firmer hold on the life and thought of the nation than it has at present were ages in which the Church practically meant the State, and when the clergy were not only the spiritual guides, but also the legislators, the judges, and the almsgivers of the country. There is no reason why we should wring our hands in despair; on the contrary, there are many reasons why we should take courage and face the question hopefully.

I further dissent from treating this subject as if the masses were the only people who are living in moral and spiritual darkness. The middle and upper classes have not by any means entered the Kingdom of Heaven yet. It is simply because the democracy form the largest, and, in view of their extended political privileges, the most powerful class, that their religious welfare demands the serious attention of the Unitarian and other liberal Churches.

Before beginning to do anything we must clearly make up our minds upon what we want to do. If we merely wish to attract a crowd of people to our churches, then the work is not worth doing. Only devise something a little more ridiculous and sensational than anyone else, only dismiss the present tutors and professors of our colleges and appoint a few men who are adepts at manufacturing clowns and buffoons, and we shall soon count our numbers by the thousand in London and other large cities. I hope we shall not so far forget our traditions as to follow in the wake of those who, in spite of their successes, are degrading and vulgarising religion, and bringing it into contempt. What we, in common with all Christian churches, have got to do is to touch the minds, and hearts, and souls of the people,—to save them from their sins, to rescue them from their vices, to keep the lamp of their spirits burning. We must not go to the people as if we wanted them to confer a favour upon us by accepting our views or attending our services. If we have not a message for the mind, and heart, and soul of humanity, we had better leave this work alone. We want, by some means or other, to make men and women know and feel that virtue and piety can be reached, mankind served, and God loved by faithfulness to duty, by earnest effort, and by a reverent trust.

Our churches, I believe, are better fitted in many respects for taking up this work and carrying it forward successfully than any other body of churches in the land. Many of the intellectual, moral, and social tendencies of the age which operate in keeping the common people away from the Orthodox churches do not affect us at all. We have already adjusted our theology to the spirit of inquiry which finds expression in the scientific discoveries and speculations of the nineteenth century; and our religious principles are also in full sympathy with the spirit of humanity which animates many of the great social and political movements of our time. It is only necessary that we should endeavour to bring our practical methods into fuller harmony with our theoretical opinions. It is absurd to say that Unitarians have failed to reach the masses: they have never yet seriously tried.

In seeking to invent means whereby we may let people know what we are, we need not begin by frightening ourselves with the magnitude of the task. We ought not to be discouraged by small results or even by partial failures. It is useless and hopeless to attempt this work, unless we are firmly persuaded that it is worth doing, and that it can be done. The elementary conditions of success are two—a deep and fervent faith in the truth and beauty and power of our own religious principles, and a deep and fervent faith in the possibilities of goodness and righteousness that lie hidden in every human soul. I wish to lay special emphasis on the second condition, because there is a good deal of practical scepticism among Unitarians in regard to it. Without this faith in the imperishable worth of the souls of our fellow men, nothing need be tried. It will never do to go in the name of religion to the working classes in order that we may patronise or pity them. If we do, they will despise us, or else they will despise themselves. We must go to them, to the worst of them, and treat them as brothers and sisters, as children of the same father, as heirs of the same destiny. Jesus recognised no caste save that of humanity, nor should we recognise anything narrower if we aspire to carry on his work.

In attempting to improve our methods and extend our machinery, we must carefully study the dispositions, habits, and outward surroundings of the people we desire to influence. "The masses of the people" is a phrase which covers a very large and indefinite class. One might divide it and sub-divide it a great many times. Taking the working class population in the neighbourhood of my own chapel, for example, one might roughly distinguish three grades, differing in intelligence, industry, sobriety, and thrift. One might call them the higher, middle, and lowest classes; and the interest which they severally take in religion varies considerably in each case. I find that 15 to 20 per cent. of the higher, 5 to 10 per cent. of the middle, and 1 to 5 per cent. of the lowest class are more or less connected with some place of worship. Curiously enough, however, the proportion of children who are allowed to attend some Sunday-school does not follow the same ratio. Nearly three-fourths, I believe, of the whole youthful population, ranging from five to twelve years of age, attend some Sunday-school in the district, and the lowest class furnishes quite as high an average as any of the other two classes. I regard this as a very important and hopeful fact. There is, as one might expect, a greater lack of principle, if I may so express it, among the children of the poorest and most degraded parents. They are apt to attend those schools whose managers give most summer excursions and Christmas treats, quite irrespective of any theological or ecclesiastical conditions that may linger round the places they attend.

When we mix with the people who do not associate themselves with any religious society we may roughly distinguish three groups.

1. There are a number of persons, usually men, who know a little about theological questions, and who occupy an attitude of antagonism to churches and parsons. They read the National Reformer, or the Freethinker, or the productions of Robert Ingersoll; and from these and similar publications they furnish themselves with a few stock difficulties, absurdities and horrors drawn from the Bible and from Orthodoxy. They form the secular, agnostic and atheistic element among the masses; and although I think its importance and influence are greatly overrated, it is doubtless a growing element.

2. There are, in our large cities especially, a very considerable number of people who openly and flagrantly violate the principles of morality and religion. They form the coarse, drunken, brutal, and vicious element in the community. I am not prepared to say that vulgarity, intemperance and scoundrelism are on the increase, but I imagine they are keeping pace with the population.

3. The secular and the depraved classes, however, even when taken together, only form a very small minority. The majority of the working-classes are not opposed to religion in any hostile sense. They have no serious theoretical objections to it, nor are their lives notoriously out of keeping with its spirit. They simply care nothing about it. They occupy a purely neutral and indifferent attitude.

It is apparent that the question is a very large and intricate one, and no cut-and-dry scheme that the wit of man could suggest would be likely to meet all the necessities of the case. The nature and wants of each particular neighbourhood must be considered separately. We must be prepared for a diversity of operations; for what might succeed admirably in one district might fail lamentably and disastrously in another.

By way of opening the discussion, I venture to throw out the following practical hints. They contain nothing original or startling, but they may be none the less valuable on that account.

To meet the wants of the sceptical classes, and those who are that way inclined, courses of winter-evening lectures on the historical, philosophical, and scientific aspects of religious thought might be instituted. If the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association could persuade the professors of our colleges, and a few other men who have specially studied those theories and discoveries which are supposed to cut away our belief in God, in the soul, and in immortality, to prepare and deliver such courses, and arrange for their publication in a cheap form, a good and useful service would be rendered to the cause of rational religion. I know some Unitarians, from very conscientious motives, would have us leave these people alone. But if we refuse to carry any message to them, what other Church is likely to present them with a theology which there is the remotest chance of their accepting?

To meet the wants of the degraded and criminal classes, nothing is likely to do so much good as the personal visitation and unwearyed labours of men and women with shrewd heads and large hearts. This work ought not to be left to a few domestic missions. Every church worthy of the name ought to have its domestic mission—its little band of workers who would make it their business to seek and save the lost. If Unitarians want to do this Christ-like work they must cease regarding their religion as a luxury to be enjoyed for their own benefit whenever they feel disposed. They must be prepared to accept its solemn and sacred responsibilities.

It is in trying to meet the wants of the large apathetic class that we are likely to experience most difficulty and require the greatest variety of suggestion and operation. We might begin by endeavouring to improve our present services. Without in any way degrading or vulgarising them, it might be possible, in many instances, to make them a little more interesting and helpful. Less conventionalism and more variety in our forms of worship, a more direct and simple style of pulpit address, a more frequent reference to the stubborn facts and experiences of every day life and their relation to religion, might tend to keep our present congregations together, and help to attract and interest some few others besides.

But although we improved the forms of our worship, and the character of our preaching, so as to bring them into more complete harmony with the life and thought and language of our own times, we should still be unable to catch the ear or touch the heart of the great body of the people. The masses are not prepared for our churches and chapels, and we must try to educate them through other channels. The very successful meetings that have been held in several large towns in connection with our body might well be tried in London and elsewhere on a more extended and permanent scale. Let the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association adopt Mr. Armstrong's suggestion, and secure the services of a few men for this very work, and, if the scheme be well and thoughtful and energetically conceived, our wealthy laity will find the funds.

In addition to these efforts, the better organisation of outdoor lecturing and preaching deserves more serious attention than it has yet received. There are several Unitarian laymen who might, and I believe would, help to carry on this special work. The working classes will listen to one who possesses ready utterance, warm sympathies, and practical knowledge; and they will hear him all the more gladly because he speaks as a man, and not as a hired servant. More value and permanence would be given to these efforts if a judicious selection of tracts were distributed among the more interested auditors, with the times and places of the Unitarian services in the district printed on them.

Our churches have never seriously tried, so far as I know, any general and systematic plan of district visiting. There are some neighbourhoods in which such a work would be useless and perhaps harmful; but the working classes would, I believe, encourage it, if it were done by the right people, at the right time and in the right spirit. Were such agencies established in connection with all our places of worship, and worked with the energy of men and women who had faith in God and in man, I am sure great good would result from their labours. In undertaking this work we ought to make it distinctly understood that our object is to reach those who are alienated from the ordinary churches and chapels, or who have never identified themselves with any religious society. Some of these visitors ought also to be able to speak a word of hope and comfort to the perplexed, the suffering, and the dying. It is a shame and a disgrace that this beneficent and holy work should be left almost entirely in the hands of those who hold the harshest and crudest theology, or of those who represent the mostly rannical ecclesiasticism.

Then, lastly, a more united, vigorous, and better organised effort ought to be put forth in order to keep and guide our elder scholars. It is estimated, as I mentioned before, that nearly three fourths of the whole youthful population in our working class districts pass through some Sunday-school; and yet the most successful churches do not succeed in retaining twenty per cent. of them, and the less successful churches lose them all. There are many difficulties to contend with, especially in London. The home influences and the social habits of the people often present serious and almost insuperable obstacles in the teacher's way. Perhaps a more careful organisation of classes for elder scholars, more frequent services adapted for the young, and a closer connection between school and congregation by means of some simple and earnest service, might help to make our Sunday-schools, what they ought to be, but what they never yet have been, the nurseries of our churches. This work among the young must occupy a far higher place in the thought and affection of the leading members of our congregations. It ought to command the best talent, the largest experience and the widest charity which our churches contain; instead of that ministers and superintendents have to content themselves with and be devoutly thankful for any sort of teachers they can lay their hands on. We want a new baptism of fire to descend upon the hearts of our people in regard to this matter.

With a little more individual faith and effort, with a deeper sense of our responsibility to God and to man, our churches might organise a religious movement, even with the means they possess, which, though it might not all at once attract the masses of the people, would slowly and steadily fill the heart and mind and soul of society with a higher and a better faith in human goodness and in the divine love. If we could only make the working classes feel that the religion of Jesus is in harmony with and tends to promote universal liberty and brotherhood, that it affords the best inducement to self-consecration, that it holds out the brightest hopes, that it enables them to think higher thoughts, feel better feelings, do nobler deeds, aspire after holier ideals—if we could only by our worship and our work reveal these things to them, then depend upon it their scepticism would soon change into belief, their misery into happiness, their indifference into enthusiasm.

CHANGED METHODS TO SUIT CHANGED CONDITIONS OF SUNDAY SCHOOL WORK.

BY THE REV. F. E. MILLSON.

The subject is wide, and the time placed at my disposal for this paper is short, twenty or twenty-five minutes at most. I can, under these circumstances, attempt nothing more than a brief statement, which may serve to guide that discussion from which, on these occasions, there is always most to be learned.

First, however, let me mention one unchanged—and, I trust, never to be changed—characteristic of our work, by which any improvements that we may attempt must be determined. Sunday-school work is a work of pure goodwill all through. There is no compulsion in the case of scholars, who come to be taught because it seems to them, or to their parents, to be worth their while to come. The thought, "It is worth while, our work meets a need which is not in any other way met," is the determining motive of the teacher. It is clear that, should any change take away this feeling of advantage on the part of the children, and of imperative duty on the teachers' part, our Sunday school work must come to an end.

Am I mistaken in saying that, so far as our Sunday-schools are engaged in making up for the defects of the elementary education of the poor they are being beaten out of the field by the success of the public elementary schools? That is the first of the changed conditions of our work of which I would speak. Long anticipated, it is now being forced on our attention. Not merely as places in which reading and writing, and arithmetic, with the elements of science and literature, may be learned, but as training schools for order and cleanliness, and civility, with personal care given by the teachers to the interests and home lives of the children, and with some cultivation of opportunities for social meetings, and for out-of-school pleasures, the day schools are, naturally, and through the well-meaning efforts of their teachers, filling the place in the child's life and affection, which the Sunday-school used to fill. This change is at hand. In some of our towns it is already making itself felt.

How may it be met? We are accustomed to think that when one call of duty is honourably silenced, its claim fulfilled, it is that other and more pressing calls may be more clearly heard. We believe that it is at once the reward and the privilege of the worker who has been trying to be faithful to the one duty, that he, sooner than others, hears the summons of the next. I trust that it may prove to be so in this case, and I think that now that the claim of the secular work is fully met, it is the claim of the distinctively religious work which becomes pressing.

Religious influence forms no part of the scheme of the Board School. It is not possible to include it within the external or the inner conditions of School Board work. Properly it is the work of the parent and of the home. But let anyone who knows the homes of the workers of our large towns ask himself how much endeavour to fulfil the duty of teaching the children even the elements of religion may be met with there, he will, I think, be forced sorrowfully to admit that there is very little indeed, and that year by year it becomes less. Family prayer, when parents and children go off at six o'clock to the mill, Bible reading, quiet counsel and advice, when, after a long day's work, the evening is spent in cleaning up the neglected house, how are they possible?

In this difficulty we see our call to work. I know that religious influence has been held to be the justifying excuse of our Sunday-school work. It must now become its substantial reality.

What change of method will this change of view and purpose involve? I think that on the very threshold of our work we shall meet and we shall have to conquer a difficulty, which is always urged wherever religious teaching is spoken of. We shall have to settle what religion we shall teach. A difficult thing to attempt. The only way that I know of settling that is by setting about it. By trying we shall learn. "Well begun is half done." Let me say—and I do it with a very profound sense of gratitude—that I can think of nothing which has done half so much to show us where we stand in the matter of religious opinion and conviction as that plain, personal, confidential statement of his own belief, made by Dr. Martineau in his address to his old pupils, and published under the title, "Loss and Gain in Recent Theology." A manifesto, a contribution to controversy, would have had but little influence, but from this simple personal confession we have gained a sense of the comparative unimportance of the opinions we have given up, and the value of the things which remain which could in hardly any other way have been brought to so many and so seemingly divergent minds. I have thought, if so much good has come from the attempt to realise and to state with plainness the things which we may reasonably believe, it would be a work as beneficial, and surely simpler far, to try to come by way of statement at some general agreement about the religion that we may teach. I would suggest that, setting out with the thought that it is religious influence, the work of bringing religion home to the children, that we have in view, we should provide a series of books as helps to the teacher who wishes to implant great aims, powerful motives, purity of life in the children's souls. It is, I know, but little that books can do to fill the place of personal influence and loving care; but I know, also, that by none is the want of suitable books more strongly felt than by some of those who seem best able to dispense with their use. We need books to awaken feeling, to guide conduct, to help in difficulties of thought and life—books bright and winning—literature, not "notes for lessons"—books written with reference to the various stages of Sunday-school work, so that, from the attractive child's book with stories of goodness, and little else than stories, up to the statement of religious truth as we have learned it, our opinions, if you like, with their grounds, and reasons, and arguments of defence, to serve as the guide of the elder scholars in our schools, the teacher and the class may be equipped for their work.

The preparation of books of this kind is a task for our best and most sympathetic minds. It is a work of difficulty, but surely not impossible. And let me say, it has been already accomplished, so far as two of its stages are concerned. If to Mr. Clodd's "Jesus of Nazareth" and Mr. Herford's "Story of Religion in England" you could add three books for elementary classes of various ages, and, at the other end of the series, a book of doctrine, and such a Story of the Church Universal as Professor Carpenter could, better than any one else, supply, you would have a series of books which would assist and guide our teachers in their difficult task of awakening veneration, and charity, and serious thoughtfulness. Let me briefly describe the books which the series of which I have spoken should include. First, for the little children there should be parables and stories, with pictures, in illustration of common childlike goodness. Would that the genius of Andersen might descend on some one and inspire such a book as he would have written! For children between the ages of eight and ten or twelve we need a book of patterns of goodness, stories from life, illustrating a child's temptations and its calls of duty.

The third book of the series should be a book of introduction to Bible reading. The words describe one of our most needed books, and the one which it may be found most difficult to supply. We have Bible primers, commentaries, and summaries. What we seem to me to need is something different from these. Before setting our children to study Bible fact, or fiction, as the case may be, we ought to teach them to understand the characteristic differences which separate Eastern and Western modes of thought. In our ignorance and neglect of these lie the roots of some of our mistakes about the Bible and of many of our difficulties. If in a book, which shall include a practical commentary on the Gospel narratives, we can frankly and simply state the characteristics of Eastern life and thought out of which miracle stories and exaggerated ethical maxims, and the unfounded structures of Messianic expectations come, we shall, I think, bring some help to the difficulties and the perplexities which now vex the souls of teachers and of taught alike. I hope that the Bible may take a larger place in our schools, and that our teachers may find in the wide and wealthy fields of our literature of poetry and fiction some of the best help of their labour. I might say much on these two points, but, remembering how much has been said, and how well, especially having in mind the valuable paper read by Miss Anna Swanwick before a meeting of the teachers in your London schools, I leave that part of my subject without further remark.

Before I pass from this subject of definite religious teaching I will mention two changes in the method of our schools which will, I think, be found needful. As things now stand, we try to test the value of the work done by periodical examinations. I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that this is a mistake—not that examinations are not good in themselves—but that in the present conditions of school life, it is impossible, it is almost undesirable to try, to get the children to submit to them. Examinations, standards to be passed, cram for the dreaded test, form so large a share of the day-school work, they bring so much anxiety to the children, whose money value to the managers and credit with their teachers, and the power to earn money for home all depend upon passing the examinations, that anything which adds to the anxieties of the already overburdened children must be avoided in our Sunday-schools. But that which we cannot do by the examination system we may, I think, do well, and with fair promise of success, by making your course of teaching come to a close in a Service of Confirmation, a welcome given by the Church to those who have prepared themselves for its work. A homely, easy inquiry into the fitness of the preparation, made by the minister of the congregation, with no report to state its results, and no prizes to be striven for, will do the work of the examination; and the service of confirmation can never be anything but an impressive, an elevating, it may be a consecrating, approval of faithful endeavour.

It is a matter of detail, on which I need not enlarge; but I must say one word on the desirability of giving to each class a class-room of its own. If the scholar can have some share in the work of furnishing and adorning it, it will gather homelike associations in their thoughts and affections, which may prove to be not the least valuable of their Sunday-school gains.

I pass to the second change which has come over the conditions of our Sunday-school scholars, and which, also, seems to me to call for some change in our methods and plans. I mean the increasing barrenness and unattractiveness of the home life of our workers in the large towns. I need not attempt any detailed proof of the fact. It is becoming painfully evident to many of us that even well-intentioned attempts to relieve the condition of the poor, such as the political and social clubs, with their attractions and somewhat expensive amusements, have, by withdrawing the head of the family from his home in the evenings, made the home life poorer in its influence, if that may be, than it was before. We must prepare to take up the duty of making up for the failing home influences as we are attempting that of supplying the missing home teaching of religion. This, too, is a pressing duty. We are fulfilling its claims in part, for I suppose that in none of our schools are facilities for amusement and society altogether denied: but in few of them are there provided attractions which can prevail against the glittering and alluring places of amusement and the doorways to destruction which they open. I do not for a moment suppose that we can, or that we should, attempt to out-do the music-halls, or the club-rooms, by providing amusements in the same line as theirs. We should fail, if we tried; and besides, we have an easier and more effectual method close at hand. The really attractive method with the young people of the working class is that which gives them society and the responsibility of society, and throws upon themselves the work of making and managing their own schemes of amusement. The school-room should become, in a way, the home of the co-operative social enterprises of the young people of the congregation and the schools. Elocution classes studying the art of dramatic and literary representation, and then trying their powers by providing entertainments for the winter evenings, social evenings, in which dancing, and cards, and games, and chat are not merely permitted but encouraged; classes for drawing and music, instrumental and vocal,—these and other attractions should keep a large number of the elder scholars at home in the school-room through all the wet and cold wintry nights. There is something wrong whenever the windows of our school-rooms and class-rooms are not lighted up all through the evenings of the winter. I have heard of a patron of a living who, being in search of a suitable clergymen visited several parishes. When he found the church doors closed and no admission to be had on week-days, he passed on to another parish, not caring to make further inquiry. I recommend to our patrons, if we have them, the test of the lighted and occupied, or darkened and silent rooms of our Sunday-schools.

The devices for making winter evenings pleasant and profitable of which I have spoken, are, I suppose, among the adopted methods of most of our schools. May I, without wearying you, speak for a little while about a scheme which often presents itself to my mind as a not unrealisable dream? Can we not attempt to introduce into our schools something which may correspond with—may imitate, if you like—the easy, homely, effectual method of the ancient English guilds? The sick and provident societies, and plans for promoting thrift which we already have, would form a very natural work for which the members of the guild might unite. Choosing their own president or master, having their day of the year's celebration, and their monthly meetings for business, and, if you like, their distinctive badge; making, after the fashion of the old guilds, no distinction of sex in members, but "brethren and sistren," sharing the common benefit, the Sunday-school guilds would join advantage and good fellowship to mutual support in good conduct and wholesome restraint. We do not, I think, value sufficiently the encouragement, the strength which come from a sense of comradeship in some outward and visible union for mutual help and co-operation in good work.

The Young Men's Christian Associations of the orthodox churches represent the kind of association at which we may very usefully aim.

I have but one other suggestion to make. It is that in all our Sunday-schools we should try to lead the children to do some self-sacrificing work for others. The scheme of one of the old guilds has a sentence which is very much to my purpose, "Vain is the gathering of the faithful where no kindness is." Our Sunday-schools are in this respect greatly wanting. Perhaps that is why there is reason for complaint about the want of self-sacrifice in the matter of giving on the part of our congregations. If you want to impress a habit of considerate generosity, or any other habit, on the congregation, you must begin by impressing it on the schools. But, not to speak of its effect on congregational work, it would, I think, be a most stimulating and improving thing if, after the fashion of the Friends, we could give our children a share in our works of kindly helpfulness. If they could have some helpful work, all of their own—if, to give an illustration of what I mean, our schools all England over could make it their special charge to print interesting and useful books for the use of blind children, there would be something in that duty undertaken and fulfilled out of which a blessing would surely come.

Let me say, in conclusion, that though I have spoken of changed conditions and of the need for great, and it may seem to some sweeping changes in our methods, it is because I think that our schools are worth improving that I have so spoken. Never, I believe, was the gate of opportunity open to them as it is to-day; and never in the history of the Church has there been a time when earnestness, and purpose, and reverence, and active charity, those safeguards against materialism, were more sorely needed than they are needed to-day.

Occasional Notes.

THE following tender lines are addressed to the patriarch of the Unitarian ministry in America:—

TO WILLIAM HENRY FURNESS,

BY JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE.

[From the French of ALFRED DE MUSSET.]

Dear master, tell us then why in your tongue and pen
No sign of age appears?
For all you say and sing has the music and the ring
Of only twenty years!

Your soul will still be bright, though your hair may turn to white;

And, when shall come that hour,
Your loving friends will say, "Tis only a spring day,
With the almond tree in flower;

"Tis not whitened by his years, nor by the bitter tears

Of sad and stormy hours;
But by the morning-dew, falling ever fresh and new
On the flowers."

THE late Professor Tennant's collections, chiefly palæontological, engaged the auctioneers no less than thirty days, the lots being knocked down at the rate of about one per minute, and each lot comprising from ten to twenty specimens. The largest purchaser was Mr. Edward Charlesworth, by whom the fossils are being named and classified.

Two American descendants of a Commonwealth man, who was private secretary to Oliver Cromwell, have just erected at St. Martin's Church, Vevey, where Ludlow, Broughton, and Phelps died in exile, a monument to their ancestor, bearing the following inscription:—

IN MEMORIAM

of him who, being with Andrew Broughton joint clerk of the Court which tried and condemned Charles the First of England, had such zeal to accept the full responsibility of his act that he signed each record with his full name

JOHN PHELPS.

He came to Vevey and died, like the associates whose Memorials are about us, an Exile in the cause of Human Freedom.

This Stone is placed at the request of Wm. Walter Phelps, of New Jersey, and Charles A. Phelps, of Massachusetts
Descendants from across the Seas.

Mr. W. Walter Phelps is the American Ambassador at Vienna.

THE following inquiry was sent to the New York Sun last week:—

Dear Sir,—Please inform us through your valuable paper if Emerson and Longfellow were indeed unbelievers in the Christian religion.

Respectfully yours,

H. M. WALTER.

Subjoined is the answer of the editor, printed in the Sunday edition as the leading editorial article:—

We answer that Mr. Emerson and Mr. Longfellow were unbelievers in the Christian religion.

The essence of belief in the Christian religion is belief in the Deity of the Lord Jesus Christ. Without the Godhead of the Christ there is no real Christianity.

It is true there is a sort of doctrine which many people fancy to be Christian; and according to this doctrine Jesus Christ was not God, but a creature, a man, or a created being somewhat superior to man. But this is not the doctrine of the Christian religion. It is a foe of Christianity. It is a station on the broad road to total unbelief, to infidelity.

This sort of doctrine we understand to have been the doctrine of Emerson and Longfellow. They were Unitarians. They were not believers in the Christian religion.

Fortunately the New York Sun is not an authority on Christianity or any other religious subject.

THE Brahmo Somaj is rapidly creating a useful body of literature. In his "Anecdotes from Eminent Lives" Babu Pramada Charan Sen has given a brief and lucid account of the lives and doings of Theodore Parker and Sister

Dora. The work, we are told, is interesting and instructive, and will amply repay perusal.

FOR some years past there has been a marked demand in India for English works representing the latest and most advanced conclusions in philosophy, science, and theology. We were not quite prepared, however, for a statement recently made by the accomplished traveller, Canon Tristram. Speaking at the Religious Tract Society's annual meeting, he referred to the Armenian people, who, although they have no literature of their own, as soon as they learn to read eagerly seek after such books as those of Bain, John Stuart Mill, and Herbert Spencer.

THE Jewish Chronicle has a good lesson for some of our own ministers when, after premising that evolution at present has not reached the stage of absolute certainty, and that meanwhile it would be well if Jewish preachers altogether refrained from so-called "reconciliations" of science and religion, it says: "The two spheres are utterly unconnected, and no good can be effected by confounding them; while many earnest minds are alienated by the slipshod views often enunciated by such reconcilers. The same journal has a lesson for others who are afraid of the evolution doctrine, when it says that Judaism is not disturbed by the more complex and far-reaching signs of God's design disclosed by Darwin and his followers." The writer adds:—"We will not attempt to deny that at first sight the views associated with the name of Darwin appear to conflict with what has hitherto been the accepted Jewish interpretation of certain Biblical passages. Well, then, if the worst came to the worst, those interpretations would have to be abandoned—but not necessarily the Biblical texts. We could not follow more exactly the precepts of those to whom these interpretations owe their origin than by abandoning them when the clear light of reason prove their insufficiency; their authors would have been the first to do so under such circumstances if they had been living to-day. Judaism has survived the theories of Copernicus and will know how to assimilate those of Darwin." This is the spirit of a wise Rationalism.

THE BISHOP OF MELBOURNE was asked to frame a special form of prayer for rain for use in his diocese. He flatly refused. Changes in the weather, he said, were the result of unwavering natural laws, and prayer was an agency more fitted for securing spiritual blessings than material needs. It would be much wiser if people set themselves to utilise the water which they now allowed to flow to waste into the sea than to content themselves with praying to be delivered from the consequences of their own neglect. As might have been expected, this episcopal rendering of Æsop's fable of Hercules and the Carter has created a great sensation in the colony, where it is felt the bishop has taken adroit advantage of the opportunity to make a telling point against the Colonial Government, which, with the sanction of Parliament, has refused to carry out his favourite scheme of a grand national system of irrigation.

IN view of recent attempts to show that Darwinism is perfectly consistent with so-called Evangelical Christianity, it may be interesting to know in what direction Mr. Darwin's sympathies ran. This is indicated by the following from the Index [Boston, U.S.] of April 27:—"Mr. Darwin was a subscriber to the Index from the first year of its publication to the time of his death. He manifested his interest in this journal by generous donations from time to time; and when he last renewed his subscription, not many months ago, he enclosed a twenty-five pound note to be used in the support and circulation of the paper."

PRESTON.—The re-opening services were continued at the Unitarian Chapel, Percy-street, on Sunday, the 14th ult. Lectures were delivered forenoon and evening, by the Rev. F. W. Walters, of the Unitarian Chapel, Glasgow; in the forenoon on "The Human Providence," and in the evening on "The Demand of the Age on Religion." The discourses were delivered to large and attentive congregations, and the collections exceeded £15.

Correspondence.

THE REV. P. T. FORSYTH—EXPLANATION.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—My friend Mr. Hunter, of York, had to write to you a few weeks ago to complain of the way in which the Inquirer was apt to drag into its camp any whom it found straggling for a moment from their own host, and even to detain those who paid a friendly visit to the Unitarian tents. I much regret, ungraciously as I feel it, to have to make the same complaint on my own behalf. You allude to me, in your article of last week on the meeting of the London Domestic Mission, with a complimentary kindness which is no less embarrassing to me than it is genuine in you. You refer to me as an invited guest. I was not, and had no claim to be. I went, partly because I wished to hear what such brilliant speakers would say on a question so serious, partly because I thought that here at least we could meet and forget sectarian names, partly to take some of my own family who had never heard Dr. Martineau speak. But I should not trouble you on a point so trivial. It is when you go on to speak of me as being only somewhat outside Unitarianism, and likely to come farther in, that I feel misconception will arise; and I am already such a victim to the indolent and libellous classifications of popular religion that I trust you will let me make my position clear. I would remark in passing that this proneness of yours to make too much of some common ground is one of the things that make it so difficult and dangerous to visit your society. You play into the hands of those bigots who would shoot one as a crow because he is interested in a rookery.

Were it a mere question of personal feeling it might be easy for one like myself, whom his own receive not, to surrender to that sympathy and consideration which I have always received from well-known Unitarians, and which hunger has made to me all too welcome. Rejected harshly by the official Congregationalism which has killed an Independency that I would gladly, nay fondly, and I think not fruitlessly, serve, I cannot help looking sadly round for some spiritual fellowship and Christian home. And were this to be determined by personal sympathy I say there are those among the Unitarians who delight me well. But I have never expressed any public sympathy with Unitarianism without making it clear to all who would see that neither my soul nor my mind found satisfaction there. There are vital and most pressing aspects of Christian truth, which the Unitarians do truly measure, which to me are most engrossing, and which a rich Congregationalism, guided by vigorous practicers, seems rapidly and fatally to be losing the power even to care for. But there are also regions of truth, still more vital, where Unitarian thought is, for my needs at least, too meagre, and their refined piety too little of a searching passion or a sweeping power. I cannot understand a Revelation which does not rest on Incarnation, and Incarnation, apart from that of God in Christ, is to me little more than a religious philosophy. I cannot be satisfied with the Unitarian idea either of Christ or of God. I want more. Its tendency seems to me to be to attenuate to a mere unit the unity of God, and to reduce to mere clearness the simplicity that is in Christ. It threatens to make the Father the supremely amiable as to make Christ but the supremely admirable. It speaks sometimes as if Religion could live without Theology, and God be dis-severed from Thought. It fails to deal adequately with the problem of sin, for instance, as I believe it will fail to cope with it as a reality in life and society. It lacks piercing and "dynamic quality in its glance" on a sinful world. I feel, as I realise the true nature, power, and horror of sin, that there was a work to be done by a true Redeemer far more real and searching than anything possible to a mere Teacher and Creature, however supreme. The Unitarian Christ (where he has not been dissipated by the descent through centuries into spray) may have realised the horror and sinfulness of sin, but he does not seem to me to grapple with it and overcome it in any such way as entitles him to be called, in an ultimate sense, the Saviour of the world. Granting that the crucifixion was but one "moment" in the cross, I yet feel that there was gained in the Cross of Christ a real universal and final victory over the principle of sin throughout existence—a victory which is too objective and complete in its nature to be adequately expressed by the mere measure of His influence on human character. The cross is a vera causa, not a mere channel for our salvation, with a real and indispensable action in the Divine nature as in the human. Taken apart from this objective and "finished" work in the unseen, the life of Christ seems to me, I confess, extravagant and inapt. It gives me a sense of waste and misdirection. I mean that if the effect on posterity as teacher and example was the only real work contemplated in this life, then the scanty and vulnerable record which is the instrument of that effect is out of all proportion to the dread travail of His soul; whose fruit, therefore, is mainly lost, while its inaccessible agony was a beating of the air. I am reminded of words which Rothe uses in another connection, "Das ganze Erlöserleben Jesu ist dann nur eine Komödie." If that record had never existed, Christ would still have been, as he was before it, the Saviour of the world, the Redeemer who, in a sinless collision with sin, put away sin by a sacrifice of himself. And if the Gospels perished, under criticism or otherwise, it would not affect the fact accomplished in the cross, though it would seriously affect the method of its realisation in us. The work and person of Christ is to me the outcrop in time of a continuous relation, and real redemptive process in the complex nature of the Triune God himself.

I hold, as it is the virtue of Unitarianism to hold—as indeed it seems to be about all that some seem to hold—that the freest scope is to be given to criticism, especially in dealing with the record. The critical and negative element is an essential factor in human thought, and the religion that ignores it is simply surrendering to the Devil an essential activity in human nature. The Congregationalists are hardly up to date on this head. It is reason alone that must heal the wounds that reason makes. No quackery of mere scriptural authority can do it. I am only afraid that by reason Unitarianism is prone to understand either an unsatisfactory Intuitionism, or an arid Rationalism, inherited from Fox and Jacobi, or from Wolff, Kant and Priestley. It is a reason which constantly tends to be critical and mechanical rather than creative, and which by itself is too simple, easy, and English to measure the profound complexity of things. Now I do not think that the scientific and reasonable criticism of the Christian records will pulverise that pearl of price, the character of Jesus—however it may trim his garb. I will start with the Unitarian from the character of Jesus. I do not find that recent criticism need destroy its sinlessness. That moral and spiritual miracle remains. The other miracles form a separate question. But if any man hold in a real sense the sinlessness of Jesus and his own sense of it (as I do), then I do not see how he can be a Unitarian. It appears to me he must be a Sabellian at least. And Sabellianism is, historically at any rate, but a halfway house, a position of unstable equilibrium, which is continually dipping into Socinianism on the one side, or ascending to an immanent Trinity on the other.

I humbly beg space for this explanation. Its object simply is to make my position clear. I have merely touched a point or two which the trained eye will interpret at once, so as to see that I am more than "somewhat" outside Unitarianism, and little likely to be able to enter. If this be clear, I may still hope occasionally to enjoy, without being misunderstood, a kindly and stimulating intercourse with my Unitarian friends. I deeply respect and envy their chaste and tender piety, their suffering for conscience sake, their love of free discussion, their interest in the scientific aspects of the faith. I cannot rest in their conclusions, or feel that their fabric of thought is one which will permanently carry the religion of Christ. They embrace the Christian principle. So do I. But I identify it with the person of Christ. They do not. And there is the whole thing in a nutshell. As my aim is not polemical, I will not be drawn into discussion. I have not guarded points with such a view. And far be it from me to make an attack. I trust I have said nothing about Unitarianism but what might be admitted by Unitarians to be fair utterance among those who speak the truth in love.

P. T. FORSYTH.

Hackney, May 24.

BATH.—On Wednesday evening (May 24) the annual soiree in connection with the Trim-street Congregation was held at the Assembly Rooms. The room was beautifully decorated with flowers, and an excellent tea was provided. After tea opportunity was afforded for conversation, and a selection of music was performed by the choir, under the direction of Mrs. Edward Cobb, which was greatly enjoyed. At eight o'clock the chair was taken by Mr. William C. Jolly. There were also on the platform the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A. (Bristol), the Rev. W. Carey Walters (Kidderminster), the Rev. F. W. Stanley (minister of the congregation), Mr. John Ricketts, and Mr. J. Hay. The Chairman, in opening the proceedings, expressed his regret at the absence of Mr. Murch, through a previous engagement, and spoke of the warm interest taken by him in all the undertakings of the congregation. The Rev. F. W. Stanley gave a statement of the work of the congregation during the year, to the effect that the Provident Society had received and paid nearly £400, that the Ladies' Working Society had passed through a successful season, and that the great undertaking of the year—the opening of the new school house—had been a great boon to the school. The house had enabled them to hold a weekly mothers' meeting, and, during the winter months, to commence a discussion society. Through the kindness of Professor Estlin Carpenter and other friends the nucleus of a Sunday-school library had been obtained. He then spoke of the importance of maintaining the Christian congregation for enabling men and women, in these days of temptation, to be strong and true to noble principles. The Rev. W. Carey Walters next delivered an eloquent address, in which he gave his impressions of the Liverpool Conference. He spoke of the unity, the sympathy, and the serious aim of those who assembled, and expressed his conviction that good must result from so much earnestness. As an Unitarian, not of the most advanced kind, he protested in the strongest terms against any effort to make mere doctrinal agreement our bond of union. He gave an interesting account of his attempts to bind young people to his Church, and showed how necessary it was to render them all possible help to encounter the temptations and difficulties which beset them. Let the Church protect those of its fold and send them forth to seek the sinning and the outcast, and its triumph would be a glorious one. The Rev. A. N. Blatchford, who as an old friend was warmly welcomed, urged that we should not lose heart because we did not meet with the popular success of many Churches. He pointed out how the Unitarians left their traces upon their neighbours, how their works remained in many communities, and how they did indeed rule the rulers of the people. After a hymn had been sung and prayer offered by the Rev. W. Carey Walters the proceedings terminated.

THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD at its meeting on Thursday week discussed at much length the question of teachers' salaries. It was proposed by Mr. Mark Wilks, on behalf of the School Management Committee, that as a rule the salaries of head teachers should vary with the accommodation of the school. To this an amendment was moved by the Rev. T. Morse in favour of the basis of calculation being by average attendance. The amendment was carried. It was also resolved that a special addition should be made to the salaries of teachers in schools of special difficulty. The Board adjourned over Whitsuntide until the 15th June.

THROAT IRRITATION.—Soreness and dryness, tickling and irritation, inducing cough and affecting the voice. For these symptoms use Epps's Glycerine Jujubes. Glycerine, in these agreeable confections, being in proximity to the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of sucking, becomes actively healing. Sold only in boxes, 7½d. and 1s. 1½d., labelled, "JAMES EPPS and Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." A letter received:—"Gentlemen,—It may, perhaps, interest you to know that, after an extended trial, I have found your Glycerine Jujubes of considerable benefit (with or without medical treatment) in almost all forms of throat disease. They soften and clear the voice.—Yours faithfully, GORDON HOLMES, L.R.C.P.E., Senior Physician to the Municipal Throat and Ear Infirmary."

Religious Intelligence.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

The Fifty-seventh Annual Meeting of this Association was held at Unity Church, Islington, on Wednesday last. The day was one of the finest of the season, and at the hour of service the beautiful church was filled in every part with a congregation comprising representatives from all our London congregations and ministers, and others from most of the principal towns in the country, including members of the Association from Scotland, Ireland and Wales, as well as deputations from the American Unitarian Association and the Protestantenbond of Holland.

The devotional service was conducted by the Rev. W. M. AINSWORTH, of Lancaster, who read for the Scripture lessons Isaiah lxi. and Colossians iii. 1-18. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. FREEMAN CLARKE, D.D., minister of the Church of the Disciples, Boston, U.S. The following is a full abstract.

THE SERMON.

Beginning without announcing any text, Dr. Clarke said that when he was a boy he had the range of an old library near Boston, and he searched for something more to his taste than the old folios of Divinity which occupied the shelves. Among the newer works there were Dr. Priestley's works, Belsham's, Dr. T. Price's, and other Unitarian books. They belonged to his grandfather, Dr. Freeman, the first openly avowed Unitarian preacher in the United States. The minister of the first Episcopal church established in New England, he had been converted to Unitarianism chiefly by intercourse with Mr. Hazlitt, an English Unitarian Minister who paid a visit to the United States, bringing with him a bright-eyed boy, William, afterwards well known as the celebrated Essayist. He announced his new convictions to the wardens of King's Chapel, Boston, who agreed to revise the liturgy, leaving out the creeds and references to the doctrine of the Trinity, and it became the first Unitarian church in America. There he was baptised, and there he listened to the most distinguished preachers of the time, Edward Everett, afterwards American minister to England, James Walker, the sainted Henry Ware, junior, F. W. P. Greenwood, and other wise and strong men. He was therefore a Unitarian by birth, and knew what it was to be trained from the beginning in a manly, rational and free religion, and thus escaped the long trial and anxious doubts through which others had emancipated themselves. When he dipped into those learned tomes, hoping to find some reading to his taste, but too often disappointed, little did he expect that he should have one day the honour of addressing the representatives and spiritual children of Priestley and Lindsey, and he thanked them for this privilege on behalf of the American Association which he represented that day.

Our fathers have laboured—we have entered into their labours. What is the result of their labours in the past? How are we to carry on the work in the future? These were the two points to which he invited their attention.

Unitarians, as a denomination, are a small body everywhere. They have only succeeded in planting a few hundred churches in England, and as many in the United States. The visible result was not great. But there are two kinds of influence, quantitative and qualitative; one mechanical, the other atmospheric and dynamical; one measured by weight and mass, the other by vital force. According to one measure, Orthodoxy had much more weight than Liberal Christianity. According to this standard Judaism had more weight than primitive Christianity, Romanism more than all the other Churches. Christianity advances by two outward growths and by inward and spiritual development. The first way of development is likened by the master to a mustard seed which grows into a tree, the other to a lump hidden in the meal working by unseen force until the whole is leavened. Unitarianism was not the Church of the mustard seed, but may lay claim to be the Church of the lump. Calvinism exercised its stern rule when Unitarianism began to exercise its sway. It no doubt did some good work in its day, but its best work was done when Unitarianism arose to attack every one of its main propositions. And now the leading minds in the great churches both in England and America have come to the same ground that our fathers occupied. They do not call themselves Unitarians, nor do we ask them to do so long as they see objections to our name. But whether they are one with us or not we are one with them, one with Robertson and Maurice, Stanley and Jowett, and many other great thinkers of the same class. Although the old creeds stand the life has gone out of them. The labours of Channing and Dewey, Walker and Gannett, Bellows and Furness, and their compeers have not been in vain. The active thought of all the great denominations in America is on the same side. He did not claim that these results are the exclusive work of Unitarians. Other great influences have co-operated, but that the work of Unitarians is at least recognised by those outside our ranks appears from the remarkable sermon lately delivered in New York by the Rev. Heber Newton [published in the last number of the Inquirer], who testifies gladly to the good done by our small body. His is Christianity of the noblest kind, and very many preachers and laymen in the orthodox Churches no longer believe any one of the old Calvinistic doctrines. And yet the Churches as such continue to accept them, and proclaim and defend them still when they meet in conferences or councils. As ministers of an ecclesiastical body men will insist on retaining doctrines which individually they have long given up. Thus few ministers of the Church of England will admit that they believe in the Athanasian Creed, yet Convocation will not surrender it. So in the Roman Church, while individuals generally regretted the Vatican doctrine of Papal Infallibility, yet in the final ballot only one hand was held up against it. While this is so, even the negative work of ours is not ended. We are bound to declare and promote the great affirmations of Liberal Christianity in opposition to the corresponding affirmations of Orthodoxy. There is a wide and growing estrangement between the advanced thought of men and religious faith more and more in France, England, and Germany. A different spirit has, to a great extent, prevailed in New England. Its historians, poets, scholars, and scientific men have been believers in some rational form of Christianity. The teachers of our Church have had much to do with it. Their trust in freedom, their exaltation of Christianity to the universal claims of humanity, has helped to keep these men in the Christian faith. His late friend and class-mate, Benjamin Pearce, the greatest mathematician of America, had been brought up in the Unitarian Church, and remained faithful to the last to his religious convictions, and was a humble, trusting, but free and rational believer in the Gospel. His science was inspired with spiritual convictions and reached upward to God and Immortality. Unitarians in Massachusetts were the leaders in philanthropic movements, reforms in education, temperance, anti-slavery. Where the religion of reform was taught, moral reforms have followed. Horace Mann, the leader of the education reform, Dr. Howe, the friend of the blind, John Pierpont, the advocate of temperance, Dr. Channing, the abolitionist, Dorothea Dix, the reformer of prisons, Theodore Parker, the advocate of the slave, were all Unitarians. Was it an accident that the religion of freedom has produced so many leading thinkers and writers; historians like Prescott, Bancroft, Hildreth, Motley; poets like Longfellow, Emerson, Holmes, Lowell, Bryant, and many others? When young people show a tendency to leave our Churches they should remember that they owe something to the Church they were brought up in, and to a religion of truth, freedom and progress.

On the battle-field of thought as in war the centre of the conflict often shifts from one part of the field to another. In the thought of the present time profounder questions call our chief attention than the question of apologetics and Church organisations. We are compelled to desert the outworks and defend the citadel. The freedom and responsibility of man, the existence of God, the reality of spirit, these are the great questions of to-day. Many noble minds in England and on the Continent profess their inability to believe in these doctrines. In regard to Christ the question is no longer whether he is God or man, but whether he existed and we can know anything about him. And in regard to the Bible the question was not about its inspiration, but whether its books were historical or legendary. In regard to Christianity the question was not whether it is a supernatural religion, but whether it stands on the same basis as the teachings of Buddha. It is evident that those who stand on the Unitarian platform are much better qualified to meet the difficulties of honest minds and come to some satisfactory conclusion than those who come to the field of battle hampered with the impedimenta of articles and creeds and fixed dogmas. On this field who has done so much as Martineau? This is the great work which Unitarians have done to fall back on first principles, to assume nothing that cannot be verified by personal experience in the soul and the concurrent testimony of the human race. This is the true scientific spirit in harmony with the laws of the natural world. On this ground of solid knowledge will the Church be built, and against it the gates of hell shall not prevail. We shall seek for the best things in all other religions and compare them with the best in our own, and let the result take care of itself. If we find Christ more divine and at the same time more human than other teachers, it will not be by accumulating texts and appeals to miracles, but by seeing what is the length and height and breadth of his teaching, and observe what has been his influence on the human mind and heart. We shall fall back on those intuitions which are necessary and eternal. Martineau led the way here, and Emerson in America. The one is more the philosopher, the other the seer of the coming religion. At the recent funeral of Emerson, the great company seemed to thank God for the pure influence of Emerson.—After a fine encomium on the teaching and influence of Emerson and Carlyle, the preacher in concluding said:—A deeper and nobler form of religion is to come, and Unitarians if they will can be fellow-helpers with God in hastening it on. It cannot be accomplished by mere criticism or formal logic, but by living insight. The weakness of Unitarianism in the past largely consisted in the fact that it has addressed itself more to the speculative understanding than to the higher reason. We have proved conclusively the illogical basis of the Trinity, and the falsehood of the Calvinistic creed. We have confuted Orthodoxy over and over again, but though greatly modified it had never been formally abandoned, and why? Because we have not offered in its place something permanently better, including everything good in the old systems, and developing it into a higher faith, more faith in God, more love for Christ, more profound sense of the power of prayer, more living faith in Immortality. The only voice which speaks with authority is that of insight, experience, personal faith, testifying to that which we have seen in our own living consciousness. With such a faith the opposing doctrines will dissolve away in the warmth of that higher life. Men want more religion, not less; and until we can give them more we have no real hold on them. Every great reform comes not to destroy, but to fulfil. All that we have done in the past will sink into insignificance if we can open the gates of the coming revelation of the new heavens and the new earth. We are now standing on the threshold of that dispensation. The world is waiting for a higher Christianity, which shall bring orthodox and heterodox into one essential spiritual unity. Secpticism is sometimes another cry in the wilderness, which will at last help to prepare the way for that religion. In that day art, science and literature will be in harmony with religion, and we shall have far more religion, and not less. There will be more of love, more of faith, and the dear Master and Brother will be nearer too, more human and more divine than when men called Him by the word God without any clear meaning attached to it.

A collection for the Association was made after the sermon, which amounted to £55 9s. 4d., and the service was brought to a close by singing S. Longfellow's fine hymn, "Beneath the shadow of the Cross."

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

After half-an-hour's interval for luncheon, which was most liberally provided in the school-room by the Committee of Unity Church for ministers and visitors from the country, the annual meeting for the reception of the Report and the transaction of business was held in the church. DAVID AINSWORTH, Esq., M.P., President of the Association, occupied the chair.

Among those present at the meetings either on Wednesday or Thursday, or on both, were:—D. Ainsworth, Esq., President of the Association, and the following Vice-Presidents:—Lady Bowring, Miss Anna Swanwick, Dr. W. B. Carpenter, C.B., the Rev. Professor J. E. Carpenter, the Rev. H. W. Crosskey, LL.D., Mr. James Heywood, F.R.S., the Rev. T. Hincks, F.R.S., Messrs. W. D. Jeremy, M.A., E. Lawrence, LL.B., Joseph Lupton, D.

Martineau, F. Nettlefold, Herbert New, J. T. Preston, the Rev. Dr. Sadler, the Rev. R. Spears, J. Troup, Mr. S. S. Taylor (Treasurer), the Rev. H. Ierson (Secretary), Dr. Longstaff, P. Worsley, W. Shaen, Roger Acton, W. Tate, R. Bartram, Dr. Haward, H. Jeffery, J. Philp, S. W. Preston, I. M. Wade, T. W. Reid, Miss Fisher, S. Charlesworth and Herbert Bramley (Sheffield), W. Spackman (Belfast), R. McCalmont (Belfast), J. Lupton (Leeds), A. Madocks and T. Wray (Chelmsford), W. Colfox and Mrs. T. Colfox (Bridport), H. P. Buckler (Tenterden), S. Reid (Swansea), A. W. Elliott (Hastings), G. Lucas (Gateshead), the Revs. J. Drummond, R. E. B. Maclellan, H. Solly, H. S. Solly, P. W. Clayton, T. L. Marshall, J. P. Ham, T. Rix, M. C. Gascoigne, J. Wright, J. Shannon, P. H. Wicksteed, W. C. Bowie, G. Carter, J. J. Marten, J. E. Stead, E. M. Geldart, W. A. Pope, F. Summers, C. L. Corkran, J. H. Smith, C. B. Upton, J. T. Whitehead, G. Wooller, C. Hoddinott, A. B. Camm, Hobart Clark, Boston, U.S.; T. W. Freckleton, J. R. McKee, W. M. Ainsworth, Lancaster; J. A. Andrews, Headcorn; R. A. Armstrong, Nottingham; H. Austen, Cirencester; J. Birks, Taunton; W. Birks, Stroud; R. Blackburn, Billingshurst; A. N. Blatchford, Bristol; W. Blazeby, Rotherham; T. B. W. Briggs, Dover; J. A. Brinkworth, Saffron Walden; A. Chalmers, Wakefield; C. C. Coe, Bolton; H. W. Crosskey, Birmingham; V. D. Davis, Nottingham; R. C. Dendy, Tenterden; T. Dunkerley, Comber; J. Ellis, Southsea; A. Farquharson, Chesterfield; W. Fielding, Framlingham; B. Gisby, Derby; A. Gordon, Belfast; E. R. Grant, Northampton; W. Harrison, Glossop; Jos. Harrison, Acerington; R. Hill, Bedford; P. M. Higginson, Styal; E. R. Hodges, Newport; T. Holland, Cardiff; J. P. Hopps, Leicester; J. Howard, Wisbeach; A. M. Holden, Ilminster; E. S. Howse, Altrincham; T. L. Jones, Bowden; R. Crompton Jones, Tunbridge Wells; E. Ceredig Jones, Maidstone; T. Leyland, Burnley; J. C. Lunn, Leicester; D. Maginnis, Stourbridge; A. Macdonald, Lewes; H. McKean, Oldbury; F. E. Millson, Halifax; J. Murray, Ilminster; C. C. Nutter, Banbury; A. Payne, Newcastle-on-Tyne; H. W. Perrie, Norwich; R. Pilcher, Warrington, J. Pollard, Belfast; W. Robinson, Crewkerne; J. Ruddle, Hastings; R. Shaen, Royston; G. St. Clair, Birmingham; S. A. Steinthal, Manchester; T. Sutcliffe, Chatham; R. R. Suffeld, Reading; L. Taplin, Kingswood; D. Thompson, Dromore; T. Timmins, Portsmouth; A. Webster, Glasgow; C. H. Wellbeloved, Mansfield; W. Whitelegge, Cork; H. Williamson, Dundee.

The PRESIDENT congratulated the Association on the largeness of the attendance, which, he said, showed the interest that was taken in the Association. As there were a considerable number of resolutions to be submitted, he hoped that the various speakers would make their remarks as brief as possible. He welcomed to the meeting Dr. Freeman Clarke and the Rev. P. H. Hugenholz—(applause).

The Rev. P. H. HUGENHOLTZ thanked the Association for the cordial sympathy which they had manifested towards the efforts which were made to spread free religious life in Holland.

The Treasurer's Report was read by Mr. S. S. TAYLER. The following is an abstract:—

Dr.
To Balance from 1880	...	£22 18 3
Subscriptions	...	1,310 2 0
Donations	...	50 13 6
Legacies (less amount invested)	...	755 9 10
Special Subscriptions	...	45 2 0
Dividends	...	339 18 7
Collections	...	69 17 0
Bicentenary Ministers' Fund	...	37 6 9
Sale of Stock	...	801 11 9
Book Department	...	1,054 2 6
Sunday School Association, Rent, three quarters...	...	22 10 0
Anniversary Meeting	...	66 18 0
		£4,576 10 2

Cr.
By Grants to Congregations	...	£364 3 4
Grants to Missions	...	368 11 9
Affirmation Lectures	...	258 10 8
Grants of Books and Tracts	...	312 12 8
Supply Services	...	2 16 3
Hungarian Students	...	100 0 0
Budapest (Hungary) Services	...	100 0 0
Bicentenary Ministers' Fund	...	43 0 0
Indian Fund	...	99 0 0
Tomb of the late S. Taylor	...	12 10 0
Book Department	...	959 19 2
Rent of Rooms and Offices	...	200 0 0
Gas, Cleaning, and Firing	...	48 1 1

Repairs	£15 9 9
Salaries and Wages	456 9 4
Collectors' Commissions and Collecting Expenses	14 18 10
Charges on Remittances	0 3 7
Printing and Postage of Annual Report	87 2 1
Inquirer, Herald, Christian Life General Advertising	23 6 0
Ditto Printing	10 5 4
Stationery, Postage, and Sundries	19 14 0
Expenses of Anniversary	95 1 8
Do., Provincial Meeting at Leicester	128 8 7
Expenses of Deputations	6 1 3
Permanent Library	21 1 1
Law Expenses	2 19 6
	97 18 4

Balance in hand	£4,348 4 3
Due from Jubilee Fund	139 12 4
	88 13 7

£4,576 10 2

JUBILEE FUND.

Dr.
To Balance from 1880	£759 13 9
Subscriptions and Dividends	57 17 8

£817 11 5

Cr.
By Ministers' Stipends	£82 10 0
Grants for Buildings	350 0 0

£432 10 0

Balance	385 1 5
----------------	---------

£817 11 5

Examined with the vouchers and found correct.

NATHANIEL M. TAYLER,

JESSE PAGE,

W. ARTHUR SHARPE,

Auditors.

May 22, 1882.

The Rev. H. IERSON read an abstract of the general report.

THE REPORT.

The Committee begin by stating that in the present state of public feeling and opinion in reference to matters of religion it is of immense importance that the various societies which are labouring to diffuse enlightenment should be vigorously supported, and that the Association should be enabled to extend its action in all directions, and they appeal for help in this work to every sense of religious and philanthropic duty, and to an enthusiasm of faith and conviction in harmony with the great and worthy ends which the Association has always kept steadily in view. It is greatly due to the Association that Unitarianism, as a vital religious force, is coming into ever closer contact with the thought and life of the time, and the effect upon Unitarians themselves is clearly discernible. The "Ten Lectures" enabled them to see that they had a common ground of religious thought, and the recent meetings in conference have made evident that they have also a common ground of religious sympathy. It is remarked with regret that the answers to appeals for larger and more numerous subscriptions and chapel collections have not been such as was hoped for. The custom of our American brethren of making annual collections in aid of their Association it is hoped will be more generally adopted in this country, collections of this kind giving many the opportunity to assist who could not afford to qualify themselves as members. Within the last twelve months several of the most liberal subscribers have died. Considering that every new mission station that is opened requires a subsidy of at least some £50 per annum, and a much larger sum if a minister is at once appointed, the means which the Association can at present rely upon for objects of permanent extension are reported to be quite inadequate.

HOME DEPARTMENT.

Under this head a classified list is given of forty congregations assisted by grants to the extent of about £1,000. Referring to the movement to create a fund for the augmentation of ministerial stipends, it is stated that the means of the Association have, in fact, constituted for some years a fund of this kind. There was a feeling some years ago that the propagandist efforts of the Association were too much scattered and intermittent, and that it would be better to settle ministers, or, as they were called, missionaries, in promising places, so that congregations could be gathered and chapels built, and thus causes established which would in time become self-supporting. It is thought desirable to extend this kind of operation, and aid has been given towards the founding of new congregations at Douglas, Cardiff, Bournemouth, and Swindon.

The report then stated the aid given in various cases of chapel restorations and school building as duly reported at the time in these columns.

There has been considerable activity throughout the year in the delivery of lectures, and in consequence a great desire manifested for tracts, which have been freely and liberally supplied. Lectures have been given at Stamford, but the result hitherto has not been encouraging. Assistance has been given to two local Societies towards the delivery of lectures in their districts—to the Southern Association for lectures at Southampton, Newport, and Bournemouth; and to the East Anglian for lectures at Ipswich, Lynn, Peterborough, and Norwich. Similar help has been given for Wisbeach and Buxton. At Cambridge lectures were delivered before and after Christmas, which would seem to have been appreciated by those who attended, of whom, however, only a certain proportion were in any way connected with the University; and the Committee were not encouraged to renew the experiment during the present term. It is mentioned as a suggestive fact, that the same course which was delivered by one of the lecturers at Cambridge, on the Bible, its authority, and the proper way of studying it, was also received, when recently given by him at Brantree before an audience chiefly of the working-class, with every sign of earnest approval and sympathy.

The question of new methods of Christian work has lately become a subject of grave consideration with the Churches of all denominations, and the Committee fully share in the common desire to lay more emphasis on the religious and moral aspect of denominational or congregational effort than has been always possible in the past, considering the peculiar conditions under which the old controversies had to be carried on. They feel assured that in these days to promote the practical religion of Christianity is to promote Unitarian Christianity, since even looking only within the leaves of the Bible this is what the free religious intelligence finds there. They received therefore with sympathy the direction contained in the resolution of the recent Council meeting, "That it be an instruction to the Executive Committee to consider and report on the practicability of an organised effort for giving services in some of the centres of trade, especially in London, and as to the desirability of raising a special fund for the support of such effort." Under this head reference is made to the popular efforts at Leicester, Kidderminster, Sheffield, Rochdale, and Nottingham.

FOREIGN DEPARTMENT.

Reference is here made to the visit of the Revs. Dr. Freeman Clarke and Hobart Clarke, as representatives of the American Unitarian Association, and tributes of sympathy on occasion of the deaths of President Garfield, Dr. Dewey, Dr. Bellows, Calvin, Lincoln, Longfellow, and Emerson; the dedication of the Channing Memorial Church at Newport, Rhode Island, and the visit of a representative of the Protestantbond of Holland, the Rev. P. H. Hugenholz, of Amsterdam.

"The progress of liberal religious thought over nearly the whole continent of Europe would probably be greater, and certainly more clearly traceable, if it were not for the universal repugnance to the idea of securing freedom by separation from the established churches. Unitarianism in England has long suffered from the same cause, so that we are not unfamiliar with this, to a large extent social difficulty. But it requires some acquaintance with the church history and regulations of the respective countries to enable persons looking from the English Nonconformist, and Non-subscribing point of view, to judge correctly of the liberal religious movements in Germany, and in the Reformed Churches of Holland and France. But in each case the struggle for liberty in the Church continues, as against the reactionary proceedings of the dominant orthodox parties. It should be mentioned that in Germany a small section of liberals have joined in a Reform Verein, in protest against submission to compromises in the services of the Church. In France, by a recent decree of the Government for the regulation of the Reformed Church, the Liberal party have once more the opportunity of asserting their right to a place in the Church, in opposition to the exclusive policy which the so-called orthodox section have for some years pursued. It may be hoped that your Association will ere long be enabled once more to congratulate the successors of the Coquerels and of Martin Paschoud upon the progress of free and enlightened religious principles in their country."

In Italy Signor Bracciforti continues his worthy labours. In Sweden the works of Channing, of Parker, and of Martineau are studied with increasing interest. Several able lecturers have laboured to make known in that country the Unitarian doctrine, and the Committee have had before them a work of much learning and ability on the subject of the Divinity of Christ, by a Swedish gentleman, Victor Rydberg, in a translation by the Rev. Ephraim Turland. They would willingly promote the circulation of this interesting work if it should be published. To the meeting in September last of the Consistory of the Unitarians of Hungary, a special communication was sent on the occasion of the visit to them of the Rev. Joseph H. Allen, who had been deputed by the American Association, and kindly undertook to act as the representative also of this Association. Mr. Allen, in his published report of this visit, has ably set forth the claims of Hungary upon the continued interest of American and English Unitarians. But the prime interest of the year in Hungarian correspondence has centred about the new movement in Budapest. This was the first endeavour to establish a Unitarian church in Hungary Proper, as distinguished from Transylvania, and the undertaking had been long and carefully prepared for. It was with the view of furthering this that Professor Kovacs was deputed to the last anniversary. The first service was conducted by Bishop Ferencz amidst many encouraging circumstances, and worship has been since carried on by the Rev. Charles Derzsi, one of the former Manchester New College students. Unitarian books and tracts have been sent at his request, and the Consistory have devoted a certain sum for publishing some of these in translations by the minister. Mr. Derzsi writes about his work in a hopeful spirit, and the fund for the church building is being constantly augmented. Much gratitude has been expressed for the kind contributions to it which have been made in this country, and friends may be reminded that the total is as yet very far short of what will be required to build a suitable church for the Unitarians in the metropolis of Hungary. The Committee have gladly welcomed Mr. Nicolaus Gal as the student supported by the Association at Manchester New College, which he entered for the three years' theological course last October.

In Madras the Rev. W. Roberts labours industriously to diffuse the knowledge of Unitarian Christianity. He has enjoyed for the last year the comfort and the advantage of the respectable and convenient residence which the kind liberality of friends enabled the Committee to have erected. He asks for books and tracts, which will be shortly sent, as also a small sum to be forwarded by him to Salem, to assist Mr. Aaron in printing some Tamil tracts. The congregation at Melbourne continue to enjoy the able services of Mrs. Webster. The Sydney congregation have advertised in the English Unitarian papers for a minister, and it is probable that an engagement will shortly be made, with the concurrence and help of the Committee. The news from Adelaide is always good. The congregation there has enjoyed the advantage of the steadfast support of old Unitarian English families which adhered to the best traditions of Unitarianism at home. A grant was made in aid of a new school and lecture-room.

BOOK AND TRACT DEPARTMENT.

The sermon preached by the Rev. C. C. Coe at the last annual meeting, on "The Importance of Opinion in Matters Pertaining to Religion," was printed.

Of the Home Page tracts, bearing on doctrinal subjects, the Association has now nearly the whole of the few remaining copies, and in regard to some of them it will be well to consider whether they may not be reprinted with advantage. Some tracts have been reprinted, such as "New Testament Views of God which have been Obscured by certain Popular Doctrines," by the Rev. W. Gaskell; "Evangelical Christianity," by the Rev. James Freeman Clarke; "Trinitarianism at the Bar of Common Sense," by a Cambridge Lecturer; "Who are the Infidels?" by the late Rev. J. Fraser; "God the Father, the only proper Object of Worship," by the late Rev. Dr. Bellows. Of a new edition of the excellent life of Dr. Priestley, by Miss Emily Sharpe, the Committee have taken a number of copies, as also of a tract on the Athanasian Creed, by the Rev. W. Birks, and one on the Bible, by the Rev. F. T. Walters. They have also in the press several short tracts, one by Dr. Bellows, on "Personal Immortality," and "Five Plain Questions," by the Rev. J. Page Hopps. A fresh supply has been ordered of Alger's "History of the Doctrine of a Future Life," a work always in demand. A number of copies have been taken of "The Man Jesus," a new work, by the Rev. J. Chadwick. The "Ten Sermons and Prayers," by Theodore Parker, have been reprinted for the Association in an improved form. A fresh stock has been obtained also of "Meditations and Prayers," by Mary Carpenter. The Committee notice with pleasure that there is an increasing demand for devotional works, and they are of opinion that it should be a part of your future work to encourage such publications. "The Unitarian Handbook," by the Rev. Robert Spears, has been reprinted. This was the twelfth issue; the last one of 1,000 copies had been made in 1875. Considering the still very large number of professing Christians who hold by the Bible as the sole authoritative appeal on matters of religious doctrine, this work continues to render most useful service in demonstrating the fact that the teaching of the Scriptures is not in harmony with the creeds commonly called orthodox. It is now also published in the Welsh language in a translation by Mr. David Evans, assistance having been given for this purpose on the condition which has been since nearly fulfilled, viz., that the 500 copies subscribed for should be distributed amongst orthodox ministers in the Principality.

The price of the Sermons by the Rev. Robert Collyer has been reduced to two shillings. The book is an admirable one to give to orthodox friends who desire to learn something of Unitarianism on its practical side. The testimonies to the value of Dr. Channing's works, which have been given for many years, still continue to be received. Persons of all persuasions assure the Committee of the interest and spiritual profit with which these works are read, and this one Unitarian volume at least is allowed a place in orthodox libraries. Of the 32,000 issued by the Association since 1870 only a limited number remain on hand. One hundred and forty were given away last year; eighty four to divinity students and the rest to ministers. Besides continuing the gift of Dr. Channing's works to ministers and students, the Committee have from time to time presented copies of Theodore Parker's "Discourse" and "Ten Sermons and Prayers," in answer to special requests for these volumes. They have also given in the same manner 653 copies of "Heresy and Orthodoxy," by Joseph Blanco White, and 678 of "Christ the Revealer," by the Rev. J. Hamilton Thom. Clergymen and Dissenting ministers, besides students of various theological colleges, have eagerly applied for the gift, and many most interesting letters of thanks have been received. The new attention so called to these publications appears to have stimulated the sale of the copies remaining. Both works will again shortly be out of print. The Committee have now offered another work, "The Perfect Life," the sermons by Dr. Channing, published since his death, and this also is gratefully acknowledged by many who have received it. The first 5,000 of the shilling edition of the "Ten Lectures on Positive Aspects of Unitarian Doctrine" have been sold, and a later similar issue has had a considerable sale.

At the last annual meeting attention was specially called to the recent publication of the New Testament in a revised version, and the hope was expressed that the revision for which Unitarian scholars had long pleaded in justice to the Scriptures themselves would exercise an important influence on the common opinion as to the real basis of religious truth. Such influence a work of this serious kind could not but exert, but it would have been greater, or at all events more immediately obvious, excepting for certain grave defects which scholars of all denominations had remarked upon. Some of these Dr. G. Vance Smith has pointed out in the tractate which he wrote at your Committee's desire, and which they have published under the title of "Texts and Margins of the Revised New Testament Affecting Theological Doctrines Briefly Reviewed." The new version has been denominated a Socinian Version, though some have rashly averred that no omission or variation has touched the ground of Orthodox belief gathered from the New Testament. Dr. Smith has shown that the contrary is the case, and that the improvements in any future revision will probably proceed still further in the direction of Unitarian thought. It is a remarkable circumstance that the Revisers have adopted many of the characteristic amendments of the "Improved Version," against which at the time of its publication by the Unitarian Society in 1808 such strong animadversions were made as "wilful corruptions of the word of God." The Committee hoped that a larger demand would have been made for Dr. Smith's valuable and really very cheap work. They propose, however, to appeal to a possibly wider public by reissuing it in paper covers at the low price of threepence. It is a work of permanent value, and one which ought to be widely circulated.

The Book-room is becoming every year more conspicuously a place of resort for inquirers of various denominations, and the Committee congratulate the Association on the hearty, intelligent, and altogether admirable manner in which Miss Philpot fulfils the duties of this department. It is obviously important to meet with kind assistance and information those who desire to acquaint themselves with Unitarian works.

Presents of books were made to Mr. Denis Varga on his return to Hungary, to Professor J. Kovacs, of Klausenberg, and to Dr. Von Bergen, of Stockholm. A parcel of books and tracts was sent to Mr. C. Derzsi for the use of the congregation at Budapest, one for the library of the Brabmo Somaj at Bangalore, and another for lending and distribution in Northern India was forwarded to W. Tilden, Esq., of Simla. Copies of Theodore Parker's and other works specially desired, to the number of 150, have been given to theological students, and 45 to various inquirers. Packets of books, numbering together 425, have been sent for sale at chapel and school bazaars at Portsmouth, Ac-crington, Malton, Brighton, Norwich, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Sheerness, and Denton; and 450 works were given to public and chapel libraries at Guildford, Portsmouth, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Deptford, Padham, Poole, Middlesborough, Islington, Nottingham, and Trinity College, Dublin. Of tracts given specially to individuals the number has been about 600; tracts sent in large grants for distribution at lectures and otherwise have amounted to about 55,000.

PROVINCIAL AND OTHER MEETINGS.

Under this reference is made to the Provincial meeting of the Association at Leicester; to the "National Conference of Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other Non-subscribing or kindred Congregations," at Liverpool; and to the presence of deputations at the Western Union, North Midland Association, the Southern Association, the East Cheshire Union, the Belfast Unitarian Society, the Annual Meeting of the Sunday School Association, and other occasions.

JUBILEE FUND.

This Fund was raised in 1875 to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the Association since it assumed its present form in 1825. It has been for some time exhausted; and a statement is made in the Report of the way in which it has been applied.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

The long-vested question of the Parliamentary Oath is still undecided. The administration of an oath to enable a Member of Parliament to take his seat in the House has unhappily become an occasion of infringement of civil rights by being used as a theological test, though this was not its first intention. It is only in this view that the matter becomes one of principle in which the Association is interested, the principle being the same whether the oath is Trinitarian or not.

According to the instruction of the last annual meeting, a petition to the House of Commons, signed by your President in the name of the Association, was presented June 30, by C. H. James, Esq., M.P., setting forth the principle in question, that no religious test ought to stand in the way of Members of Parliament fulfilling the duties of the office for which they have been properly elected. No occasion has arisen since to render the expression of public opinion in the same form opportune. The principle being so generally admitted, the question has become a matter of Parliamentary tactics and personal feeling.

In their last Annual Report the Committee affirmed that in regard to the Burial Laws much remained to be done in the view of a civil and religious equality, notwithstanding the grand advance which had been made in the passing of the then recent Act. The effect of that Act has been upon the whole satisfactory in establishing the rights of Nonconformists in burials in the national churchyards; but in cemeteries a difficulty still remains which can only be removed by abolishing the distinction between consecrated and unconsecrated ground, and by enacting that the cemetery authorities should be compelled to provide one chapel only for all funeral services, as also that no fee should be exacted excepting for actual services performed at interments. These were points on which it was understood when the Act was passed that further legislation would be required, and Mr. Henry Richard has brought in a Bill which should receive the earnest support of all who desire to see the principles of religious equality carried out to their legitimate issue.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Judging from the experience of some years past, your Committee are of opinion that it would be to the advantage of the Association under its present constitution if, with regard to the election of your Presidents, the usage were not invariably followed which often brings their term of office to a close just when they have become familiar with its duties and have learned to take most interest in the work of the Society, and they have requested Mr. David Ainsworth to allow his name to be presented to the members for re-election as the President for another year.

Chapel collections are acknowledged from Llwynrh-ydowen, Capel-y-Fadfa, and Llandysul; also from Kingswood, near Birmingham, Newark, Brixton, Guildford, and Godalming.

The distribution of the interest of the Bicentenary Fund has been made as usual. It was divided between seven ministers, to all of whom the gift proved most welcome.

The Association has lost since its last meeting many old and valued friends. Mr. Samuel Sharpe was widely known as the author of the "History of Egypt" and many other works of learned research, and as a Biblical scholar whose new translation of the Scriptures anticipated, so far as the New Testament is concerned, the best renderings of the Revised Version. He retained to a very advanced age the strong interest which he had always manifested in every movement to promote Unitarian Christianity. He had been one of the Presidents, and was a Vice-President for many years. Mr. Thomas Ainsworth also had served the Association in this capacity, as well as by his liberal annual support. Another Vice-President and generous annual subscriber was Mr. T. W. Bagehot. The Council have made it a special duty to notice the serious losses in its membership by the death of these and other Vice-Presidents and Home Correspondents, namely, Mr. W. Evans, Mr. S. W. Browne, Mr. C. Moore, Mr. W. Clayton, and the Rev. Goodwyn Barnby. Communications of sympathy were also made to the daughters of Dr. Bluntschli, the great authority on questions of International Law, who had been for many years, and continued till the time of his lamented death, one of your Foreign Correspondents.

In making up the sad record of annual losses your Committee could not but observe how faithfully the oldest friends of the Association have adhered to it to the last. Some of them, as Mr. Sharpe and Mr. F. Schwann, had passed their eightieth year; Dr. Greenhow, of Newcastle, was nearly ninety; and Miss C. Paget, of Leicester, ninety-seven. Most of our other losses have been of members advanced in life, as Mr. John Buckton, Miss Jane Martineau, and Mr. C. F. Tagart, who, having served for some years on the Committee, afterwards filled the important office of one of your Auditors. Mr. Joseph H. Nettlefold died younger, as also the Rev. James Wilson, the excellent and devoted Missionary to the Poor in Birmingham. Only two other ministers have died during the year, the Rev. W. Bennett, of Heywood, and recently, quite young, the Rev. Benjamin L. Green, of Evesham, both accessions from other bodies. Of other departed friends your Committee can only say, as of those named, may successors arise in their places as worthy and as devoted as they were to the holy cause of truth and righteousness.

The Rev. Dr. CROSSKEY, in moving the adoption of the report, said that it recorded healthful activity in every direction, and he did not think the great body of Unitarians ever had a larger or deeper confidence in the Association than at the present day. Supposing the Association were abolished, and the means at its disposal were not furnished, what a serious blow it would be to the great future of liberal Christianity; but supposing the Committee's request were complied with, and its resources were doubled, how much larger service might it render! He was glad to see that some new schemes of work were being entered upon, and to find among these schemes the consideration of an organised effort for promoting services in the great centres of trade, especially London. He was delighted to find that London was about to show what it really could do, the more so because all the criticisms of the provincial proceedings came from London. Now that the metropolis had a fair and full opportunity of showing what it could do, he hoped that they would institute great open services, and that large churches would be established in every district. He regretted that the report did not speak of civil rights. The question of oaths had not become so much a matter of Parliamentary tactics as not to render necessary a constant expression of the principle that no religious faith or want of faith—not even Atheism itself—should debar a man from political rights—(loud applause). He was concerned with regard to this matter for the honour of Christianity itself. They could not expect that Christianity should become dear to the hearts of those who doubted it; that those who had not the love to the great Master whose principles Unitarians humbly followed would be attached to their faith by the infliction upon them of a public wrong. Let them show that it was because of the intensity of their devotion to religion that they could give equal rights and privileges to all, and welcome all as citizens on the same footing as themselves. He trusted that the Committee would in future keep watch over civil rights, particularly as to the Universities, where the small end of the wedge of bigotry was being introduced. The proposal to establish another such college as Selwyn College was right in the teeth of that which freed the universities, and if such views were allowed to spread they would endanger the hard won privileges which had been obtained in the seats of learning. The report stated the Association had prospered because Unitarianism as a vital religious force was coming into close contact with the thought and life of the time. They would prosper in the health and life of their own hearts and of those with whom they worshipped, as they ceased to be a mere dogmatic body and became a gathering of Christian people, worshipping God and striving to do His work in the world. He did not undervalue the necessity of teaching what was ordinarily called Unitarianism as distinct from orthodoxy. He believed it right and just to free religion from superstition, but he knew of no reason that made him anxious that in matters of science and history truth should prevail that did not also make him anxious to diffuse in theology such principles as we esteem true. Their first thought was what they believed, not what they disbelieved; what they worshipped and not what they despised. Of late the Unitarian Association had doubtless passed through a great crisis in its history; but he believed that Unitarians were never before one people as they were now; they were never bound together with more generous sympathies, and never had a more hopeful future before them—(applause). They had debates about trust-deeds; but surely they were at one in believing that every trust-deed should be open, and that the truth of God should be trusted to take care of itself. They had had their discussions about that comprehensiveness—who was to be excluded and who was not,—but surely they had now advanced to this point, that they left to every man's heart and soul and conscience to decide how far he was loyal to Christ and to God. In reliance upon the comprehensiveness of God's mercy they would forsake the exclusions of mortal bigotry. They had had their controversies as to whether they were to be Unitarians or Free Christians, but he believed this had come to an end. Ecclesiastically he was a Free Churchman, personally he was a Unitarian; and because he was a Free

Churchman and a Unitarian he claimed that his Church should be free to advance in the future as it had in the past to anything the worshipping body conceived to be God's truth, while they expressed in the present their living convictions. He acknowledged the kindly sympathy which the Association showed to the Conference at Liverpool, and the effective aid which its officers rendered. He attended every meeting of the Committee, in which there was always the heartiest co-operation and deepest sympathy. That conference at Liverpool was a baptism of the spirit, and they there felt bound together in a deep Christian fellowship. Who could have partaken of the Communion, preceded by the words of the most venerable and respected of their ministers, whose added years only increased the reverence in which he lived in their hearts, without feeling that indeed it was true that the spirit of Christ was with them, and that all minor passions, unholy jealousies, and divided discords must cease in His immortal presence. Should it not be that out of that baptism of the spirit would come a more fervid enthusiasm to toil and labour for Divine truth? Individually he felt that would be so. Let the Conference and the Unitarian Association work side by side—(applause). It was the non-subscribing principle on which they insisted. He believed the day would come when all non-subscribing churches would feel that they had one religion and could labour in one spirit. At the same time, in the Association they had the expression of personal conviction. They had arrived at a stage when they need not go about seeking for new aims; they need not go here and there pulling up their flowers to see if they were growing. Let them rise up to generous sympathy and generous understanding, and work at the various institutions that they had already had; let them with one heart, one mind, one soul work those institutions, whether the proud came to them or not, and keep the Gospel of God as they believed it. If it indeed were of God no power on earth, no hierarchy, though grand and established, no indifference could prevent the work prospering in their hands. The people in general might not be longing to have their faith but they were longing for religion. When thousands upon thousands followed the Salvation Army with all its fantastic forms it simply showed that there was a longing after religion, and it was as a vital religious force that they would find the strength of the Association and the power of their work.

The Rev. Dr. SADLER, in seconding the resolution, said the Unitarian faith was now coming in contact with the religious world outside much more than formerly. He believed that the cause of this was that people were beginning to feel that the cornerstone of orthodoxy, namely, the literal interpretation of the fall of man, was gone. The influence which had produced this change was in his opinion that of the illustrious man whose mortal remains had recently been laid in Westminster Abbey—Charles Darwin. All those who became disciples, or even only partial disciples, of Mr. Darwin could not possibly hold the doctrine of the fall of man, the doctrine of the rise of man had been substituted in its place—(applause). In his own neighbourhood he had never before felt that there was such an opening for the Unitarian faith as there was at the present time. Every Sunday he found persons attending his services who formerly went to Orthodox churches. In addition to that, not long ago he was asked to take part in a conference of ministers and laymen, at which the subjects under discussion were "The Relation of Christianity to Modern Thought," "The Trinity," and "Future Punishment," and only yesterday an independent minister called upon him at the suggestion of a clergyman to ask him to meet them in conference from time to time, because they recognised the new point of view to which the religious world was now brought. A little time ago he was asked by a clergyman to take part in a discussion on Positivism, when a paper was read by one of the most distinguished Positivists of the present day, and he certainly could not but feel what a grand position Unitarians occupied, when it was evident that all the arguments against Christianity which were used in the paper were entirely inapplicable to Unitarian Christianity. The time was coming when thousands and perhaps millions would become materialists unless some such gospel was taught them as that which the Unitarian churches had to offer—the gospel of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of men—the gospel of the two grand commandments of the Sermon on the Mount and of the spirit of Christ.

But they must not only offer to the people a Unitarian theology, but a Unitarian religion. The Conference at Liverpool was an indication of a yearning for a quickened brotherly sympathy, and that yearning Unitarians should seek to satisfy.

The Rev. ALX: GORDON (of Belfast) said he considered that the part of the Report referring to Parliamentary oaths was not sufficiently emphatic or explicit; and after some discussion as to the form of procedure, he moved as an amendment, "That this meeting desires to place on record its affirmation of the principle that the profession of atheism should not deprive any citizen of his civil rights, including that of representing his fellow-citizens in Parliament, if duly elected, and directs the Executive Committee to take every fitting opportunity of petitioning both Houses of Legislature in this cause."

Mr. CHATFIELD CLARKE said that while he concurred with the tone of the amendment he thought it was not wise, politic or useful for the Association, as a religious body, to adopt it. The words of the Report, if carefully read, involved an absolute doing away with all tests whatever.

The Rev. A. GORDON said he did not agree with the paragraph of the Report which stated that no occasion had arisen since June 30 "to render the expression of public opinion in the same form opportune." Neither did he consider that the principle contended for had been generally admitted, even by Liberals. He therefore considered that they should reiterate that principle in its most naked form. The question was, "Is an Atheist a citizen, or is he not?" He wished Unitarians to take the bull by the horns and to say that they were prepared to accord to an Atheist all the rights of citizenship; and if any man cast upon the Unitarians the nickname or stigma of Atheists, because of the stand which they took with regard to that principle, he wished him joy of the opportunity he had of relieving his mind of so much mud.

Mr. HERBERT NEW seconded the amendment, because he considered the Report dealt with this subject in a somewhat ambiguous manner. It perhaps was painful to have to speak of such a subject which was connected with a person with whom they had no sympathy whatever; but the principle was an important one, and for that they must contend. The sooner they said distinctly that their view was that no profession of Atheism should deprive a man of his civil rights the better.

The amendment was put and carried, after which the Report was adopted with the amendment.

Mr. CHATFIELD CLARKE proposed:—

"That the hearty thanks of the meeting be given to Mr. David Ainsworth for his valued services during the last year in the capacity of President of the Association, and that he be requested to accept the office for the ensuing year."

In doing so, he said no man could have fulfilled the duties of the office more faithfully than Mr. Ainsworth had done—(applause), and the members of the Executive Committee knew that he had done real work during the past year. It was unusual to have the same president two years in succession; but they must all feel that it was beneficial to re-elect a gentleman who thoroughly understood the duties he had to perform.

Mr. H. JEFFERY seconded the resolution, which was unanimously agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN thanked the Association for their vote of confidence and for the kind manner in which they had endorsed his acceptance of the presidency for the ensuing year. When he first accepted the appointment he felt that it was entirely owing to the position which his father held amongst the Unitarian body. The year had been one of extreme pleasure to him, and he was now getting tolerably acquainted with the work of the Association, though he was sorry to say he was not perfect in his attendance at the Committee meetings.

The Rev. P. H. HIGGINSON moved the appointment of the vice-presidents and home correspondents.

Mr. RICHARD BARTRAM seconded the motion, and expressed a hope that in future there would be more ladies among the vice-presidents, and more Irishmen and Scotchmen among the home correspondents.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. E. LAWRENCE moved the adoption of the list of foreign correspondents, which, he said, was remarkable for containing for the first time the names of Dr. Freeman Clarke and Professor Kovacs.

The resolution was seconded by the Rev. J. T. WHITEHEAD, and agreed to.

Dr. LONGSTAFF moved:—

"That the thanks of the meeting be given to the Executive Committee for their able and careful conduct of the business of the Association during the past year, and the appointment of the committee for the ensuing year."

In doing so he expressed a hope that the meeting at Liverpool had brought about a state of feeling amongst the Unitarian body that would be productive of good fruits, and show that they had something more to present to the world than merely a theoretical theology. It had often appeared to him that the Association attempted to do more than it could do efficiently. It gave a little assistance to many congregations, but very often that assistance was scarcely sufficient to produce the results desired. He therefore suggested that it would be better for them to contribute more largely to a few congregations which with proper help were likely to do good work. Such a congregation was that at Southampton, where there was a beautiful church with a capital schoolroom attached, but the people were not sufficiently endowed with this world's wealth to enable them to support a minister.

Mr. BLESSLY (Portsmouth) seconded the motion, and stated that the Association had given great encouragement and ample support to the new movement at Bournemouth.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. J. T. PRESTON moved the reappointment of the Treasurer, Secretary, Solicitor, Trustees, and Auditors for the ensuing year, with the cordial thanks of the Association to them for their past services.

The Rev. H. W. PERRIS seconded the motion, which was agreed to.

Dr. CARPENTER, C.B., moved:—

"That this meeting sympathises with the regrets of the Council at the loss of many of its most respected members during the past year, recalling with special respect the memory of Samuel Sharpe, a former President of the Association, who was as much distinguished for his zealous labours in the diffusion of Unitarian principles as he was esteemed amongst learned men for his devotion of a long and fruitful life to Biblical study and interpretation. That the meeting would also express its sincere concurrence in the desire shown in a recent resolution of the Council to do honour to the great and worthy name of Charles Darwin, whose works of scientific research have also powerfully tended to the overthrow of popular theological errors, and the establishment of religion on its proper basis of simple, rational faith in the Divine order of the universe."

He said it had been his privilege to know both these distinguished men for something like forty years, and to have been in somewhat intimate relations with them. Of late years he had seen but little of Mr. Sharpe, but he knew that to the end of his life he was following up the important pursuits with which his name was connected, namely, ascertaining by historical research the import of the writings embodied in the Bible. He had thrown great light upon the Old Testament, and his admirable translation of the New Testament was a boon to a very large number of intelligent thinkers. It had been said that there were two books which constituted the basis of religious faith, the Book of Revelation and the Book of Nature. It was therefore appropriate that the name of Charles Darwin had been coupled with that of Samuel Sharpe; for if ever there was a man who devoted himself with single-minded perseverance to the study of nature, and had not only a love but a passion for truth, that man was Charles Darwin. Even one of his strongest scientific opponents, M. de Quatrefages, a distinguished member of the Institute of France, had borne testimony to the admirable scientific work which Darwin had done. One of the most remarkable characteristics of his writings was the way in which he dealt with the objections advanced by his opponents. There was something almost chivalric in his treatment of them. As Professor Huxley had said, his character was even greater than the man. Within the memory of some of those present the common practice of theologians was to test any new scientific heresy by its agreement or non-agreement with the Bible; but the time had now come when what was taught in the Bible was tested by science. It was upon the science of the time that the basis of religion must rest, using the word "science" in its largest sense as dealing with human nature in its religious and moral as well as in its intellectual state. The Book of Nature was not now to be interpreted by the Bible, but the Bible was to be interpreted by the Book of Nature, and in the future nothing connected with religion would stand that was not in accordance with the great revelation of nature—the revelation which, as Bacon said, was written in the only language which had gone forth to the ends of the earth, unaffected by the confusion of Babel. It was for the Association to take up this great work and present to the public the unity of science and religion as they alone could present it. He ventured to hope that the Committee would consider the question whether it was not possible to have in London in some central situation such as Essex-street Chapel a course of lectures by scientific men, and he was happy to say that the Unitarian body included a very considerable body of such men.

The Rev. W. BLAZEY, seconded the motion. He said that when he was a student in Manchester New College Mr. Sharpe did his best to lead the students to follow him in the study of Egyptian archæology. He not only wrote able books, but he was always most generously willing to fill the arms of students with those works. He was one of the best friends that the Association had ever had—generous with his purse on all occasions and most constant and regular in his attendance. He was also extremely generous in private life.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

The Rev. T. W. FRECKELTON moved:—

"That this Meeting offers its sincere thanks to the Rev. Dr. James Freeman Clarke and the Rev. W. M. Ainsworth for their kind services at the present meeting; and that the Rev. Dr. Clarke be requested to allow his discourse to be placed in the hands of the Committee for publication."

He expressed his high sense of the privilege he had enjoyed in listening to the Rev. W. M. Ainsworth, which had kindled and spread from heart to heart the holy fire which made them one, and made heaven and earth one land. It would be very difficult on his part to say even half what he thought with regard to the sermon preached by the Rev. Dr. James Freeman Clarke. In one respect he felt that that sermon was very hard on himself; for he had to preach Sunday after Sunday in that pulpit, and how could he ever preach a bad sermon there again after what they had listened to that morning—(laughter)? Dr. Freeman Clarke had not only preached to the congregation then present, but he had been speaking to speaking men, prophesying to prophets, and his words would be echoed all over the land, and worked into sermons. It was nothing to Dr. Clarke to speak to a large audience, but it was a great deal to them to have seen him in the flesh.

Mr. LUFTON seconded the resolution, and in doing so said that some thirty years ago a sainted lady from America, who was visiting at Leeds when the congregation there were in want of a minister, recommended him to invite Dr. Clarke over to England. From that time to the present he had felt a strong desire to see Dr. Clarke, and his name had always been associated in his mind with every great and good cause.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

The Rev. Dr. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE said that the kindness which he had experienced since he had been in England had been so great that he really could say nothing about it, because he felt it so deeply. He had had great joy in meeting so many whom he had known by name for years. He had been something of a sinner himself in the way of pen and ink, and he had found many persons who had welcomed him on account of something that they had chanced to see in his works. It reminded him of the expression of the Apostle Paul, who was not satisfied with pen and ink communion with his friends, but wished to see them face to face, that his joy might be full. His passage from America was one which he certainly should remember—(applause); still he would undertake such a passage again for the sake of receiving such a welcome as had been given to him in England, and of having such an opportunity of addressing them as he had had that morning.

The Rev. W. M. AINSWORTH said he regarded it as a great honour and privilege to have been permitted to take part in the services of the morning. It had afforded him especial pleasure to listen to Dr. Freeman Clarke, for on his (Mr. Ainsworth's) visit to America he was not able to hear him.

Mr. H. NEW moved:—

"That this Meeting records with honour, as of highest rank in the holy brotherhood of the Liberal Faith, the revered names of Henry Bellows and Orville Dewey, of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow and Ralph Waldo Emerson, gratefully remembering how truly it may be said of them that they served God in simple-hearted and practical devotion to truth and goodness, and loved their fellow-men."

He said the men mentioned in the resolution had shown their faith by honouring God and loving man. They were now stars in the intellectual and spiritual firmament. Two of them were preachers of righteousness, another was a sweet and pure singer. Ralph Waldo Emerson was to him almost a passion. He had read over and over again that wonderful prose poem the "Book of Nature," and it seemed to raise him into a purer atmosphere of life than he could find elsewhere. He knew not where in modern literature he could find so much wisdom combined with so much sweetness. He therefore begged the meeting to join with him in revering the memory of these departed great ones.

The Rev. W. H. CHANNING seconded the resolution. It had been his good fortune to know Henry Bellows in private life and also Orville Dewey. Longfellow, he thought, was too much regarded from his intellectual side; but the beauty of his soul sprang out of his living communion with the risen and glorified Son of the Father. The very interior of his soul was religious. Ralph Waldo Emerson was the representative man of New England. Since his death he (Mr. Channing) had night and day studied his works over again, finding fresh beauties in them on every page. Though he was generally regarded as a prose writer he was really the American poet of this generation, and after ages would acknowledge it.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

The Rev. H. IERSON read a communication from Bishop Joseph Ferencz respecting the establishment of the new congregation in Buda-Pest.

The Rev. A. GORDON moved:—

"That the Meeting receives with much gratification the communication now presented from Bishop Joseph Ferencz, and congratulating the Unitarians of Hungary on the happy establishment of a congregation, under the ministry of Mr. C. Derzi, in the capital of Hungary, commends this undertaking to the continued support of the Executive Committee."

He said that this was in the first place an expression of that fraternal feeling which had been cherished ever since the formation of the Association towards their brethren in that distant land, and in the next place it was an expression of their joy that the oldest Unitarian community in the world had merged from a merely provincial position, and taken its stand in Buda-Pest, the capital of the country. When they found that in the capitals of Europe the principles which they held were promulgated, they might expect that their influence might radiate over the wider area of the countries themselves—(applause).

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, in seconding the motion, said that he should like to add to it a cordial word of greeting to the German Protestant Verein, which was now in session, and he suggested that a telegram should be sent to them by the Secretary.

The resolution, with the addition suggested by Mr. STEINTHAL, was unanimously agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN proposed:—

"That the Association gladly receives the co-operation of the various Unitarian Mission Societies throughout the kingdom, and, giving cordial welcome to their representatives present at this meeting, desires especially to express its hearty sympathy with the missionaries in the difficult but important work in which they are engaged."

They all knew what hard-working men their ministers were; but the missionaries were particularly hard-worked, for they had to perform distressing duties among a class of people which it was not the lot of many to come across. It was very desirable that the Association should be in immediate connection with the poorer brethren, and it was only through the missionaries that the best means of giving the necessary assistance could be discovered.

The Rev. Professor CARPENTER seconded the resolution, which was unanimously agreed to.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, as representing the Manchester District Missionary Society, responded to the resolution, and thanked the meeting for it.

The Rev. A. CHALMERS also acknowledged the resolution on behalf of the West Riding of Yorkshire.

The Rev. J. HARRISON also responded on behalf of the missionaries.

The Rev. H. WILLIAMSON (of Dundee) said that in Scotland a revolution had taken place in theological views of late years. If the Scotch Church would remove the Confession of Faith and the shorter Catechism and leave their ministers free, he believed that in every town in Scotland a Unitarian congregation would be formed.

Mr. S. S. TAYLER moved:—

"That the hearty thanks of the meeting be presented to the Rev. T. W. Freckelton and the committee and congregation of Unity Church for their kind reception of the Association on the occasion of this anniversary."

This was seconded by the Rev. T. L. MARSHALL, and agreed to.

The proceedings then terminated.

THE CONFERENCE.

A Conference was held on Thursday morning in Essex-street Chapel, at which the chair was taken by Mr. DAVID AINSWORTH, M.P., President of the Association. There was a large attendance. A hymn having been sung, prayer was offered by the Rev. J. BIRKS, of Taunton. Papers were then read on "The Duty of our Churches in Relation to the Masses of the People," by the Rev. J. T. WHITEHEAD and the Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, which will be found on another page.

Mr. CHATFIELD CLARKE said that four things were wanted:—Re-birth of the Spirit, men who had power to approach the Master, money, and lay helpers. He hoped that the challenge thrown out by Dr. Crosskey would soon be taken up in London. It had been already tried in a limited degree by Mr. Wicksteed with a fair measure of success. There was a strong desire on the part of the working classes in London to have Sunday evening lectures at their clubs, and he had received many invitations to deliver such lectures. He had delivered one on the subject of Carlyle, which was admirably received by the audience. He did not believe in getting the working classes to a large extent in chapels; but he thought great good might be done if a number of laymen and ministers would unite in promoting Sunday evening lectures in public halls not directly connected with religion, but indirectly leading to it. An East-end clergyman of great experience had told him that he did not believe the working classes were hostile to religion, but only indifferent. They disliked what they called "shop religion"—the professional advocacy of religion—certain set forms. Education was beginning to tell upon the people; and he believed that, if earnest efforts were made in the right direction they might look hopefully to the future.

Mr. JOSEPH LUFTON thought there would be great difficulty in getting the rich and poor to meet together as freely as could be desired, but he had no doubt that if an effort were made to establish churches for the working classes, pure and simple, the object would be attained. He had seen working-class congregations in connection with the Methodist body admirably conducted, and without any thought of having the wealthier classes associated with them. They all needed a new baptism as a religious body before the great work of dealing with the masses could be effectually carried out. The wealthier classes should do what they could to assist struggling churches, but not in an offensive way, or as an act of patronising charity.

Professor J. ESTLIN CARPENTER referred to a movement recently initiated by the vicar of St. Jude's, Commercial-street, Whitechapel, who had carried on a series of evening services to attract the people, consisting of selections of sacred music, readings from the Scriptures and the poets, and a short extempore prayer. He also related an instance in which a minister of a manufacturing town in the north of England, observing that a number of working people had nowhere to go for shelter during the breakfast hour between eight and nine o'clock, opened his chapel every morning, and invited as many as desired to enter. A short service was conducted, consisting of reading from the Scriptures and other books, and prayer. Never fewer than sixty persons were present, and there were often more. Professor Carpenter commended this as a piece of Christian inventiveness, which he hoped might be imitated in many places.

Mr. G. B. DALBY (of Preston), while thinking it necessary in some cases to establish separate congregations, considered it very desirable to bring into ordinary congregations as large a portion of working people as possible. In the church with which he was connected the problem of uniting the middle and working classes had been to a considerable extent solved. The two classes were united in the choir, in the Sunday-school, and on the Committee, and with the happiest results, all working harmoniously together. The services were made as simple and as practicable as possible, the wealthier people being willing to forego many of the conventional phrases to which they had been long accustomed, but which were objectionable to many of the poorer members of the congregation.

Mr. HENRY JEFFERY believed that working men would be heartily welcomed in any of the London congregations. In the church at Islington all the seats were free, and there were working men in connection with the congregation. It was impossible to distinguish them by their personal appearance, as they were well clad and refined in their manners. Mr. Bowie was doing a good work in the neighbourhood of Stamford Hill amongst the working people, and Mr. Spears at Stepney was undertaking a similar work amongst the same classes, which would astonish many who would personally witness it. The great thing was to realise the end which was sought; the object should be a distinctly religious one—not merely to set up poor imitations of mechanics' institutions throughout the metropolis, but to endeavour to build up the religious thought and life of the people to whom they appealed. Unless they had some common understanding of the sort a spirit of enthusiasm and zeal would not be excited, and the money would not be forthcoming.

The Rev. JOHN WRIGHT said that the difference of opinion on the subject under discussion arose from the fact that the term "masses" included very various elements. The "dangerous and perishing classes," as Theodore Parker called them, could not be reached by theology, and must be dealt with by reformatory and other religious influences, such as were common to all Christians and philanthropists. But the great mass of the people were not immoral or obstinately irreligious. Education was increasing amongst them, which no doubt in many instances tended to foster a spirit of intellectual conceit, which led them to despise everything in the shape of religion. The education of the working classes at the present day was chiefly intellectual without any religious element, and hence the necessity for the action of religious organisations in order to meet the want. Unitarians had a special responsibility in the matter, because a majority of the people had arrived at a state in which it was impossible for them to accept a mere religion of authority. With regard to the two methods proposed, the establishment of special congregations for the working classes and inviting them to existing chapels, there was no reason why both methods should not be adopted; the one did not necessarily exclude the other. Working men and women would be heartily welcomed in existing congregations, whether they had good Sunday clothes or no. The great thing was to let them feel that they had the warm sympathy of those about them, and that all were standing on the same level. He thought that the time for talking had now come to an end, and that the period for action should begin.

The Rev. Dr. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE said he was about to break through the resolution which he had made on coming to the Conference to sit still and not say anything. It had occurred to him that they might like to have a little experience from the other side of the Atlantic. In the first place, they had no classes in the United States—(laughter). There were no higher and, of course, no lower classes, but all belonged to the working class. The number of those who did not work in the United States was an infinitesimal quantity, of which no account was taken, and they generally went to Europe to spend their time—(laughter). It was a curious fact that those who were technically called the labouring classes were among the chief supporters of religious institutions. During the five years of the Civil War, when it was not thought safe to undertake anything in the way of enterprise, the value of ecclesiastical property in the United States nearly doubled, and more money was expended during those years in building churches and providing religious instruction by the people themselves than in any other five years in the history of the United States. The people who were suffering the burdens of war needed religious consolation and strength more than at any other time. His own chapel, like many others, was ordinarily closed for a month or two during the summer, because nearly everyone was out of the city; but during those years it was kept open all the time, and there were as large congregations as ever. The great point was to recognise that all were alike, and on the same level—having the same needs, and the same sense of need. On one occasion an old friend of his, Father Taylor, the sailor minister, invited a cousin of his (Dr. Clarke's), Mr. T. B. Curtis, to attend one of the sailors' prayer meetings. He did so, and was called upon to speak, but he did not feel quite at home. He told the men that they felt great respect for them as sailors, and had great confidence in them; that they were a very valuable body of citizens, and if they did their duty well they would be universally respected. He talked to them de haut en bas, but he did not mean to be supercilious. Father Taylor then rose and said, "If there is any other old sinner who wants to tell his experience now's the time"—(laughter). In one of the free chapels at Boston, attended by a great many poor persons, there was a carpenter, a skilful and intelligent man, who, getting into habits of intemperance, stayed away. The minister, seeing that he and his family were likely to go to the dogs, appealed to the members, and said to them, "We must save that man; it will never do to let him go." They all assented, and some members saw him and talked with him, and did their best to encourage him. He felt as deeply as themselves, but thought he had gone too far. They promised to help him in every way, and induced him to sign the pledge. He came to the services again, but he was never left alone. Some time afterwards he was sent to do some work at Providence, and as none of the people were able to go there with him the minister went himself and spent three days with him there, and slept in the same bed with him. At length he was regarded as entirely reformed; but some time afterwards he relapsed, and a church meeting was called to consider his case, and the man himself was persuaded to attend. The poor fellow sat down at the end of the chapel during the proceedings. The minister began by reading from the Bible, "Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual restore such an one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted." He also read the passage in which Jesus said, "If thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone; if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother. But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established. And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the Church; but if he neglect to hear the Church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican;" adding, as an ingenious piece of exegesis, "What ought you to do to a heathen man and a publican?" "Convert him, of course"—(laughter). Accordingly they went to work to convert their brother again; and the minister asked him to come and pray for them, that they might do their duty by him as they ought. The poor fellow came hesitatingly forward, and a more touching prayer than he offered was never heard. He thanked God that he had such good friends who would not forget him, and begged to be forgiven and helped. He was afterwards restored to fellowship, and there was no more backsliding. He believed in Free Churches. In the Church with which he was connected everything was so arranged that every one could come in and sit where he liked, whether he paid much or little, or nothing; and the place was made as much as possible like a home. He thought that in every large town every denomination ought to have at least one Church whose doors were wide open to all comers. The work of Christ was a missionary work, and they could not carry it out unless they were able to tell the people something which they knew from their inward experience to be the very message of God to the souls of his children. There was no man so bad or so low who, if appealed to in a manly and brotherly way, would not respond to the appeal.

Mr. W. BLESSY said he had been connected with the working classes all his life, and his experience was that they would not come to the churches and chapels. Outside organisations should therefore be started. At Birmingham thousands of working men and women attended adult classes quite apart from the religious organisations of the town. Could not something of the sort be done in London? A large room might be obtained, to which the working-men would come and listen to some biographical study. They did not want to be preached at so much as to be helped, and they might be led to study Carlyle, Emerson, Longfellow, and the New Testament. He felt sure that if a movement of that kind were started the working-men would respond, and the object they had in view would be largely attained.

The Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED said it was constantly alleged that the working classes had an invincible objection to entering places of worship, but what they objected to was not the places but the worship. The Kyrie Society had given oratorios in his chapel four or five times, and there was generally a crowded attendance, many of the poorest people in the neighbourhood being present. Not long ago Dr. Richardson gave a lecture there on Priestley as a theologian and a man of science, and the place was exceedingly well filled, principally with working people. The oratorio nights brought all sorts of persons there, some of them mechanics, who could not be distinguished, so far as dress was concerned, from millionaires, and others ragged and tattered, entering in a slipshod style just as loungers in public-houses. Either they did not sufficiently care for religion to come and get it in chapels, or else Unitarians had not got religion to give them there. Which of those two views was the correct one he did not pretend to say, but they would go in a false direction as long as they did not recognise that that was the alternative.

Mr. HERBERT BURROWS said that undoubtedly there was among a large section of the working classes an absolute indifference to religion. In his opinion the reason was this. For the last twenty-five or thirty years the line of demarcation between class and class in England had been getting wider and sharper every day, and the wealth of the country had been getting more and more into the hands of the few, while the mass of the population were becoming poorer and poorer—"No, no". Two years ago, after attending the meeting of the Association in the chapel, he walked with a friend into Drury-lane and Great Wyld-street, and there he saw the people physically and morally starving, while the members of the Association adjourned to a five-shilling dinner at the Star and Garter—(laughter). Why did they not follow the American plan of shutting up the chapels for a month or six weeks in the summer, and attend to the people who stopped in town, holding open-air meetings in Drury-lane? Last Sunday he walked through Regent's-park with a friend, and saw eight or ten large crowds listening to speakers. Some were talking of infidelity, others of Atheism, others of science, and others represented the Salvation Army. Why did not Unitarians follow the same practice? All the great political and social movements of the last fifty years had been conducted not by waiting for the people to come to chapels and halls, but by going to them and telling them what would do them good. A fortnight ago, at the St. James's-hall, Mr. Bradlaugh got seven thousand people together, and the Sunday after eighty thousand assembled around him at Hyde-park. Unitarians were too respectable. They had gone a little in the democratic direction to-day, for they were about to hold an eighteen-penny soirée instead of a five-shilling dinner. He hoped that next year they would have a six-penny soirée, and get some of the Drury-lane and Great Wyld-street people to attend—(laughter). If he had been present at the meeting at Unity Chapel the day previously he should have proposed a working man as President of the Association. Surely among their ranks they had some working men capable of filling such a post! He confessed with shame and sorrow that generally he had to preach to a respectable congregation rather than to a congregation of working men. Mr. Page Hopps was about the only man among them who appreciated the power of the cheap press. The present years were perhaps the most feverish since Christianity was introduced. In matters political, social, and religious, they were standing with one foot on the old world and the other on the new. He wished he could honestly think that the Unitarian Church had the complete key of the position; if they had not no other church had it, and they ought to have it; and if they did not get it they would fail, as they deserved to do.

Mr. W. GRIMSLEY, as a working man accustomed to speak in streets, parks, and hospitals, said there were among the masses of the people an intense desire to hear the simple gospel of the blessed God. He did not agree with what had been said about the United States. He had been to that country twice, and it was far from true to say that there were no class distinctions there. Such distinctions were not acknowledged, but if a man happened to have £50, and another only £10, the man with the £50 would pass the other by. The old gospel way was to go out to the people, and not to wait for them to come to chapel. He was afraid that the great reason why many of the working classes did not come to church or chapel was simply because the ministry was not able to cope with the events of the times and with plain gospel truth. The ministry at the present time under-estimated and under-valued the intellectual capabilities of the working man, who knew when he heard a good sermon, and when he was simply listening to metaphysics or philosophical ideas which did not interest him at all. They should not only preach to the people, but suit their actions to their words.

Mr. I. M. WADE said if the ministers were the men in the right place they ought to lead the laity into the field and see that the work was done. They must either do it by themselves or must set other people to do it. Educationally and physically a minister might not be able to go out into the open air to preach, but he ought to be able to find other people to do so. Mr. Burrows had told them that within a stone's-throw of that chapel there were crowds of people physically and morally starving. If he were a Christian minister he would not care whether it was a millionaire or a poor day-labourer whose soul he was able to lead in the right direction. Somehow or other they must get to the masses. If the masses would not come to them it was their business to go to the masses. As Christian ministers and teachers it was their duty to speak a word of truth and holiness to the people, and they could safely leave all the educational and entertaining matter, which the working classes were said to seek after, to the lecture room and the platform. He did not want to see their chapels turned into lecture-halls, or their pulpits into platforms. There was work for them to do in their own way, and he was glad to find that at last some gentlemen had discovered that Sunday-school work was calculated to benefit the people—(laughter and applause).

Mr. HERBERT BURROWS said that nothing had been further from his thoughts than to convey the impression that he wanted to get the people to attend chapels to listen to lectures on science only. He wished to arouse their attention and interest by such addresses, and by that means bring them to places of worship.

Mr. H. BRAMLEY said the working men had been rather abused for not going to church or chapel; but some of the members of their own congregation were not very regular in attending services, and many of them would confess that they rarely attended more than once on the Sunday. If he were a working man and had to work hard all the week, he should prefer a walk in the fields on the Sunday morning to going to chapel. In the north of England in many manufacturing towns very little work was done on the Monday. The working men wanted rest on the Sunday, and they could attend to their spiritual needs later on. They could not be expected to attend places of worship on Sunday morning, and therefore efforts must be made, especially in regard to Sunday evening work. They must also pay great attention to winter work, because they would never keep the working man in chapel when the weather was fine and they could go out into the fresh air. Exceptional occasions were the best for meeting the wants of the working classes, and if something worth hearing was offered to them in the winter they would come and listen to it. In Sheffield Mr. Fay, from America, advised them as an experiment to take the Albert Hall, which would seat 2,500 people. Three Sunday evenings running the place was filled by an audience, consisting to a great extent of working men. Mr. Fay delivered three doctrinal lectures, and they were listened to with the greatest attention and interest. His knowledge of the educated artisan class was that they preferred to have something to think over. Even if they did not themselves go to church or chapel they usually sent their children to the Sunday-school, and he regarded the Sunday-school as the necessary of future Churches. The aristocracy of Unitarianism was dying out, old families were dying off, and they were not succeeded by quite the same class of people, so that they must look to an accession from the shopkeepers and the working classes. He thought that the frequency with which ministers changed their residences had something to do with the weakness of the hold which they had upon the people. But no minister could get on unless he was faithfully backed up by his laity, and if the members of his congregation were interested in the social life of the community they would be a great help to their minister. It was absolutely necessary to continue Sunday-schools as religious schools, and that the ministers and the laity should work together hopefully. If they did so, and kept strictly to the ways that they laid down for themselves, they would gradually be successful.

Dr. LONGSTAFF said the discussion had reminded him of the attempt at the beginning of the present century to teach science to the working classes, by means of the establishment of Mechanics' Institutions. A consideration of the results attained in that direction might teach a lesson which might be of great service to those who were attempting to bring about a change in the moral and religious state of the working population. He had been early connected with Dr. Birkbeck's movement, and his experience taught him that if subjects of interest to them were dealt with there was no difficulty in getting working men to attend. The great mistake that was made in connection with Mechanics' Institutions was that in many cases, when the establishments died out, sufficient care was not taken to bring before the mechanics subjects in which they were personally interested, such as the scientific principles of the arts which they practised; and papers were read on literary matters, the lecturer trying far more to display how much he knew than to teach the people. Mechanics would go away with far more pleasure from a lecture from which they had gained one idea than from any exhibition or phantasmagoria. Some fifty years ago when he went to Hull to practise as a physician, he started a course of purely scientific lectures adapted to the wants of the men of the place. The first night about twenty attended, but he dealt with his subject in a plain manner, avoiding technicalities as much as possible, and representing the various points in different ways, till the success was so great that before the course was completed hundreds attended. If they wished to interest the mechanics of England in morality they must first interest them in civilisation. If they advertised lectures on some points which would enable the working-men to live better and enjoy more comforts than they had hitherto done, though they might begin with an audience of only ten, it would not be long before hundreds would be listening to them. Above all, they should avoid anything sectarian. There should be no allusion whatever to sects; but they should civilise the men, teach them how they might enjoy life to the utmost by practising Christianity without knowing it, and so make them Christians in spite of themselves.

The PRESIDENT moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Whitehead and Mr. Bowie for their admirable papers, which were not only exhaustive in themselves, but had led to a great deal of very interesting discussion.

Mr. D. MARTINEAU seconded the vote of thanks, and in doing so said it might be quite possible to carry out the views of both Mr. Wade and Dr. Longstaff—to attract the people, in the first place, by giving them knowledge of things that they wished to learn, and afterwards to give them a knowledge of religion.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

The Rev. J. T. WHITEHEAD and the Rev. W. C. BOWIE acknowledged the vote of thanks.

The hymn commencing "Onward Christian Soldiers" was then sung, after which the Rev. H. IERSON pronounced the benediction, and the proceedings terminated.

THE SOIREE.

On Thursday evening a soirée was held at the Cannon-street Hotel. Tea was served at six o'clock, after which a concert was given in the large hall by a choir of vocalists from several churches. At half-past seven the President, DAVID AINSWORTH, Esq., took the chair.

The CHAIRMAN said he had experienced very great difficulty in selecting any particular subject on which to address the meeting, and, consequently, he thought it very much better not to address them on any particular subject at all. They had been told on various occasions that the Unitarian body was moribund, and he was extremely sorry that those prophets who considered so were not present at the Conference at Liverpool. If any of them were present that evening they would go away converted, and would not prophesy any more in the same direction. Dr. Clarke, in his sermon at Islington, said truly that the Unitarian body was leaven—intended to leaven the whole lump. Leaven was naturally regarded as a simple thing, though it did a great work. The Unitarians were a small sect, and if they were to be leaven they must be a small sect. Many who at one time belonged to them found the Churches meeting them more than half way, and so they drifted off. There were others who thought that further advances must be made, and they naturally stuck to the beliefs in which they had been brought up, though after a time, perhaps, they also drifted away. Thus a constant change was continually going on. They frequently received new friends, but at the same time they must make up their minds that they would gradually lose some of those who were now connected with them.

When he was in America some years ago he said to a gentleman whom he met there, "You always find an American everywhere." The reply was, "That may be so; but there has always been a Britisher there first." Unitarians were very much like the Britishers. They went first, and then the Americans or anybody else followed afterwards. That was certainly what was done by a great many Churches in this country. They must set an example, and others would follow in their footsteps. As a rule, they were generally first in making advances in civil and religious liberty. The changes, however, that were taking place were sometimes too rapid for some friends, but, on the whole, he thought they were both an improving and an increasing body. At any rate, they held their own ground. One change which he might suggest was that Whit-week was rather an inconvenient time for holding the meetings, especially so far as the country friends were concerned. An alteration had been made this year in having an eighteen-penny tea instead of a five-shilling dinner; but he could only say that, judging from the appearances of the meeting, he did not think more people would have attended at the dinner than were then present. Looking at teas from a political point of view, they had proved extremely beneficial for the Liberal party in West Cumberland. In former times, Conservatives there had an annual dinner, and held the representation of the county in their own hands. The Liberals had to content themselves with tea-meetings, and what was done at the last general election was very much owing to the success of those meetings—(laughter and applause).

The Rev. A. N. BLATCHFORD proposed the sentiment, "Success to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association." It was impossible to mention that, he said, with any other feelings than those of gratitude for a grand past and great hope for a still grander future. The sentiment carried their thoughts back to days when their fathers struggled for great principles in a way which the present generation had not experienced; and it became them, in the midst of congratulations on work done and progress made, to remember that other men laboured and handed down the mighty trust which their fidelity had imposed upon their successors—(applause). Whatever witnesses the venerable Congregational Church might have sent forth to testify with their blood to the sincerity of their Non-conformity, it was no less a glory to the Unitarians to remember that the last fire of Smithfield was lit for a man belonging to their Church—(applause). It was a grand thing to know that every forward movement, whether in science, in Government, or in religion, carried with it the hearty sympathy and the kindly co-operation of the Association, and wherever there was a Unitarian worthy of the name and of the traditions of his fathers, there was to be found a man who would count one in all that savoured of advancement in the right direction—(applause). Their work lay in the future, and if he wanted a gauge of the spirit in which it was to be carried on he did not know that he could find a truer one than the quiet, manly facing of a great principle which was exhibited at the business meeting yesterday, when, as a body, they unflinchingly declared for perfect unreserved Protestantism in spirit as well as in name. Methods changed, and they must adapt themselves to them. When old John Smeaton constructed the Eddystone Lighthouse he was asked how long it would last, and he said, "As long as the rock itself shall endure." It did last as long as the rock, and longer. The foundations gave way, and so, adapting themselves to a changed condition of things, a new and safer spot was selected, a grander and more useful structure was built. So he would say with regard to religious and theological life. He looked forward certainly to the time when they would prove again and again that they were faithful to the spirit of their fathers; and he hoped that, in after ages, when the Association was still carrying on its work, it might be on another basis, but, at all events, in the same spirit, that even then it might be said, in the words of the poet, of those who came after them—

"Well done, thou watcher on the lonely tower,
Is the day breaking, dawns the happy hour?"

We long to see it, tell us once again,
If the broad daylight streams along the plain?"
And the answer would be then as it was to-day:—

"It breaks, it comes, the darkening shadow flies,
A beaming radiance lights across the skies,
The mountain tops reflect it calm and clear,
The plain is yet in shade, the day is near."
—(applause).

The Rev. H. IERSON said it was felt to be a real privilege to work on the committee of the Association, to be connected with it in the council, and to carry on the varied work of the institution. When they spoke of the British and Foreign Association they were referring to such a number of agencies and such a variety of work that it was rather difficult to condense into a few remarks all that could be said about it. It had existed for fifty-six years, but it had an ante-natal existence, for it lived in various forms before it became consolidated under the name that it now bore. The Unitarian Fund used to hold annual meetings, and the reports of these meetings read very much like those of the British and Foreign Association. That Fund began somewhere about 1806; but before that time there was a Unitarian Society founded towards the latter end of the last century. It was that society that was really answerable for the publication of the Improved Version of which so much had been heard of late, and which was now coming to the front as one of the old versions that ought to be honoured. It might be asked, when were the objects of the society to be accomplished, and the Association to come to an end? So long as they were able to transform their work to meet the living wants of the living time they would necessarily be compelled to prolong their existence, and, until the millennium arrived, he was afraid they would have to endure the Association. He asked them to put up with it not only with the best good temper, but with the utmost determination to drive it on. He could not help thinking that a transformation was already going on not only in the spirit of the body, but in the spirit of the Association. He felt proud that the Association had initiated the movement at Liverpool as it had initiated other valuable movements, such as the Domestic Mission. He certainly trusted that they would be prepared to stretch out even yet further; and one of the very prime objects should be not only to infuse Unitarian principles, but to deal with the want of men for Unitarian religion. If when the committee came before the members next year they could not render a good and faithful account of the recommendation to try to bring religious thought and feeling of the Unitarian type as a true, earnest, practical religion before the minds of the people in a way that they have hitherto not been able to do—in some organised powerful manner—he should feel that they had not done their duty—(applause).

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG said that the sentiment which he had the honour to propose was one that was time-honoured in the history of the Association, and which he trusted no words of his would dishonour. It was that of "Civil and Religious Liberty," a text on which had been delivered many eloquent speeches—eloquent not only with the fervour of the orator, but also with the great facts and great aspirations which had awakened a common emotion in the hearers. In speaking to the sentiment, it was wonderful to reflect on the very different circumstances under which other men had spoken to it in years gone by; to remember the great battles which had been fought and won by the sainted dead; how many chains had been struck off; how many liberties had been won for the down-trodden and oppressed by the battles in which their Unitarian forefathers had borne more than their fair share of the burden and heat of the day. At the present time it seemed at first almost a light thing to speak to such a sentiment. What further civil and religious liberties did they want? He supposed they never came into any harsh contact with the powers that be; their notion of the executive government was probably incarnated in the respectable policeman who, so far from being their master, they felt to be their servant, and sometimes even their servant's young man—(laughter). The most disagreeable contact into which they ever came with the representatives of law and order was the quarterly interview with the gatherer of her Majesty's taxes—(laughter). They must, therefore, cast their eyes further afield to gather the enthusiasm which this sentiment should awaken. In past years a supplement was added to it in the words "all the world over." Let them look to the East, and behold that strange and semi-barbaric country, in which the civilisation of the West and the savagery of some portions of the East seemed to struggle together for mastery. If there was any race on the face of this globe which we would think should be received by Christian Churches of every grade with kindly and generous hospitality, it was that race which had bestowed upon humanity the Divinest gift which humanity ever received; but in Russia the Jew, for no crime of his own, for no offence that he had committed, but simply because he was a Jew, was barred from all social sympathies, and cursed with the persecution not only of the ignorant mob, but of the authorities, who connived at the crimes that were committed against him. The people of England should and did send to the Jew in Russia their heartfelt sympathies and the gifts of their hands to enable him to take his place in some happier land as a free citizen of a free community. But perhaps, after all, the battle of civil and religious liberty was not yet fully fought out, even in England. There was a certain band of hard-handed men and humble women to be found in many a town and city of this country, who, according to their lights, were striving to bring before the people a gospel by which to live and by which to die. True it was, according to their own confession, a gospel of blood and fire; but no one could deny that it had rescued thousands and tens of thousands who most needed to be rescued from all the evils from which humanity could suffer. The Salvation Army had at any rate emptied many a public-house and divorced the people from many evil habits to which they tenaciously clung, and which neither clergy, presbyters, nor ministers had been able to wean them from before. Yet when these persons in their uncouth manner marched through the English streets, and the rude, rough people whom they were trying to save proved themselves unwilling to be saved, and treated them with contumely and scoffing, English law had sometimes appeared to be not on the side of those who were striving to perform a Christian duty, but on the side of the scoffer and the persecutor. Again, in the House of Commons there was a man defrauded of his rights, and, more than that, a constituency defrauded of its rights—(loud applause). No personal dislike for a man, no abhorrence of certain principles which he held, should keep them back one moment from declaring, in season and out of season, their desire, as Englishmen and as lovers of freedom, that Mr. Bradlaugh and Northampton should each have their just rights and privileges—(applause). There was another matter on which he had sometimes tried to excite himself, though hitherto in vain, namely, the presence of the registrar in the vestry. No doubt that functionary represented a principle to which their own principles were hostile; but he did not want the inequality redressed by levelling him up to the position of a subordinate and occasional under civil servant of the Government, but by measures of a far more drastic nature. Before sitting down, he must enter a word of protest against the terrible errors which were being committed with regard to Ireland. The rights of public meeting, of free speech, and of a free Press were part and parcel of the principles of civil and religious liberty, and never had any Liberal statesman been unfaithful in the smallest degree to those rights without having had to repent of it at his leisure. He would trust no man with irresponsible power over the liberties of the English or the Irish people.

The Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS, in proposing the next sentiment, "Prosperity to the American Association, and a hearty welcome to its representative, Dr. Freeman Clarke," said he was sorry that the complaint made at the Liverpool Conference, that there were not sufficient laymen taking part in their proceedings, had not been attended to. He did not, however, think that it was the fault of the ministers. It was a shame even to hint that they were intensely anxious to talk. That was not the reason; it was because some laymen were very lazy, and others could not talk—(laughter). He was sure that the ministers, who had always to be grinding the organ, would be delighted to come and sit at the feet of the laymen. For himself he should be only too glad to have a holiday once a month, and be allowed to sit in the pew and listen to one of the members of his congregation. But he did not profess to be a parson; he was much more of a layman. He was a member of the great congregation who paid no seat rent, having a free seat in the pulpit—(laughter). He desired to say a word or two with regard to the subject discussed at the Conference, because he had, on one or two occasions, spoken a word or two in favour of the Salvation Army. He did not wish to recall anything he had said about the spirit of the work and about the beautiful Christian motive of rescuing the heathen, but he was bound to say that during the last few weeks he had seen, heard, and read of things done and said that were to him most disappointing—(hear, hear)—he was going to say appalling. He recently attended a meeting of the Army on a Sunday afternoon, and he had never witnessed anywhere anything so utterly appalling—such miserable, poor, trashy, shallow, and vulgar nonsense from beginning to end, except the speech of a Lancashire girl, who unquestionably spoke from her heart, and who, he believed, was a new comer. His serious belief was that the excitement could not be kept up. He was sorry for it, and could only say that at present he held his opinion very much in abeyance. With regard to the sentiment he had to propose, he thought there was a certain fitness in his offering a cordial welcome to Dr. Clarke, because he hoped in a few weeks to sail for America himself, and to attend the National Conference in September, so that as he expected to be welcomed there it was only right to anticipate that welcome by giving to Dr. Clarke, in the name of the English brethren, a hearty and cordial welcome to this country—(applause). They welcomed him for two reasons chiefly. They had a growing belief in the greatness of America and in the increasing greatness of Unitarianism in that country. It was said of Mark Twain that shortly after his first baby was born he pretended to care very little about it; but one day his wife saw him fondling it, and said to him, "Now confess, Mark, you do love that baby," when he replied, "I can't do that, but I do confess that I respect the little thing for his father's sake"—(laughter). In like manner Englishmen might not profess much love for the American people, but at all events they respected America for the mother's sake, for they themselves were the mother of that mighty people. There was nothing more important than that these two English-speaking races should be like brothers, thoroughly understanding one another, and resolving to endure anything rather than fight—(applause). Americans themselves were ready and thankful to acknowledge that this was their mother-country. Most people were all the better for having had a mother—(laughter). A wit once said that Adam and Eve would have done a great deal better if they had had a mother—(laughter)—and it certainly seemed a curious thing that the first pair made in that unnatural way went wrong so soon. It might have been because they had not a mother to look after them—(laughter). They were all anxious to join hands and hearts with the American Unitarians in particular. Though some of the strong brethren had had to leave their home and go into lodgings, like Theodore Parker and Emerson, they wished to include them all, and to bless God for such men. Then they desired to welcome Dr. Clarke for his own sake. He had done for the Unitarian Church and for the religious world beautiful, advanced, scholarly work, for which they were all very grateful to him. Though he had not always belonged to the very advanced school, he was one of the brave men who dared to champion Theodore Parker—(applause). When all men passed him by, Dr. Clarke took him to his heart, to his Church and his pulpit and risked the results. Dr. Clarke appeared to have come out of the first Unitarian Church in America, which in some way had grown out of the first Episcopalian Church there, and if that was not Apostolic succession he did not know what was. He had recently read the following inquiry sent to the New York Sun:—"Dear sir, please inform us if Emerson and Longfellow were indeed believers in the Christian religion." To which the Sun replied:—"Mr. Emerson and Mr. Longfellow were unbelievers in the Christian religion. The essence of belief in the Christian religion is belief in the deity of the Lord Jesus Christ. Without the Godhead of Christ there is no real Christianity; it is true there is a sort of doctrine which many people fancy to be Christian, and according to this doctrine Jesus Christ was not God, but a creature, a man or a created being somewhat inferior to man; but this is not the doctrine of Christian religion; it is a foe of Christianity, it is a stone on the broad road to total unbelief and infidelity. This is the sort of doctrine we understand to have been the doctrine of Emerson and Longfellow; they were Unitarians, they were not believers in the Christian religion." The Unitarian newspaper quoting the extract had the following note:—"We have tried to think of some special qualification which the New York Sun possesses which would make it an authority in a definition of Christianity"—(laughter). He could only say, as had been said before, if Emerson, Longfellow, Lloyd Garrison and Oliver Wendell Holmes were going to hell, or some place, not heaven, the tide of emigration would have to flow in that direction. Where the souls of Emerson and Longfellow were he for one desired his soul to be. He wished for no better heaven than to be with such men who had spoken the noblest message of the nineteenth century—(applause). He wished to put it to their friends of the other Churches, who no longer believed in the old orthodox doctrine, whether the time had not come for them to admit that their fathers had been in the wrong in levelling their lightnings and thunders against Unitarians. There were now hundreds and thousands of religious teachers who were repeating the experience of the compiler of a Biblical dictionary which was issued in parts. When he came to the letter D, and had to write about the deluge, he did not know what to say, and he accordingly postponed the matter and simply wrote, "Deluge, see Flood"—(laughter). When he got to the letter F he was still undecided, and he then wrote, "Flood, see Noah"—(laughter). Noah was a long way off, and he thought he should have plenty of time to arrive at a conclusion on the subject. At last the fatal day arrived and the article was written. He besought his brethren to speak out honestly, and tell the world whether they any longer believed in the eternal hell to which their fathers had consigned those who held Unitarian doctrines. One of his boys after eating an egg was fond of turning the shell upside down and offering it to one of his brothers. At first the trick took, but they had got to learn that it was a trick. Their friends, in like manner, had eaten to a considerable extent the contents of their orthodox egg, and now offered them the empty shell turned upside down. Josh Billings had said that there were four classes of men, "Them who knows it is so; them who knows it ain't so; them who split the difference and guess at it; and them who don't care which way it is"—(laughter). There were the same classes in theology. There were those who knew all about it, and could say with certainty where everybody would go when he left this world; others were equally sure that there was no God and no hereafter; others split the difference and made a rough hazy guess at the business; while a great, and, alas, an increasing number did not care how it was. It was now their work to go to such men and show them that life would be sweeter and brighter if they did care about such things, and that they had for them a religion which would answer most of their questions and satisfy their consciences and their hearts. In conclusion, he desired, on behalf of the Association, to shake Dr. Clarke by the hand, and he earnestly prayed that God would bless him in his work—(applause).

In response to a suggestion from the Chairman, the meeting rose and offered, standing, a cordial welcome to Dr. Clarke.

Dr. J. FREEMAN CLARKE, in replying to the sentiment, said that words often failed to express the feelings, and perhaps silence would be the best response to such cordiality as had greeted him. Americans gladly recognised that they were the children of this great country. It was their mother land, and in its peaceful homes they always found a hearty welcome. It had been said that America often followed England. They were glad to do so, in the way that the King followed Madame Blaise—

"The King himself did follow her
When she did go before."

—(laughter). But America in some things had "gone before," and might be followed with advantage by England. That was the case with regard to public education. There was not a child in the country to whom the schools were not open without money and without price; and it was owing to that fact and the fact that the churches were voluntary and self-supporting that the great battle of freedom and union was won by the north. England did not quite follow America in that struggle, and America felt a little sore about it. They did not think that Englishmen would be so easily deceived, even though the American Secretary of State took pains to deceive them by stating that slavery had nothing to do with the matter. But all that was over, and Englishmen were as glad and as thankful as the Americans themselves that that bitter curse and sin came to an end—(applause). England led the way in the Emancipation movement, and America followed; and England, perhaps, would follow America when it refused to allow any man to suffer in his civil rights because of any opinion he might profess. Years ago, when Abner Kneeland the Atheist was punished for the utterance of Atheistical opinions in Massachusetts, William Ellery Channing headed the petition for his pardon and for the abolition of that tyrannical law—(applause). America deeply sympathised with England in its great trial in regard to Ireland. They knew the difficulties in which the country and its noble Prime Minister were placed; they respected the magnanimity he had shown, and had no doubt that by the help of God the country would find its way through its great trouble. If, however, England could not take care of Irishmen it could send them all over to America, where, notwithstanding certain peculiarities, they made excellent citizens. When an Irishman was surrounded by good Americans he turned an American himself in two and a half years—(laughter). America had followed England in regard to Unitarianism, for it was Dr. Priestley who had laid the foundation of their religion in that country. Forty years ago when he (Dr. Clarke) lived in Kentucky he met with a strong, high-minded, and honourable man, who told him that when he was coming of age he was sent by his father to Philadelphia on business, and arriving there on Sunday morning, and seeing a church open he went in and listened to a sermon addressed to young men by a venerable man, with white hair falling upon his shoulders. The preacher told them that everything depended on the way in which they took hold of life, that if they adopted honesty, truth, and generosity as their standard their lives would grow from good to better, from joy to greater joy, and would end in the peace of God which passeth understanding. The young man listened, and resolved that his life should be governed thenceforward by the principles of justice and right, and it was so governed. The old preacher was Dr. Joseph Priestley—(applause). There were some very active and earnest devoted Unitarians at work in the United States. Mr. Jenkin Jones in the West was one of the most enthusiastic and devoted young men in their body. Dr. W. C. Gannett was another labourer who was doing splendid work; and Mr. Ames, in Philadelphia, was bringing all sorts of people into his church who had not been in any church before for years. In Southern Illinois Mr. Dutchie was a missionary to half a dozen churches near the town in which he resided, and was raising up people to assist him as fellow missionaries in the work. If Mr. Hopps went to America he would meet with some of those men. They were always glad to welcome their Unitarian brethren from England, and he had no doubt that Mr. Hopps would meet with a hearty reception. He (Dr. Clarke) was very grateful for the reception that had been accorded to himself, and he felt that in receiving him they were receiving and welcoming the Unitarians of the United States—(applause).

The Rev. P. H. WICKSTEEB, in proposing a hearty welcome to Dr. Hugenholtz, of Amsterdam, said that some years ago German theology was considered the most diabolical thing on the face of the earth until Dr. Colenzo blackened his evil reputation by translating some fragments of Dutch theology, which were found to be even worse than the German productions. So rapidly did time move that now, after an interval of only ten or twelve years, he was ready, without the slightest misgiving, to give as the first reason for their welcoming Dr. Hugenholtz that he was a Dutch preacher and theologian—(applause). He was the representative of the Dutch Protestant Union, a body which had, without any particular strain, accomplished the object so long sought in vain in England—a union of the different churches on a Liberal basis. While retaining their own ecclesiastical ties, they heartily united as members of the Union, and formed a compact, earnest body of workers and thinkers in the religious field. Modern Dutch theologians were, of course, Unitarians, and the idea of their being anything else was simply ludicrous. But Dr. Hugenholtz, apart from his representative character, had a strong claim upon their personal sympathy. He had refused to be bound by a creed or to bind others. His people followed him and built him a church, and they had now 250 boys and girls studying under him as a religious instructor. He was the one man in Holland who had adopted that course—(applause). They would all welcome a man who had stood up so nobly in behalf of freedom from all creeds and from State aid, having the fullest trust and belief that men who really wanted a thing would support it—(applause).

The Rev. P. H. HUGENHOLTZ, in responding, offered the cordial salutations of the Dutch Protestant Union to their brethren in England. They were all fellow soldiers in the same army, and sought to accomplish the same objects. The great English and American writers, Darwin, Carlyle, Robertson, Martineau, Channing, Parker, Emerson and Longfellow were read and admired in Holland. The Association which he represented was fighting for free religious thought and life. It was an Association of all who wished to promote the free development of religious life in the Church, and in every other field, and everyone who sought that object was welcome amongst them, whether he belonged to any Church or not. There were those amongst them who had left the Church as he and his brother had done because they believed that free religious thought could not be developed in it. The body he represented had several Jews amongst its members. It was founded in 1870. In 1872 its members numbered 1,350. It promoted the delivery of lectures on religious subjects, meetings for social and other purposes, Sunday-school services for children, and the like. It had to struggle against a spirit of narrow conventionalism, and of faint-hearted conservatism. Let them all unite in working steadily and courageously for that Kingdom which included Englishmen, Americans, Dutchmen, and all the nations of the world in the kingdom of truth, freedom and love—(applause).

A vote of thanks to the President, on the motion of Mr. T. CHATFIELD CLARKE, seconded by Mr. S. S. TAYLER, was suitably acknowledged, and the proceedings were brought to a close with the singing of the National Anthem.

SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

The forty-eight annual meeting of this Association was held on Friday morning, at the Freemasons' Tavern, E. Lawrence, Esq., LL.B., occupying the chair. The meeting was preceded by a breakfast, to which about two hundred persons sat down, this number being larger than on any previous occasion.

The CHAIRMAN said: It was with very great pleasure that I responded to the invitation of your Committee to be present on this occasion. Your excellent friend Mr. Wade—(applause)—said to me, "Give us a kind word of encouragement." I think your meeting here to-day, and seeing each other's faces at this gathering, is quite as good an encouragement as any words that I can say; but I shall be only too thankful if I can add anything to encourage you in the great work in which you are engaged. Time was when the schoolmaster was the lame man of the parish, the man who knew less than anybody else, who could earn his living by no other employment, but who could always wield the birch rod. A lady once told me that the schoolmistress where she was sent to school in early life was a bed-ridden cripple, who used to call the children to the bedside when she thought it necessary to administer the birch rod—(laughter). Times have changed. It is no longer the cripple in body and mind who is asked to train the young—(hear, hear). The privilege of training the young is now recognised as the highest office that can be filled by any one. When I was looking for some thought for to-day, my mind turned to the illustration which fills all the railway stations, representing the progress of a boy on the one hand through various phases of respectability to a high and honoured old age, and on the other hand along the pathway of vice and misery to a pauper's grave. This is the advertisement of a book on education, which I may say in passing is a very good one, and which I recommend everybody to read. I have placed it at my own expense in several places where boys and men assemble—(applause). And this is what education is meant to do. It is meant to raise the mind upwards, and the moral training of the children, that portion of education which falls to your lot, is especially effective in this respect. Mere secular education may—I do not say it will—only degrade the child. An educated thief like Peace was a far more dangerous burglar than an uneducated man would have been. It falls to your lot to afford to children a moral training. When this Association was established, some forty-eight years ago, the primary object of Sunday-schools had almost to be placed on one side, because the children came to you totally ignorant of even the rudiments of education. In almost all cases the children who came to the schools had to be taught the alphabet, and the first pothooks of writing were frequently made in the Sunday-school. It is only within the last ten or a dozen years that this country has recognised the bounden duty that devolves upon it of taking care that no children born in these islands shall grow up in brutal and savage ignorance. But this fact did not render the work of the Sunday-school less, but rather of greater importance. It had been said, "Let me make the songs of the people, I do not care who makes the laws." With much more truth it might be said, "Let me train the young, the men can take care of themselves"—(applause). The future of the nation depends upon those who are growing up. You are forming the future of the country in training the children who come under your care; they are the future of the country we all hold so dear. Remember, also, that the children born in these small islands will, to a very large extent, emigrate to other lands. When I was at Dukinfield a short time ago I was shown a number of gifts and presents, which had been sent from all parts of the world—including India, Australia, and the Fiji Islands—by old Sunday-school scholars, who wished to testify their gratitude to the schools in which they received the first elements of education—(applause). Is your task, then, a mean one? Do you need encouragement in your task? Do you need any words of mine? Are not these facts stronger than words? This English language of ours, and in that of course I include the American language,—(laughter)—is, I believe, destined to cover the whole world. Before this century is passed it is probable that between 300,000,000 and 500,000,000 of people will understand the English language—(applause). In America alone it is probable that 100,000,000 of people will be congregated together, all speaking English, before the commencement of the twentieth century. You are then teaching and speaking a language which, before your scholars are grown up 500,000,000 of people will understand. And what you give them they will impart to others. Remember that a single child whom you teach may be the means and a centre for spreading noble Christian views among the community in which he dwells—(applause). One child! If each teacher could only make one child purer, nobler for his whole life, your hard teaching and hard work will not have been done in vain. Above all be not discouraged. Teachers again and again stand up and tell you that [the worst boy in the class has come to them in after years and told them that he owed it to them that he held a respectable and responsible position. This perhaps was a boy of whom no hopes were formed, and who had been expelled from school over and over again. Be then of good courage. Give to your children a high moral character. It is no use merely reading pretty stories that lead to nothing. We have been so accustomed to breathing in our homes high and noble teaching that we almost seem to think that it comes to us naturally, and that it never was taught to us at all. But the homes from which these children come have in too many instances no such spring of pure truth and morality to draw from. This they must learn from you; from you they must gain their moral training. It is difficult sometimes for the teachers to recognise this. They have been so accustomed merely to teach the elements of reading and writing that it is difficult for them to realise the altered condition of things. They must realise that he who trains the people rules the people. The authorities of the many sections are bidding against each other as to who shall educate the coming race. Bribes are offered by the various sections and the various bodies to secure the attendance of children at their schools. The great French nation is just awaking to this necessity. They may do it harshly, they may do it cruelly, they may do it by force, but it is felt that it is a bounden duty to take the French children from the corrupt teaching of the Romish priests. Thank God, France means to do it—(hear). But you must give them something else in place of orthodox teaching—(hear, hear). It is not our fault if orthodox teaching is not what it should be; we must give them, in place, not less faith but more faith, more trust, more belief; a firmer belief because fixed on a firmer foundation—(applause). The new Eddystone lighthouse is fixed on the same rock, but on another point, and the foundations go deeper down. It is not the earth that has given way, but only the feeble point of the rock. This is the truth to recognise. The foundations of religion are not gone. God and Christ never possessed so much influence over men's minds as they do to-day. As to the Salvation Army, about which people are speaking, it is not the errors they are teaching but the truths they are teaching that are moving men. It is because they lead men back through many errors to the grand teaching of Nazareth of 1,850 years ago. That is the secret of such power as they possess. And this power we must give to our children. The only book they can get everywhere and at all times is the Bible. You must make them familiar with that book. It is a library in itself. It has been said that the man of one book is a man of power. Whether it be Horace or Livy, if a man knows a book better than anybody else, that book will educate him. Think you that Horace or Livy possessed the power of education and the grand library which has been contributed to the world? No. What is the secret of John Bright's oratory? It is that he knows the Bible almost by heart. I never saw or read a speech of Bright's that was not full to the brim of quotations from the Book of Books. Make your children familiar with this grand book, and help them to seek there for the highest precepts. Take care that you teach them much of that book, and they will go back again and again and read that book as they go along. And remember you must live the life as well as teach the life—(hear). The prayer that most affects me in my reading of the prayers at home is that prayer of Dr. Sadler's, in which we pray that our home may be a living testimony that we are seeking the higher and purer life of God. Let this be your forte. Let your whole character be stronger than your words. If you venture upon the smallest concealment or subterfuge your children will find you out. If you teach what you do not believe your children will find you out. You must be more than honest, more than truthful. You must avoid the smallest suspicion of subterfuge under any circumstances. The grandest thing which, as an Englishman, I am proud of is the reputation which we English people have for truth speaking. My wife sat next to a French lady for some weeks last year; and what do you think this French lady said to her? She said in French, "I love the English ladies; they do not tell lies"—(laughter). I am sorry to say it was very necessary for her to say English ladies. This, then, is our character abroad. We do not always deserve it, but compared with other nations we deserve it in the highest degree—(laughter). It is the privilege of the English people to speak the truth. Let us enforce this grand privilege of the English people of truth speaking and of truth acting. I never permit a servant to say "not at home" when I am at home—(applause). People tell you that it is perfectly well understood. It only means, "Monsieur, n'est pas ici." But it is a lie, and I do not like to ask a servant to tell a lie for my convenience—(applause). You may depend upon it that if the servant tells a lie for your convenience he will for his own—(hear, hear). Let me, then, ask that each one of you endeavour, by your own personal influence, to move every child that you have to learn in school; and remember that in all things there are compensations. Christ said, "The man that seeketh his life shall lose it." Yes, a man who seeketh for pleasure never finds it, but those who strive to bless others must surely bless themselves. You think you are teaching your Sunday-school children, but you are teaching yourself ten times over as much. If, then, you are true followers of Christ such will be your Sunday-school children. They will stand up over your graves with bare heads before God, and bless your name, when perhaps all others may be forgotten. Be this, then, your thought, "May these children, when I am dead, stand up over my grave and bless God that they came under my care"—(applause).

The Rev. ALFRED STEINTHAL moved the adoption of the report and accounts, and observed that he had never heard a report of a more gratifying nature. The work of the Association had been well done during the past twelve months under the present management, and promised an equally satisfactory condition of things in the future. The Association was deserving of greater support than it had received at the present time. With regard to its literature he thought there were few ministers who would not find the Teachers' Notes and some of the other books they received were helps and guides to them in their ministerial work, pointing out directions in which they might usefully employ themselves. He congratulated the Association on the increased demand for religious literature of an educational character.

Mr. JOSEPH LUPTON (Leeds) seconded the resolution. With reference to older scholars he urged that they should not be lost sight of.

The report was adopted, and the officers and committee were re-appointed.

REPORT.

The Committee state that a steadily increasing interest continues to be taken in the efforts of the Society to provide suitable books for the schools and to promote generally the work of Sunday-school education. The subscriptions to its objects are increasing, its publications are obtaining a wider circulation, and the balance in hand has been slightly improved. Seven new books have been issued during the year, all of which have met with ready acceptance by the schools. The first volume of "Bible for Young People" has been reprinted, and the work is now offered in a complete form. Mr. Bartram has supplemented his "Stories from Genesis" by "Stories from the Life of Moses," "Short Sermons for the Young" by Three Cousins (the Misses Martineau), which promises to be one of the most popular books ever published by the Association; "Sacred Similes," the late Travers Madge's "Prayers," printed in large type; Mr. H. Shaen Solly's "Twenty Lessons on the Life of Jesus," are among the books published during the year. Ten thousand copies of the Sunday School Hymn Book have been struck off, and another 10,000 are required at an early date. The Committee hope to publish, with the aid of the Manchester District Sunday School Association, a collection of tunes suitable to the new hymn book, and especially for the number of peculiar metres. The smaller hymn-book has also met with a rapid sale, and another 10,000 will probably soon have to be reprinted. The "Young Days" monthly magazine has held its steady course during the year, and, it is hoped, has found a place among the permanent publications of the Association. By the generous aid of a lady friend a donation of £30 has been placed in the hands of the Committee to improve the pictorial illustrations. Teachers' Notes still continues to be successfully conducted, and especial thanks are due to the Rev. F. E. Millson for his services as editorial secretary. Reference was next made to a friendly interchange of communication with Pastor A. Bertrand, of Nîmes, respecting Sunday-school work and publications. Friendly relations had also been entered into with the Boston Sunday School Association, resulting in an interchange of publications. As the result of a circular to ministers and superintendents a considerable number of orders for books, together with some new and increased subscriptions, have been received. The returns from 207 schools show that the total number of scholars on the books at the commencement of the present year was 29,611, being an increase of 3,775 on the previous year, and that the average morning attendance was 11,766, being an increase of 338, and the afternoon attendance 18,394, being an increase of 1,172. The total number of teachers is 3,466, being an increase of 11. The number of elder scholars was 5,081, showing a decrease of 167. There are ten schools in Ireland not included in this summary, which have 822 on the books, being an increase of 50; morning attendance 331, being a decrease of 68; afternoon attendance 236, an increase of 34. The number of teachers 94, against 85 of last year, and the elder scholars 138, against 122. Grants of books in aid of new and poor schools have been given in eight cases. The number of candidates for written examinations in the Manchester and North Midland Districts is not equal to that of last year, but there is reason to believe that the number in both districts will be considerably increased during the current year. At the annual meeting of the Northern Association (Ireland) Mr. Frederick Allen again represented the Association and received a most cordial welcome. The Secretary represented the Society at the Manchester District Meeting, and did a brisk trade in the publications before named. The report expressed regret that there is at present no sufficiently organised machinery by which the publications of the Association can be fairly placed before the schools and teachers, and suggested that every school should appoint one of its teachers, to whom a copy of every new work might be sent, and who would bring it prominently before the notice of the other teachers. The President and Secretary attended the Liverpool Conference, and at the present meeting representatives would be received from the Manchester District, and North Midland, the Midland Christian Union, the West Riding, the Western, and the Northern (Ireland) Associations. Improvements from time to time are constantly taking place in the building accommodation of many of the schools; and the future of Sunday-school education largely depends on having rooms which shall not form an unfavourable contrast with the handsome buildings of the Board Schools. The report concluded with referring to the question of providing a building for the society all its own in which its growing business might be carried on and meetings of an educational and religious kind might be held. No very definite statement could at present be made, but an earnest hope was expressed that the committee in any efforts that might be made would be favoured with the advice and cordial help of Mr. Edwin Lawrence, by whose co-operation, and that of other friends of Sunday-schools, they might hope to secure by the time of the jubilee of the Association in 1885 a building which would not only give the needed accommodation, but would be a lasting memorial of the cause, and a centre of all the moral and religious interests that ought to gather round this institution.

The following resolution was moved by the Rev. T. W. FRECKELTON, seconded by Mr. COLFOX (Bridport), and carried unanimously:—

"That this meeting desires to give the most cordial welcome to David Ainsworth, Esq., M.P., the President; S. S. Tayler, Esq., Treasurer; and the Rev. Henry Ierson, M.A., Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, as the representatives of that Association at this meeting; to Mr. John Reynolds, President; and the Rev. P. M. Higginson, M.A., Honorary Secretary of the Manchester District Association; to Mr. H. G. Marriott, of the North Midland Association; to Mr. Henry Payton, and Mr. W. J. Tranter, of the Midland Christian Union; to the Rev. F. E. Millson, of the West Riding Association; to the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., President, and the Rev. John Birks, Honorary Secretary of the Western Sunday School Association; to the Rev. Alfred Payne, of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Union; to Mr. Robert McCalmont, of the Northern Association (Ireland); to the Rev. Alex. Gordon, M.A., of the Ulster Unitarian Christian Association; and to all other representatives of Sunday-school associations who may be now present from any part of the world."

The Rev. F. E. MILLSON of Halifax read a paper on "Changed Methods to Suit Changed Conditions of Sunday School Work," which we have printed on another page.

The Rev. Dr. DRUMMOND moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Millson for his richly-suggestive paper. As representing the Theological College, he wished to say that in that Institution they did not forget the cultivation of that practical theology of which Sunday-school work formed so large and important a portion. The Church and College might be taken to symbolise those twin forces to which Mr. Millson had alluded. The author of the paper had not, however, forgotten that prior to all methods must come the religious influence itself, which alone could give power to the methods adopted and make them truly successful. In order that this high influence should have full power it must be accompanied by thoughtful teaching to give solidity and influence to religious enthusiasm, and unless it were broad in its measures, and distinct in its aims, and proceeded by wise and carefully measured steps, much good would be lost, for the mere amiability which had nothing to contribute to the life of the scholar, except a little passing and effervescent kindness, was not capable of doing high work. For this reason they were more particularly indebted to Mr. Millson for his practical suggestions—(applause). Sunday-school had, he thought, been up to the present far too much dissociated from the life of their churches. The link between the two must be strengthened and the recommendation that the church should look with a loving eye upon the school, and should provide some practical means of recognising the elder scholars was a suggestion of the greatest possible importance. It was indeed sad, that after scholars had passed through the schools they should be entirely lost sight of, and that the bonds of friendship and religious fellowship should be snapped—(hear, hear).

Dr. FREEMAN CLARKE (Boston) seconded the proposition, and urged that there was no possible opposition between the secular instruction of the day-schools and the religious instruction of the Sunday-school, his experience being that the better children were taught in secular schools the more interested they were likely to be in their religious studies. This point he wished to emphasise as strongly as he possibly could. He admitted that education gave to a bad man a power to use his intellect much more effectually than if he were uneducated; but statistics in the United States and elsewhere proved conclusively that just in proportion as men were educated they ceased to be criminal—(hear, hear).

Miss GOUGH addressed a few words to the meeting, advocating the formation of bands of mercy in connection with the Sunday-schools.

Dr. HUGENHOLTZ (Amsterdam), while sympathising with the desire for international communication, expressed a hope that each nation would keep its own language, which was the spontaneous expression of its individuality and one of the dearest treasures it had. Holland was, when judged by its size, perhaps an insignificant country; but when judged by the standard of its historical associations and its political and social relations with the rest of the world, he ventured to hope it might hold a more conspicuous position; and he would therefore request the secretary to send the communications issued from this Association to the kindred Association which he represented. He expressed sympathy with the recommendations introduced in the paper.

Mr. Wade said that Holland was already included in the list of countries to which communications were sent.

After a few words from Professor CARPENTER, the resolution was put, and carried.

Mr. MILLSON, in acknowledging the compliment, said he thought there was a certain use in bringing forward fresh suggestions, however visionary and dreamlike they might seem. In their practical attainments they never rose very high; but if they did not dream a little they would not rise even so high as they did. He hoped the notion which was represented by the word guild would not be allowed to drop out of thought. In this respect there was a good deal to be learned from the High Church members of the Church of England. At the Ritualistic Church of All Saints services went on day after day, hour after hour; and not only that, but the truth was being carried to the doors of the poor and the helpless of the community, by workers whose strength and influence came from the religion which was preached and believed there. It was only by practical work, humbly undertaken, and by great and frequent failures and never being wearied with practical effort, that true religion was arrived at.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman brought the proceedings to a close.

THE MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

The forty-eighth annual meeting of the Ministry to the Poor was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Tuesday evening. There were present the Rev. S. A. Steintal (secretary), Mr. R. D. Darbishire (treasurer), Revs. Jas. Harrop, Benjamin Walker (missionaries), and C. T. Poynting; Messrs. H. J. Leppoc, G. W. R. Wood, C. J. Herford, and W. H. Herford, B.A. Mr. LEPPOC, in the unavoidable absence of Mr. R. Nicholson, occupied the chair. The two missionaries, the Rev. J. HARROP and Mr. B. WALKER, read their reports, which were full of interesting details. The Rev. S. A. STEINTAL read the committee's report, which spoke with undiminished confidence of the faithful and earnest spirit in which Mr. Harrop and Mr. Walker had laboured during the year, and again recorded their respect for and sympathy with them in their important and often discouraging endeavours to carry the gospel to the poor. The attention of the officers had been to a great extent directed during the past twelve months to the financial condition of the society. The efforts reported last year by which the interest of the neighbouring congregations was tried to be aroused in behalf of the Mission resulted in collections being made at Altrincham, Blackley, and Monton, in addition to those usually made at Upper Brook-street, Platt, and Cross-street. In accordance with the resolution adopted at the last annual meeting and confirmed at a special meeting of the subscribers, called in accordance with the requirements of the Trust, the sale of the Rochdale-road premises to the St. Michael's Ward Liberal Club was renewed and at length completed, and after deducting the expenses necessarily incurred, a balance was left in the treasurer's hands of £1,560 6s. 1d. This sum falls short of the cost of the new mission premises and minister's house, in Willert-street, Collyhurst, by £497 9s. The sale of the Embden-street premises to the School Board, authorised at the last annual meeting but one, and subsequently confirmed by a special meeting of the subscribers, has also been completed during the past year, and the purchase money, £5,336, paid, which, after paying the necessary charges, including the postage, left a balance in treasurer's hands of £3,812 1s. 6d. In order to replace the buildings thus sold, a plot of land was purchased in Chapman-street, Hulme; but before the committee had determined how best to utilise this purchase, an opportunity offered itself of re-letting the land at a price which realised the sum of £954 7s. 3d., a profit to the society. At the same time they were fortunate enough to secure for the use of the society very convenient rooms in the St. George's-hall, Riall-street, out of Medlock-street, very near to their old premises in Embden-street, at a yearly rent of £45. In order to make these rooms suitable for their purposes, several alterations were needful, the cost of which amounted to £275 6s. 7d. The ordinary expenditure of the society, as against its income in 1880, showed a balance due to the treasurer of £138 7s. 6d. In 1881, chiefly in consequence of a falling off in the donations (due no doubt to the heavy calls made to reduce the debt of 1880), the deficit was increased by £291 10s. 8d., making a total overdraft of £429 18s. 2d. This sum the committee has paid out of the capital of the society. The result of all these arrangements is that the society, after the sale of both mission stations, and the erection of the new buildings in Willert-street had, at the end of the year 1881, a capital sum of £3,563 16s. Of this sum they have invested £3,500 to produce £107 10s. per annum. The committee feel assured that the members of the society, bearing in mind that they have enjoyed ten years' faithful service at the hands of their ministers since the last increase, will approve of the recognition of the self-sacrificing work which the committee has made by raising the ministers' salaries to £200 per annum.

Mr. R. D. DARBISHIRE then read his financial statement, the substance of which will be found in the report of the committee, and expressed the opinion that it was the worst report he had ever read, as in the matter of income they had been compelled to pay revenue deficiencies out of capital.

The CHAIRMAN briefly moved the adoption of the reports and approval of the way in which the committee had dealt with the capital of the Mission.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL seconded the motion, and remarked that he did not share the feeling of despondency expressed by Mr. Darbishire. That they were going through a severe trial there was no doubt. Of the Christian character of the work of the Mission his feeling was as strong as ever, and it was needful that they should all retain their faith in it.

The CHAIRMAN next moved a vote of thanks to the missionaries for their past exertions, and of sympathy with them in their labours, testifying to their value from his thirty years' experience as a guardian of the poor.

The Rev. C. T. POYNTING seconded the motion, and characterised domestic mission work as the most Christ-like he knew.

The motion having been carried, the Revs. J. HARROP and B. WALKER each responded in a few earnest words.

On the motion of Mr. C. J. HERFORD, seconded by Mr. JOHN CHADWICK, the officers for the ensuing year were appointed.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL having taken the chair, on the motion of Mr. G. W. RAYNER WOOD, seconded by Mr. H. W. HERFORD, a cordial vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Leppoc for presiding, who briefly returned thanks, and the meeting terminated.

THE GENERAL BAPTIST ASSEMBLY.—The Business Meeting was held on Tuesday at the new Church at Bethnal-green. The chair was taken by Mr. H. Green, and the Rev. R. Blackburn and Mr. A. J. Marchant were chosen Moderators. The roll of the Assembly was called, and some of the letters from the churches were read. These were of the usual tenor, a few recording success, others speaking hopefully of their prospects, and some lamenting a decline. The Committee's report dealt chiefly with the finances of the Assembly: the expenditure of the year had exceeded the income, and £20 of stock had been sold to meet the increased demands. The Rev. J. Howard's circular letter to the Churches was read. The writer stated that his object was to offer a few bracing and strengthening words to the assembly. There was no doubt weakness in the Churches, but he did not wish to sit in judgment upon them; he would exhort them to examine themselves and to strive to keep closer to Christ. The law of Christ's kingdom was progress. Progress was being made in other things as well as in theology; but Christianity need not tremble for the result. The General Baptists had done a great work in the past; now their principles had become the common possession of other bodies. "Why, then," it was asked, "do you exist?" It might be difficult to answer that; but he exhorted his brethren to devote themselves earnestly to the practical and devotional duties of religion, in full faith that even their few loaves and fishes would suffice to feed the multitudes. The Officers and Committee were reappointed. The Rev. J. Ellis was chosen Messenger, in the room of the late Rev. J. Marten. It was arranged that the Rev. Dawson Burns, of the General Baptist New Connexion be appointed preacher to the next Assembly, and that an Autumnal Meeting of the Assembly be held at Dover. Among the resolutions passed was one of sympathy with the relatives of the late Lord F. Cavendish, and of hope that the Government would persevere in its measures of conciliation and redress of grievances in Ireland; one to support the action of Mr. Pease in his forthcoming motion for the abolition of the opium traffic with China; one expressing satisfaction at the efforts that were being made to bring about the closing of Public Houses on Sunday; and one urging the Churches to encourage the promotion of total abstinence. Two important notices of motions to be made at the next Assembly were handed in by one of the representatives of the Bethnal-green-road Church, — one to alter the number of representatives allowed to each church, the other to alter the rule as to the power of voting. In the evening a Conference was held, at which the Rev. C. A. Hoddinott read a paper on "How to induce young people to join the Christian Church?" A lively and interesting discussion took place, but no new suggestions were offered on the subject. The following were among the speakers:—the Revs. R. Spears, H. Solly, J. Sutcliffe, and Alex. Gordon, and Messrs. Smith, Offen, and Chapman.

Reviews.

Christ our Ideal. An Argument from Analogy. By the Author of "The Gospel for the Nineteenth Century." London: Longmans, Green and Co. 1882.

This book consists of two very distinct parts. The first is a series of sermons (eighteen in number) marked by very pure and earnest religious feeling, but not by much depth of thought. The second and much smaller part of the volume is a more intellectual effort, it is an endeavour of the reason to trace the analogy of what the author calls the "New Creation," to the method and order of the old creation, according to evolution. The author thinks that the sermons throw light on the philosophical argument which succeeds them, and hence the reason, we suppose, of his binding up the two in one volume. For our own parts we do not perceive any close logical connection. Both parts of the volume are valuable; but one section might have been published without the other: they do not dovetail or coalesce, and to our perception there is no necessary link between them. Evolution, in its spiritual lines, as we regard it, is not to be conceived under the figure of a straight continuous chain of causation, of which Christianity, and Christianity only, is the chief link, but rather under the figure of a complicated web spun out on all sides from a living centre of perfection and embracing in its widening circles an immense variety of agencies, ideas and spiritual elements taken from every religion and every philosophy of every age and every people on the globe. Christianity is indeed a very important factor in the history of human progress, but it is not by any means the only one.

The sermons in this volume are short and simple, marked by a deep earnestness, a sweet sincerity, a wide embracing sympathy, a tender generous charity, and the morality they inculcate is pure and practical. They are not argumentative or controversial, and so little does dogma intrude into them that one is at a loss to know, if it were important to know, whether the writer belongs to the Established Church or to the Dissenting portion of the religious world. It is evident that he is intensely Christian, not only in spirit (which is well), but in undue stress on the personality of Christ, which is not quite so well, since it admits of exaggeration. When religious men ascribe perfection to any being inhabiting human form and therefore under human limitations, is there not exaggeration? Are they not asserting the impossible? Are they not putting a part for the whole? Are they not describing a mere stage of the soul's progress by a term which is only appropriate to its finish and completion? The word "perfect" is applied to Christ in almost every page of these sermons, as if every conceivable variety of excellence reached its culminating point in him. We honour and reverence the man of Nazareth. We are deeply thankful that he illustrated in the concrete form of life, habit and character, that beauty of holiness which most of us only talk about or make the subject of dreamy contemplation. We are thankful for his high thoughts, his sweet feelings, his broad sympathies, his beautiful precepts, his beneficent activities, his gentleness in suffering. He has been a great help to struggling souls less richly endowed and occupying lower levels of spiritual life. It has been a great comfort to us to have been spoken to so kindly, so encouragingly, so cheerily, by one who was our brother. But when men ascribe to him Perfection; when they translate him to the Godhead; when they speak of him emphatically as the Son, and not simply a Son of the Heavenly Father, we confess that we cannot concur. Of Jesus we have only a scanty record. Spiritually-enchained imaginations have been active in filling up with the detail of conjecture the vacant places of authentic history. The beauty of the excellences that are recorded and known do indeed suggest other consistent and harmonising excellences that have been left unrecorded; but even with the addition of these, where is Perfection? He himself did not claim it. "Why callest thou me perfect?" How could a life which closed its earthly course very soon after its thirtieth year have possibly reached perfection? A thousand years are said to be as one day in the economy of God, but it does not follow that one day has ever done the work of a thousand years, except on the assumption that sudden miracle has been substituted for the gradual operation of law. For that assumption we know no sufficient grounds. What is Perfection? Is it not to acquire and know all that is contained in the boundless realms of knowledge? to feel all that is sacred and sweet in the realms of feeling? to become interpenetrated and suffused with all the beauty that glows in the heaven of beauty? to have affections that ever throb and thrill in response to every pulsation of the great heart of love? to be able to overcome every conceivable difficulty, to discharge every conceivable duty, and to enjoy every conceivable joy? Is perfection anything short of this? and does it not require a removal from this "muddy vesture of decay" and a progress carried on through countless ages of future life? Good men may help and influence bad men; wise men may help ignorant men; minds of heavenly tone may benefit minds that are vulgar, earthy and low, and in that way Jesus of Nazareth has rendered priceless service to the world as a great improver of humanity. He, together with other noble spirits, has taught us how to diminish the number and degree of our imperfections—to reduce them one by one or little by little. But as for such phrases as "Sun of Righteousness," "Redeemer," "The Son of God," "Perfect Man and Perfect God," "Lord and Saviour," "Rock of Salvation," &c., applied to the simple, humble, natural teacher of Galilee, we like them not, inasmuch as they express or imply a great deal more than we can believe. We doubt not, however, that there are many intelligent, earnest, holy minds to whom the view of the person, position and functions of Christ brings both consolation and power.

As for the analogy of development in spiritual life to development in physical life, which forms the subject of the latter part of this volume, it is clear that whatever may be the mental attitude of Evolutionists in general, Darwin himself is no Atheist; for he admits that at the beginning at least of all these natural forces and activities there must have been one or more acts of creative power—an impulse which set a-going the processes of causation. Evolutionists in general seem to think that this primary impulse, if given at all, must have been sufficient for all time, and that all things would henceforth work spontaneously, with no need of supervision from the originator. For our own part we differ from this view. We think that creation requires and receives the constant superintendence of its Creator; and that He, without changing or suspending any of His natural laws and principles, as originally designed, is constantly present to sustain them and to keep the Divine life and purpose moving within them. At page 206 of this volume our author, with some acuteness, points out a distinction between variation and variability, the latter word meaning not variety itself, but the capacity to produce it. The power to set a certain line of natural causes in motion must have preceded the motion itself of those causes; and this leads us back to the recognition of some High creative Life different from that spontaneity which, superficially looked at, seems to be inherent in natural phenomena.

The development of man's intellectual and moral powers arising out of the discipline of Life is fairly shown by the writer as an analogue to the development of the higher forms of physical life from struggles with the lower, according to the Evolution theory; but when he comes to Religion as one of the processes by which the soul of humanity has been developed and uplifted, he places the advent of Christ as the culminating point in which all previous lines of progress converge. Here, we think, our author overstrains his argument. We gratefully accord to Christianity a very high place in working out the spiritual evolution of man, but we regard it as only one of many agencies, not the first in order of time by many ages, and probably not destined to be the last. Christianity, though a very beautiful and beneficent thing, is not, we venture to think, so complete and comprehensive, so fitted to cover all the ground of modern life and experience, as to be considered all-sufficient and final. We think there is room for some further moral discovery, some development, which, without superseding anything which is really excellent in our present Christianity, will improve upon it in a few particulars. Our author, in the argumentative section of his book, uses very copiously Biblical phrases, borrowed chiefly from the writings of Paul. The authority is high unquestionably; but the writings of Paul, though they may lend energy and earnestness to the statement of a doctrine, do not always clearly elucidate it. The writer of this book would have done better, we think, to explain his own meaning in his own words.

Notwithstanding our inability to concur in some particulars with the author of this volume, we are bound in duty to acknowledge the beautiful spirit in which it is written. Vigour and originality are not always conspicuous in the writer's thoughts, but charity and sweetness are ever present in his feelings.

E. A.

Short Notices.

Recollections of Twenty Sunday Afternoon Addresses. By John Page Hopps. London: Williams and Norgate. 1882.

We have such a high opinion of these Addresses that we feel bound to begin our notice of them by a little fault finding. "Twenty Addresses," we can fancy a stranger saying, as he picks up the little book from a bookseller's counter, "to whom were they given, and when and where?" He turns to the preface for information as he finds none on the title page, and he gets no help. He finds it simply stated that "These Recollections are precisely what they profess to be—simply recollections. The Addresses were spoken extemporaneously with the help of a few lines of notes; the audience and the inspiration of the hour supplied the rest." He can discover no date throughout the book. He finds it further stated that the writer is "afraid that those who took no part in the meetings will hardly get a glimpse of what they really were, by means of this attempt to outline what was said in Addresses which, after all, did not occupy the chief place in what was done and enjoyed. The meetings were not meetings for the giving and hearing of sermons or lectures, but meetings for worship, and for such enjoyment as music, and poetry, and fellowship, and sympathy could give." Well, perhaps not, but nevertheless the Addresses were given, and stirred many a mind into better thoughts, and kindled many a heart into nobler feeling than their wont; and after all the intellect has its service to offer as well as the emotions, and we have no doubt some at least of those present would have deemed the meetings incomplete without the Addresses. However, our supposed stranger would be fairly puzzled, and perhaps have his interest exhausted by the process of fruitless research. If he had known what our readers know, that they were given in the Temperance Hall, Leicester, in the winters of 1881 and 1882, to audiences of fourteen and sixteen hundred people who were not accustomed to attend any place of worship, and if they had had the exact date of their delivery at the head of each of them, how eagerly he would have gone through, and been delighted and inspired by their contents. At least the occasion and the circumstances of lectures, addresses, and sermons always enhance their interest to our own mind, and help us to realise the meaning of allusions, and the full body of the utterance, more vividly than we otherwise should be able to do. We expect that there will be at least one more edition of this work called for, when we hope to see this deficiency remedied. Mr. Hopps's own mind was so full of the actual facts that no doubt for the time he forgot there might be thousands of people not belonging to "our denomination" who might be ignorant of them, and who might be willing to receive hints even from a heretic as to the organisation and mode of carrying such a noble mission to the unchurched. For the addresses themselves we have nothing but praise; they are full of movement, and they are brisk and bright as a fair spring morning, with a bracing breeze. They are just the kind of addresses suited to both the occasion and people for whom they were intended—with here the choicest bit of poetry, there a lively anecdote, and in another place a solemn appeal to heart and conscience and to a lofty standard of life. If our readers wish to have their minds freshened, stirred into movement by rich suggestions, and sparkling, lively religious thought of the best Christian type, let them by all means, as soon as possible, procure a copy.

The Magazines.

Fraser's Magazine continues the powerfully-written story entitled "The Lady Maud," a striking tale of yachting adventure. Principal Shairp gives a very interesting and historically valuable account of "The Earliest Scottish University," viz., St. Andrews, whose local position and ancient associations so greatly charmed Dean Stanley. "The Case of the Special Hospitals" is an inquiry by the well-known surgeon, Mr. R. Burford Rawlings, into an important branch of charitable work, and a review of grave charges that have been made against these institutions. Under the heading "Primitive Belief and Savage Metaphysics," Mr. A. Lang reviews Mr. C. F. Keary's recent work "Outlines of Human Belief among the Indo-European Races," and contravenes some of its theories. The three remaining articles are "National Necessities as the Basis of National Education," the lecture delivered before the Society of Arts by Dr. B. W. Richardson, of the London School Board, advocating his well-known views on physical and mental training; "The Hangman's Rope," a curious story of North Devon superstition; and "Whigs and Liberals," in which Mr. Ernest Myers attempts to show that their own traditions remind the Whigs that their place must be in the Liberal ranks, even if the march lead them now and then over somewhat unfamiliar ground. It seems to us more probable that the majority will ultimately lapse into the Tory ranks, a process which is now going on in unexpected quarters.

Cassell's Family Magazine continues the two serial stories, "No Proof" and "Was it Wise to Change?" The interesting sketch of "The Life of the Noncommissioned Officer," by "One Who Has Served in the Ranks," is also continued; and there is a second paper on the useful series "How Shall I Invest My Savings?" Among other articles of a bright and practical character are—"How to Make Men Fond of Home," "Fruit Culture in North Notts," "America as a Health Resort," by a family doctor; "Making Bread at Home," by an American correspondent; and "The Art of Water-colour Landscape Painting."

The Magazine of Art has a charming frontispiece in the engraving of "The Widower," by Luke Fildes, A.R.A. Charlotte Weeks gives an account of "The Pictures at Aston Rowatt," with several engravings; and Basil Champneys has a very instructive paper on "Wren and St. Paul's," with five illustrations of plans and designs for the Cathedral. "Professor Legros," the Slade Professor of Fine Arts at University College, London, is the subject of biographical sketch by Cosmo Monkhouse, with fine portrait and engravings of his principal works, including the bust of Charles Darwin in the present exhibition of the Royal Academy. Among other articles are "Fitness and Fashions" with illustrations of artistic costume. "The Drawings of Albert Dürer," by Professor Sidney Colvin, with illustrations of the great mediæval artist's principal works; and "The Exhibitions, the Academy, and the Grosvenor Gallery."

THE LONDON MINISTERS' CONFERENCE.—Last night about seventy more ministers met in social communion at Dr. Williams's Library. A most interesting and valuable address, full of wisdom and wit, was delivered by the Rev. Dr. Freeman Clarke on "The Method of a Church's Work." The address, which made a deep impression, was followed by an animated discussion. These Conferences are partially private, but it is interesting to mention that ministers of at least five different Churches, both English and foreign, were present.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—All our Faculties.—Almost all disorders of the human body are distinctly to be traced to some impurity of the blood. The purification of that fluid is the first step towards health. Holloway's Pills recommend themselves to the attention of all such sufferers. They search out and remove all impurities from the vital fluid. In indigestion, confirmed dyspepsia, and chronic constipation, the most beneficial effects have been, and always must be, obtained from the wholesome power exerted by these purifying Pills over the digestion. Persons whose lives have been restored to ease, strength, and perfect health by Holloway's Pills, after fruitless trial of the whole pharmacopœia of physic, attest this fact. This is beyond dispute.

HORSHAM.—On Sunday last two special services were held at the Free Christian Church, to celebrate the hundred and ninth Whit-Sunday anniversary, and the completion of the repairs and additions which were commenced some ten months ago. The preacher for the day was the Rev. E. M. Geldart, M.A., whose eloquent and powerful sermons will long be remembered by those who were privileged to hear them. The weather being favourable there was a good gathering of friends from the surrounding towns and villages, and a very striking and solemn sight it was to see them form into little groups and go from spot to spot in the large and ancient burial ground to examine the stones erected to the memory of many a revered ancestor. The service was in perfect harmony with the occasion and the hallowed associations of the day, and gave great satisfaction. The Lord's Supper Service was then held, and was well attended. About sixty persons partook of lunch, which had been provided in the school-room, and at five o'clock about one hundred and forty sat down to tea. Both school and church were beautifully decorated with choice flowers. The evening congregation was nearly equal to that of the morning, and the sermon was again excellently adapted to the time and occasion. Several circumstances connected with the day's proceedings call for a word of notice. The new school-room and the general repairs of the church, which have cost some £200, may now be said to be complete. The finishing stroke was put on last week, when the young men volunteered to paint the gallery and carpet the stairs,—which they did after their own long day's labour—and the ladies covered the communion table, and hung the organ seat and pulpit platform with beautiful crimson cloth, and one lady gave a handsome eight-day clock to the schoolroom. All this, however, was little, compared to the enlargement and improvement of the organ, in which all felt interested and determined upon, notwithstanding the heavy demands previously made upon them. With the help of a few friends £80 was raised, which with the collections on Sunday will defray the cost within about £5. The instrument now more than repays the outlay. Thus, not only is the church with its adjuncts once more put into good condition, but the congregation also, with its connected institutions, may be said to be in a healthy state, quietly, but it is to be hoped effectually, working for the promotion of a free and spiritual religion. Mr. S. Baxter, a member of the Congregational Church, most kindly gave his services as organist throughout the day.

EVESHAM.—At the monthly meeting of the Protestant Dissenting ministers of Warwickshire and the neighbouring counties, held at Evesham a short time since, the Rev. H. W. Crosskey, LL.D., in the chair, it was moved by the Rev. Rees Lloyd, of Belper, seconded by the Rev. D. Maginnis, of Stourbridge, and resolved:—"That this meeting expresses its deepest sympathy with the members of the families of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke, who have been so cruelly and wickedly plunged into grief by the hands of assassins, and also with Mr. Gladstone, who has lost a valued colleague as well as a relative and friend. And this meeting trusts that the Government of this country will take all necessary measures for the suppression of crime, and that rising above any feeling of panic the Government will strenuously promote such reforms as will remove every just cause of offence that may exist in Ireland, and every source of misery that comes within the scope of wise legislation, and establish the prosperity of that country on a permanent foundation."

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE.—On Wednesday evening the Professors of this College gave a conversazione at the Institute in Gower-street, which was attended by a numerous and fashionable company. The visitors were received by Mr. G. Carey Foster, Mr. G. Croom Robertson, and Mr. Frederick T. Roberts, the Deans of the Faculties, on the Flaxman staircase, and thence passed on to the various rooms to inspect the many interesting exhibitions which had been provided for their entertainment. These included scriptures and drawings by Flaxman, antique silver cups, and other works of art, scientific apparatus and microscopes. The latter attracted much attention. On the portico outside the band of the Scots Guards played a selection of music during the evening, and a programme of vocal and instrumental music was performed in the Botanical theatre. Refreshments were served to the visitors in the Museum throughout the evening.

THE LIBERAL SOCIAL UNION held its monthly meeting on Thursday evening, the 25th ult., at the rooms of the Society of British Artists, Suffolk-street, Pall Mall. The chair was occupied by Mr. Thomas Reed, and a paper was read by E. Eiloart, Esq., Barrister-at-Law, on "A Science of Politics," which was followed by a discussion.

PROFESSOR LANKESTER has been re-appointed Professor of Zoology and Comparative Anatomy at University College, London. Mr. Frederick Pollock and Mr. T. P. Taswell-Langmead have been appointed respectively Professors of Jurisprudence and of Constitutional Law and History. Applications are invited for a chair of Civil Engineering and Surveying.

The commission appointed in Germany to revise Luther's translation of the Bible has brought its labours to a close.

The Huguenot congregation, worshipping in the crypt of Canterbury Cathedral, held a special service on Sunday in commemoration of the Reformation.

Our Calendar.

SUNDAY, JUNE 4.

LONDON.

Rev. Dr. J. FREEMAN CLARKE, at Little Portland-street Chapel, 11.15 A.M. Subject: "Emphasis in Life and Religion." At 7 P.M., the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS, on "The Sword of Jesus."

Rev. CHAS. VOYSEY, at Langham-hall, 43, Great Portland-street, 11.15 A.M.

 Notices of Sunday Services are inserted in this Calendar at 6d. a line, and of other Meetings and Services gratis, provided a detailed Advertisement appears.

SELECTED BOOKS.

Abel's (C.) Linguistic Essays, 9/
Dobson's (A.) Eighteenth Century Essays, 6/
Fraser's (D.) Speeches of the Holy Apostles, 3/6
Hugo (V.): Torquemada, 6fr.
Jenkin's (E.) A Paladin of Finance, Contemporary Manners, 7/6
Kant (Immanuel), Life of, by J. H. W. Stuckenberg, 14/
Lowe's (W. H.) Commentary on Zechariah, Hebrew and LXX, &c., 10/6
Mohammad the Prophet, Speeches and Table Talk of,
by S. L. Poole, 4/6
Paget's (F.) The Redemption of Work, 2/
Sommer (H.): Der Pessimismus, 3m. 50.
Weiss (B.): Das Leben Jesu, Vol. 1, 8m. 60.

MR. WALTER MAWER, Sunday School Association Office, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C., will supply any of the above-named new books and new editions, at the prices named, carriage free, on receipt of Post-office Order, payable at the East Strand Post-office.

DEATHS.

GABRIEL—On the 25th ult., at Liverpool, Edward M. Gabriel, Esq., aged 49.
MACE—On the 28th ult., Whit Sunday, at Tenterden John Ellis Mace, J.P., in the 88th year of his age.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ASSURANCE AGAINST ACCIDENTS OF ALL KINDS.
ASSURANCE AGAINST RAILWAY ACCIDENTS ALONE.
ASSURANCE AGAINST FATAL ACCIDENTS AT SEA.
ASSURANCE OF EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

Railway Passengers' Assurance Company,
THE OLDEST AND LARGEST COMPANY, INSURING
AGAINST ACCIDENTS OF ALL KINDS.

The Right Hon. LORD KINNAIRD, Chairman.

Subscribed Capital, £1,000,000.

PAID-UP CAPITAL AND RESERVE, £240,000.

MODERATE PREMIUMS

Bonus allowed to Insurers after five years,

£1,700,000

HAS BEEN PAID AS COMPENSATION.

Apply to the Clerks at the Railway Stations, the Local Agents, or

64, CORNHILL,

or 8, GRAND HOTEL BUILDINGS, CHARING-CROSS, LONDON.

WILLIAM J. VIAN, Secretary.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

COLLYER'S SERMONS again reduced in price, for giving away to friends and inquirers, &c., &c.

SERMONS, by ROBERT COLLYER, "Nature and Life," and "The Life that Now Is," in One Volume. Price 2s. post free, if prepaid; or for Twelve Copies and upwards, 1s. 6d. each, carriage free.

TEXTS AND MARGINS of the REVISED NEW TESTAMENT. By Dr. G. VANCE SMITH, 1s.

POSITIVE ASPECTS of UNITARIAN THOUGHT AND DOCTRINE. Cheap Edition, 1s.

Address, Miss PHILPOT, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London.

THE MORAL REFORM UNION, Established in the Interests of Pure Family Life. Motto:—"Thou shalt love thy Neighbour as thyself."—MATT. xix. 19. The First Annual Report, embodying the Prospectus and Priced List of Literature sanctioned for sale, can now be had, by post, price 3½d.—Office, 1, Leinster-place, London, W.

HIGH SCHOOL, STOKE GREEN, NEAR COVENTRY, established (1865) by the Rev. G. HEAVISIDE, B.A., of University and Manchester New Colleges, London, promotes a Liberal Education at a moderate cost.

MOUNT VERNON HIGH SCHOOL, NOTTINGHAM.

Boys carefully prepared for the Universities, Public Schools, or for Business. Vacancies. SCHOOL RE-OPENS, May 8, 1882.

EDWIN SMITH, M.A., Head Master.

BRENTWOOD, WORSLEY, near MANCHESTER.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal ... MRS. F. SHAWCROSS,

late of Brook House, Knutsford.

The NEXT TERM begins MONDAY, May 8.

For prospectus, apply to the Principal.

ENGLISH LANGUAGE and LITERATURE, COMPOSITION and READING.

Miss LOUISA DREWRY has some time Disengaged for Lecture—or Practice Classes in Schools. She would also read with Private Pupils.—143, King Henry's-road, South Hampstead, N.W.

"THE FORT, MARGATE."—APARTMENTS in a well-furnished house, facing the sea, on moderate terms.

Address, Mrs. Stabback, Lansdowne Lodge, the Fort Margate.

BRIGHTON.—Apartments, with or without Board, at Miss Wood's, 12, Lower Rock Gardens. Three minutes from Madeira-walk and the Chain Pier.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK.—Current Accounts opened according to the usual practice of other Bankers, and Interest allowed on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £25. No commission charged for keeping Accounts.

The Bank also receives money on Deposit at Three per cent. Interest, repayable on demand.

The Bank undertakes, for its Customers, free of charge, the custody of Deeds, Writings, and other Securities and Valuables; the collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the purchase and sale of Stocks and Shares.

Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued.

A Pamphlet, with full particulars, on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCHROFT, Manager.

Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane.

THE BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY'S ANNUAL RECEIPTS EXCEED FOUR MILLIONS.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH, with Immediate Possession, and no Rent to pay. Apply at the Office the BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH, with Immediate Possession, either for Building or Gardening purposes. Apply at the Office of the BIRKBECK FREE HOLD LAND SOCIETY.

A Pamphlet, with full particulars, on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCHROFT, Manager.

Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

At the THIRTY-SECOND ANNUAL MEETING, held in the New Gravel Pit Chapel, Hackney, on May 24, 1882, Sir J. C. LAWRENCE, Bart., M.P., in the Chair, the following Resolutions were agreed to:—

The Chairman moved and Mr. F. Collier seconded—
1. That the Report now read be received, adopted, and circulated under the direction of the Committee.

The Rev. J. T. Whitehead moved and the Rev. A. B. Camm seconded—

2. That this meeting warmly approves of the endeavour of the London District Unitarian Society to form congregations at Wandsworth and Deptford, and trusts that all friends of a liberal Christianity will furnish the Society with largely increased means to enable similar efforts to be made in those suburbs of London where it is believed such services would be valued.

The Rev. Hobart Clarke moved and Professor Upton seconded—

3. That Sir James Clarke Lawrence, Bart., M.P., be re-elected President, and the following gentlemen Vice-Presidents for the ensuing year:—Mr. T. Chatfield Clarke, the Rev. P. W. Clayden, the Rev. J. P. Ham, Mr. J. Heywood, F.R.S., Mr. J. Hopgood, J.P., the Rev. H. Ierson, M.A., Alderman W. Lawrence, M.P., the Rev. T. L. Marshall, Mr. F. Nettlefold, Mr. J. T. Preston, the Rev. T. Sadler, Ph.D., Mr. W. Shakespeare, the Rev. J. T. Whitehead, with the addition of Mr. H. Tate.

The Rev. J. Wright moved and Mr. Hahnemann Epps seconded—

4. That David Martineau, Esq., be elected Treasurer, and the following gentlemen members of the Committee for the ensuing year:—Mr. F. Allen, Mr. W. C. Barrow, the Rev. W. C. Bowie, the Rev. G. Carter, Mr. W. Davis, Mr. A. J. C. Fabritius, Mr. Harwood, Mr. H. Jeffery, Mr. R. Keating, Mr. I. S. Lister, Mr. W. Noel, Mr. R. S. Oakshott, Mr. W. Scrivener, Mr. S. S. Tayler, the Rev. J. D. Vanderstraeten, Mr. I. M. Wade, and the Rev. J. Worthington; that the Rev. W. C. Bowie and Mr. W. C. Barrow be the representatives of the Society at the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and that Messrs. W. Spiller and C. J. Watts be appointed Auditors.

Mr. H. Jeffery moved and Mr. C. J. Watts seconded—
5. That Messrs. S. W. Preston and Arthur Titford be elected Hon. Secretaries for the ensuing year.

Mr. S. S. Tayler moved and Mr. I. M. Wade seconded—

6. That the thanks of the Society be given to the Minister, Committee, and Congregation of the New Gravel Pit Chapel for the use of that building for the Annual Meeting.

Mr. David Martineau moved and Mr. J. T. Whitehead seconded—

7. That the thanks of the Meeting be given to Sir J. C. Lawrence for presiding on this evening.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION SOCIETY.

The Committee are desirous of securing the aid of a THIRD MISSIONARY to form a fresh Station. Ministers or young men feeling a call to such work are requested to communicate with Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, Leathes House, Fitzjohn's-avenue, London, N.W.

BLACKFRIARS MISSION.

Subscriptions towards the CHILDRENS' TRIP gladly received by Miss PHILPOT, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, and by the Minister, the Rev. Geo. WOOLLER, 21, Great Charlotte-street, Blackfriars-road, S.E.

THE ANNUAL MEETING OF MRS. HAMPSON'S HOME will be held on THURSDAY NEXT, June 8, in the Arbitration Rooms, Inns of Court Hotel (entrance in Lincoln's inn), at Three o'clock P.M.

All Ladies and Gentlemen who take an interest in the work of Mrs. Hampson's Home are cordially invited to attend.

LONDON.—WEST-CENTRAL TEMPERANCE HOTEL, 97, 99, 101, Southampton-row, Russell-square.

Patronised and highly commended by the Rev. D. S. Govett, M.A., English Chaplain, Gibraltar; Rev. H. M. Holden, M.A., St. Bartholomew's, Bradford, Yorkshire; Rev. Canon French, M.A., Killaloe, Ireland, &c. Central, quiet, exceptionally clean, moderate in charges. Visitors' Drawing Room. Breakfast or Tea, 1s. 3d. Beds from 1s. 6d. Printed Tariff Card on application.

FREDERIC SMITH, Proprietor.

Possessing all the properties of the Finest Arrowroot,

BROWN AND POLSON'S
CORN FLOUR

Is a World-wide Necessary

FOR

THE NURSERY, THE SICK-ROOM, AND THE FAMILY TABLE.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

At the FIFTY-SEVENTH ANNUAL MEETING, held in UNITY CHURCH, UPPER-STREET, ISLINGTON, LONDON, on WEDNESDAY, May 31, 1882, DAVID AINSWORTH, Esq., M.P., in the Chair,

The Treasurer's Accounts were read, and an abstract of the Report of the Executive Committee, the draft Report having been previously forwarded to the members of the Association, and the following Resolutions were passed:—

1. "That the Reports of the Committee and Treasurer be received and adopted, and printed for circulation."

2. "That the hearty thanks of the Meeting be given to Mr. David Ainsworth for his valued services during the last year in the capacity of President of the Association, and that he be requested to accept the office for the ensuing year."

3. "That the Vice-Presidents and Home Correspondents be elected as follows:—

VICE-PRESIDENTS.

L. M. Aspland, Esq., LL.D., London.
William Blake, Esq., J.P., Ilminster.
Lady Bowring, Exeter.
Jacob Boys, Esq., Brighton.
H. A. Bright, Esq., J.P., Liverpool.
C. B. Brook, Esq., J.P., Swansea.
W. O. Brocklehurst, Esq., J.P., Macclesfield.
C. Brocklehurst, Esq., Macclesfield.
Edward Bromley, Esq., London.
Dr. W. B. Carpenter, F.R.S., C.B., London.
Rev. Professor J. E. Carpenter, M.A., London.
W. Clark, Esq., Nottingham.
W. D. Cliff, Esq., Leeds.
Charles Cochrane, Esq., J.P., Stourbridge.
Theophilus Code, Esq., Marazion, Penzance.
T. Colfox, Esq., J.P., Bridport.
F. Collier, Esq., D.L., London.
Joseph Crook, Esq., J.P., Bolton.
Rev. H. W. Crosskey, LL.D., F.G.S., Birmingham.
James M. Dartshire, Esq., Belfast.
John Dendy, Esq., Manchester.
B. Dowson, Esq., Nottingham.
John Duckworth, Esq., Bury.
Charles Ellis, Esq., J.P., Maidstone.
Edwin Ellis, Esq., Shalford, Guildford.
Richard Enfield, Esq., Nottingham.
Joshua Fielden, Esq., J.P., Nutfield, Surrey.
Henry Fordham, Esq., J.P., Royston.
Rev. W. Gaskell, M.A., Manchester.
T. F. Gibson, Esq., Tunbridge Wells.
Arthur Greg, Esq., Bolton.
H. Russell Greg, Esq., Styal.
John Grundy, Esq., Summerseat, Bury.
C. S. Grundy, Esq., Ald., Manchester.
Richard Harwood, Esq., J.P., Pendleton.
Rev. H. Hawkes, B.A., F.L.S., Portsmouth.
James Heywood, Esq., F.R.S., London.
Rev. Thomas Hincks, B.A., F.R.S., Clevedon.
William Hollins, Esq., Mansfield.
James Hopgood, Esq., J.P., London.
C. H. James, Esq., M.P., Merthyr Tydfil.
Walter D. Jeremy, Esq., M.A., London.
Thomas Jessop, Esq., J.P., Sheffield.
Timothy Kenrick, Esq., J.P., Birmingham.
J. A. Kenrick, Esq., J.P., Birmingham.
James Kitson, Esq., J.P., Leeds.
James Kitson, Jun., Esq., Leeds.
Mark Lambert, Esq., Newcastle-on-Tyne.
W. Lawrence, Esq., Ald., M.P., London.
Sir James Clarke Lawrence, Bart., Ald., M.P., London.
Edwin Lawrence, Esq., LL.B., London.
Joseph Lupton, Esq., J.P., Leeds.
M. P. Manfield, Esq., Northampton.
David Martineau, Esq., London.
John Miller, Esq., J.P., Comber.
J. Rom Murch, Esq., J.P., Bath.
Rev. S. C. Nelson, M.A., Downpatrick.
F. Nettlefold, Esq., London.
Herbert New, Esq., Evesham.
Professor F. W. Newman, Weston-super-Mare.
Rev. W. J. Odgers, Hampstead.
A. Pollett Osler, Esq., F.R.S., Birmingham.
H. F. Osler, Esq., Birmingham.
Alfred Paget, Esq., Leicester.
R. Peacock, Esq., J.P., Gorton Hall.
R. N. Phillips, Esq., J.P., M.P., Manchester.
Robert Pinnock, Esq., J.P., Newport, Isle of Wight.
Joseph T. Preston, Esq., London.
W. P. Price, Esq., J.P., Tibberton Court, near Gloucester.
W. Rathbone, Esq., J.P., M.P., Liverpool.
Harry Rawson, Esq., Manchester.
Dr. W. B. Ritchie, J.P., Belfast.
Rev. J. Robberds, B.A., Cheltenham.
W. Robertson, Esq., J.P., Belfast.
Dr. Russell, Birmingham.
Rev. Dr. Sadler, London.
Rev. Dr. G. Vance Smith, Carmarthen.
Rev. Robert Spears, London.
The Right Hon. James Stansfeld, M.P., London.
Miss Anna Swanwick, London.
S. Seaward Taylor, Esq., London.
Rev. J. H. Thom, Liverpool.
C. J. Thomas, Esq., J.P., Bristol.
John Tribe, Esq., J.P., Rochester.
John Troup, Esq., London.
John Warren, Esq., Nottingham.
Rev. G. H. Wells, M.A., Gorton.
Rev. E. Whitfield, Ilminster.
Rev. C. Wicksteed, B.A., Croydon.
P. J. Worsley, Esq., Clifton.
James Wrigley, Esq., Windermere.

NEW NOMINATIONS BY THE COUNCIL.

Henry Tate, Esq., Streatham.
Sir Roland K. Wilson, Bart., Cambridge.

NEW NOMINATIONS BY INDIVIDUAL MEMBERS OF THE ASSOCIATION.

Henry Payton, Esq., J.P., Birmingham.
Rev. W. H. Channing, B.A.
Rev. C. Clarke, F.L.S., Birmingham.
Rev. J. Wright, B.A.

HOME CORRESPONDENTS.

Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., Nottingham.
A. P. Aspland, Esq., Gee Cross.
Rev. C. D. Badland, M.A.
Rev. W. Binns, Birkenhead.
Rev. J. Birks, Taunton.
Rev. James Black, M.A., Todmorden.
Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., Bristol.
Rev. W. Blazeby, B.A., Rotherham.
Herbert Bramley, Esq., Sheffield.
A. Bromley, Esq., Bolton.
Rev. Thomas Carter, Rochdale.
Rev. A. Chalmers, Wakefield.
Rev. W. H. Channing, B.A., London.
Rev. T. W. Chignell, Exeter.
Rev. C. Clarke, F.L.S., Birmingham.
Rev. P. W. Claydon, London.
Rev. C. C. Coe, Bolton.
John Cooke, Esq., Guildford.
G. S. Coxwell, Esq., Southampton.
G. B. Dalby, Esq., Preston.
Rev. T. R. Dobson, Brighton.
Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., Gee Cross.
Rev. R. B. Drummond, B.A., Edinburgh.
J. T. Ellerbeck, Esq., Liverpool.
Alfred Else, Esq., Leicester.
Rev. George Fox, Park Lane, Wigan.
Rev. T. W. Freckelton, London.
John Fretwell, Esq.
Rev. E. M. Geldart, M.A., Croydon.
Rev. M. Gibson, Dudley.
W. J. Hands, Esq., Scarborough.
A. S. Harris, Esq., Plymouth.
Rev. J. Page Hopps, Leicester.
Rev. C. Howe, London.
Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A., Aberdare.
A. L. Knox, Esq., Glasgow.
Rev. T. Leyland, Burnley.
W. Long, Esq., Warrington.
G. Lucas, Esq., Darlington.
J. E. Mace, Jun., Esq., Tenterden.
R. McCalmont, Esq., Belfast.
Rev. D. Maginnis, F.G.S., Stourbridge.
Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., Swansea.
Rev. J. T. Marriott, Manchester.
Rev. J. K. Montgomery, Chester.
Rev. J. E. Odgers, M.A.
Rev. A. Payne, Newcastle-on-Tyne.
Rev. H. W. Perris.
Rev. R. Pilcher, B.A., Warrington.
Rev. C. T. Poynting, B.A., Manchester.
Samuel Reid, Esq., Swansea.
Rev. W. Robinson, Crewkerne.
J. Scott, Esq., Leeds.
Rev. R. Shaen, M.A., Royston.
Rev. W. Sharran, Plymouth.
Rev. J. G. Slater, Middleton.
J. H. Smith, Esq., Carmarthen.
B. K. Spencer, Esq., Southampton.
Rev. S. A. Steinthal, Manchester.
Rev. J. C. Street, Belfast.
Rev. D. Thompson, Dromore.
Rev. T. Timmins, Portsmouth.
Rev. G. H. Vance, B.D., Dukinfield.
Rev. D. Walmesley, B.A., Bury.
Rev. F. W. Walters, Glasgow.
Rev. C. H. Wellbeloved, Mansfield.
Rev. W. Whitelegge, M.A., Cork.
Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, M.A., London.
Rev. H. Williamson, Dundee.
C. Woollen, Esq., Sheffield.
Rev. Jeffery Worthington, London.
Rev. John Wright, B.A.

NEW NOMINATIONS BY THE COUNCIL.

Rev. J. Crowther Hirst, Cheltenham.
W. Butcher, Esq., Bristol.

NEW NOMINATIONS BY INDIVIDUAL MEMBERS.

Rev. T. Dunkerley, B.A., Comber, Belfast.
Rev. R. J. Orr, M.A., Belfast.
Rev. C. J. Perry, B.A., Liverpool.

4. That the following gentlemen be appointed Foreign Correspondents for the coming year:—

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENTS.

FRANCE.—M. Auguste Dide, Paris; Dr. Reville, Dieppe.
SWITZERLAND.—Dr. Chastel, Geneva; Dr. Lunge, Zurich.
ITALY.—Signor Bracciforti, Milan.
HUNGARY.—Bishop Joseph Ferencz; Hon. Alexis Jakab; John Paget, Esq., Klausenberg; Professor T. Kovacs, Klausenberg.
GERMANY.—Dr. Manchot, Bremen.
HOLLAND.—Professor Kuonen, Leyden; Professor Tiele, Leyden.
ICELAND.—Rev. M. Jochumsson.
AMERICA.—Rev. Robert Collyer, New York; Rev. Brooke Herford, Boston; Rev. A. D. Mayo, Springfield, Mass.; Rev. Dr. Corbier, Boston; Rev. Dr. J. Freeman Clarke, Boston.
AUSTRALIA.—Rev. J. C. Woods, Adelaide; Mrs. Webster, Melbourne; Rev. J. H. Smith, Sydney.

INDIA.—Rev. C. H. A. Dall, Calcutta; Rev. William Roberts, Madras."

5. "That the thanks of the Meeting be given to the Executive Committee for their able and careful conduct of the business of the Association during the past year; and that the Committee of the ensuing year be constituted as follows:—

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

T. Chatfield Clarke, Esq., J.P.
Rev. P. W. Claydon.
C. J. G. Eiloart, Esq.
James Heywood, Esq., M.A., F.R.S.
James Hopgood, Esq., J.P.
H. Jeffery, Esq.
Sir James C. Lawrence, Bart., M.P.
Edwin Lawrence, Esq., LL.B.
Bernard Lewis, Esq.
Rev. T. L. Marshall.
D. Martineau, Esq.
F. Nettlefold, Esq.
Rev. W. J. Odgers.
Stanton W. Preston, Esq.
W. Shaen, Esq., M.A.
W. Spiller, Esq.
J. Troup, Esq.
I. M. Wade, Esq.
Rev. James T. Whitehead.
Rev. Jeffery Worthington."

6. That the following Gentlemen be appointed to the respective offices for the ensuing year, with the cordial thanks of the Association for their past services:—Treasurer, Mr. S. S. Tayler; Secretary, Rev. Henry Ierson, M.A.; Solicitor, Mr. Walter C. Venning; Trustees, Sir J. C. Lawrence, Bart., M.P., Mr. D. Martineau, Mr. W. Shaen, and Mr. S. S. Tayler; Auditors, Mr. N. M. Taylor, Mr. Jesse Fagg, and Mr. W. A. Sharpe.

7. That this Meeting sympathises with the regrets of the Council at the loss of many of its most respected members during the past year, recalling with special respect the memory of Samuel Sharpe, a former President of the Association, who was as much distinguished for his zealous labours in the diffusion of Unitarian principles as he was esteemed amongst learned men for his devotion of a long and fruitful life to Biblical study and interpretation. That the Meeting would also express its sincere concurrence in the desire shown in a recent resolution of the Council to do honour to the great and worthy name of Charles Darwin, whose works of scientific research have also powerfully tended to the overthrow of popular theological errors, and the establishment of religion on its proper basis of simple, rational faith in the Divine order of the universe.

8. That this Meeting offers its sincere thanks to Rev. Dr. James Freeman Clarke and the Rev. W. M. Ainsworth for their kind services at the present Meeting; and that the Rev. Dr. Clarke be requested to allow his discourse to be placed in the hands of the Committee for publication.

9. That this Meeting records with honour, as of highest rank in the holy brotherhood of the Liberal Faith, the revered names of Henry Bellows and Orville Dewey, of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow and Ralph Waldo Emerson, gratefully remembering how truly it may be said of them that they served God in simple-hearted and practical devotion to truth and goodness, and loved their fellow-men.

10. That the Meeting receives with much gratification the communication now presented from Bishop Joseph Ferencz, and congratulating the Unitarians on the happy establishment of a congregation, under the ministry of Mr. C. Derzi, in the capital of Hungary, comments this undertaking to the continued support of the Executive Committee.

11. That the Association gladly receives the co-operation of the various Unitarian Mission Societies throughout the kingdom, and, giving cordial welcome to their representatives present at this Meeting, desires especially to express its hearty sympathy with the missionaries in the difficult but important work in which they are engaged.

12. That the hearty thanks of the Meeting be presented to the Rev. T. W. Freckelton and the Committee and Congregation of Unity Church, for their kind reception of the Association on the occasion of this Anniversary.

37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London.

LITTLE PORTLAND-STREET CHAPEL

On SUNDAY, JUNE 4, Rev. J. FREEMAN CLARKE, D.D., of Boston, U.S., will Preach in the Morning. Subject: "Emphasis in Life and Religion." Service at 11.15 a.m. Collection on behalf of the Portland British Schools; and in the Evening, Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS. Subject, "The Sword of Jesus." Service at 7 p.m. Collection on behalf of the Fund of the Chapel.

NOTICE.

NEW GRAVEL PITT UNITARIAN CHAPEL, PARADISE-PLACE, HACKNEY.

The Rev. J. K. WRIGHT has kindly consented to preach the Annual School Sermons on SUNDAY, JUNE 11. Collections will be made on behalf of the Day and Sunday Schools. An Anthem will be sung.

Printed by WOODFALL and KINDER, of Milford-lane, Strand W.C.; and Published for the Proprietors by WALTER MAWER, at the Offices of the SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London, W.C.—Saturday, June 3, 1882

The Inquirer.

A Religious, Political, & Literary Newspaper, & Record of Reberent Free Thought.

[REGISTERED AT THE GENERAL POST-OFFICE AS A NEWSPAPER.]

No. 2085.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 10, 1882.

[PRICE 5D.]

CONTENTS.

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:—

The Church Attendance Problem...	373
The Sunday School Association ...	374
Garibaldi ...	374
Getting at "The Masses of the People" ...	376
Our Churches and the People ...	376
The Royal Academy's Exhibition ...	377
Dr. Williams's Trust—XXXI. ...	378

OCCASIONAL NOTES ... 378

REVIEWS:—

Progress ...	379
The "Contemporary Review" ...	380
The "Nineteenth Century" ...	380
Short Notices ...	380
Literary Notes ...	381

OUR CONTEMPORARIES ... 382

CORRESPONDENCE:—

The Resurrection of Jesus... ..	384
The Irish Question	384
God and Immortality	385

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE:—

University Hall, London	386
Ecclesiastical and Mortuary Fees... ..	386

OBITUARY.—

John Ellis Mace, of Tenterden	386
The Rev. Benjamin Lepard Green... ..	387

THE CHURCH ATTENDANCE PROBLEM.

II.—INTELLECTUAL OBSTACLES.

THE considerations which affect the attendance of the people at public worship are exceedingly various. One important class may be called Intellectual Obstacles. It is this class which formed the subject of the paper by Professor CAVE, of Hackney College, at the recent meeting of the Congregational Union. He began by professing his strong conviction that the closing decades of this nineteenth century will be chronicled in history for a very remarkable change in the intellectual life of our age. Mighty agencies have been at work of a social and political kind, popular education has been spreading, wonderful advances have been made in science, the standard of culture has risen. These are some of the disturbing causes which have led to the intellectual difficulties that many now feel. The result is a considerable degree of popular excitement about things that were considered a few years ago beyond the popular range. The very deepest subjects that can engage the attention of thoughtful minds have become common topics for popular discussion. On all hands there is much excitement about great questions that a few years ago would have been considered esoteric. "Possibly," says Professor CAVE, "it has happened that this popular excitement about great things has been for a season detrimental to religion." He thinks that if we compare the religious life of to-day with what it was twenty-five years ago we shall see evidence of a remarkable change, and instances, as a case in point, the reception of books of an anti-Christian character, "Recall for a moment," he says, "the wonderful storm that was raised in this England of ours by the publication of 'Essays and Reviews,' or recall what took place just afterwards—the publication of Bishop COLENSO's first book on the Pentateuch. Now those books, I venture to say, were mild in comparison with books that are read nowadays by all of us from our circulating libraries. It is a matter of common fact that a very good spice for books of the day is to be found in a little dash of scepticism." And what effect does all this produce on the mind of Dr. CAVE? He tells us not a depressing one. "No doubt," he says, "there may be to the religious mind reasons for profound regret, and yet I for one cannot help thinking that there are to us as religious men great grounds for hope from the more intellectual movements of the day; the spirit of inquiry that is abroad is something that we should rather hail than otherwise." We quite agree with him, but we are deeply persuaded that only a very liberal Orthodoxy—an Orthodoxy that has almost ceased to be Orthodox—can afford to welcome the searching spirit of inquiry that is now abroad. What amount of concession Professor CAVE is prepared to make does not appear from his paper. He deals only in vague generalities, and while he keeps to them he can easily afford to be hopeful.

Like other thoughtful observers Professor CAVE sees clearly "that some of the religious circumstances of our time are pointing to the fact that old theologies are losing their hold on the popular mind, and that our great duty is the formation of a theology that shall hold in the day in which we are now teaching." If, as we fully believe, the old theologies are losing their hold on the public mind, the question follows, what shall be substituted for them? On this important point he really renders us no assistance. "We believe," he says, "that we have mighty facts to proclaim. Shall we not preach them and reprove them, until they, too, like scientific truths, find their way into the popular hearing?" Now these mighty facts, as he calls them, the Churches, established and non-established, have been proclaiming for centuries, and now, with better knowledge and enlightenment, the people are turning away from them as no facts at all, but antiquated superstitions founded or misconceptions. Will the people be won back by merely reiterating the old assumptions and dogmas? He really appears to think so, for he expresses the conviction that if he and his brethren "hold on with patience and persistence they will see the age come round to them, rather than they go round to it." We beg to differ from him, and to express our conviction that if the Congregationalists are content with "simply holding on" they will find the age advance beyond them and leave them farther and farther behind.

Professor CAVE is prepared to go some way on the path of concession. He admits that Orthodox theories have occupied too largely the position of facts, that all through the Christian Churches of to-day there is coming a very profound conviction that they have been insisting too much upon their theories, and that they have put them, so to speak, in the position of their facts. In other words, the Christian Church is beginning to see that it has thought too much of isms and too little of Christianity; too much of separate teachers of theology and too little of CHRIST." Accordingly, he counsels his brethren to "hold some of their theories with a lighter hand, and to frankly confess that some truths which were proclaimed some years ago as facts and theories of our faith have shown themselves to be inadequate generalisations." This is an admission, but it is very timid and insufficient. Certainly we do not think it will win back to the Church those who are kept away at present by intellectual obstacles. The alleged facts and theories of Orthodoxy are not merely inadequate generalisations, but mistaken conceptions founded on imperfect knowledge or mere pretension to knowledge. The just course, it seems to us, is frankly to admit this, abandon the theories which are felt to be untenable, and build up anew the structure of religious belief on the foundation of the facts which modern knowledge has revealed.

But it is time to ask what really are the intellectual obstacles that in some cases prevent attendance at public worship? Among several that might be named, two or three prominent intellectual obstacles are the following:—

1. The doctrine of Biblical infallibility. This we are persuaded is a stumbling block with a great many. At church and chapel alike they hear the Bible spoken of without any qualification as the Word of God. They are required to believe that it is divinely inspired throughout, of equal authority in every part, that its statements and representations, however incredible, are not to be questioned, and to doubt them is to imperil one's salvation. They are asked to submit their intellectual and moral nature to its teaching absolutely, to ignore the protests of reason and turn a deaf ear to the still small voice that speaks in the depths of our moral nature. The Bible thus presented as a divine oracle, a perfect record of divine revelation is an offence to them. It shocks their understanding, it repels their moral sense. Unable to accept this extravagant pretension on behalf of the Bible, and as they cannot go to church or chapel without hearing more or less of it, they keep away. It is true that some liberal Orthodox writers are beginning to discriminate in regard to the contents of the Bible, but the prevailing language of the Pulpit is such as we have described.

2. Another intellectual obstacle that interferes with attendance at public worship is the Orthodox theology. The dogmas of Orthodoxy are becoming increasingly distasteful to the thoughtful, educated portion of the population. Thus the doctrine of the Trinity shocks the mind by its absurdity and its vain endeavour to hold together monotheism and tritheism. The Fall, that is, the fall of man at one step from a primitive state of virtue, intelligence, and immortality to a gulf of sin, misery, and death, is felt to be in direct conflict with science. The Atonement, which teaches that GOD inflicted punishment on the innocent expressly to save the guilty, and made this substitution the one condition of saving mankind from the doom which, it is said, mankind had justly incurred, this is felt to be at variance with every sentiment of justice and true benignity. The doctrine of Eternal Punishment completes the revolt of the intellectual and moral nature at the teaching of Orthodoxy. If there were nothing else to repel, this cruel dogma of endless pain under the government of a righteous GOD would be sufficient to keep those away who shrink from hearing such a doctrine taught, and the character of GOD libelled with a horrible superstition.

3. Those who cannot believe in miracles, and the number is increasing every day, cannot listen with acceptance to teaching based on the belief in miraculous interpositions. They have no faith in anything of the kind, whether recorded in the Bible or elsewhere. The popular Christianity of the day is pervaded by this supernaturalism of which they are utterly incredulous. Accordingly, their minds are in a perpetual attitude of protest and dissent, while listening to the laboured expositions of the current theology. What wonder, then, if they find attendance at church distasteful, and therefore keep away?

4. The poor unsatisfying preaching so common in the pulpit to-day is another intellectual obstacle. The decay of power in the pulpit has been the subject lately of common remark. The preaching, both in church and chapel, is felt by great numbers to be utterly unsatisfying. It is based on empty assumptions and pretensions which the cultured, inquiring, rational mind cannot accept. It skims the surface of great subjects, but is unwilling or afraid to look beneath. Its superficial character provokes indifference on the part of earnest thinkers. Its range of subjects is limited, and its treatment of them stereotyped. There is a want of freshness, spontaneity, and originality. It is bound by precedent, follows too much in the groove of custom. The Orthodox tradition is oppressive to the preacher. It is answerable for much of the deadness and dulness of the pulpit. Readers, thinkers, do not care to go and hear nothing but a repetition of the state platitudes they have listened to from childhood. What is the ordinary sermon? A text, and a string of commonplace observations, winding up with an exhortation repeated in substance for the thousandth time. And numbers of persons never darken the doors of church or chapel; is it any wonder?

Professor CAVE makes no reference to these intellectual obstacles. Indeed, his paper is a poor performance for a college professor. It is loosely, not to say carelessly, written, and it really renders no help towards solving the problem it undertakes to discuss. That his paper should have been received with applause only shows, we cannot help saying it, how little earnest thought is expected from an Orthodox professor. A different class of obstacles formed the subject of the third paper, the consideration of which we must leave to another opportunity.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

THE annual breakfast and meeting of the Sunday School Association, which brought to a close the public gatherings in connection with our Whitsuntide festival, was better attended than on previous occasions. The number of societies represented by delegates was, we believe, larger than has ever been the case before, a fact which testifies to the widening influence of this very useful society. The report of the Treasurer showed a balance on the right side, and that of the Committee made it quite clear that this did not arise from the neglect to carry out the special work that it is expected to do. We are glad to notice, too, that the publications of the society are obtaining a wider circulation, an encouraging fact in more ways than one. The returns, too, from the schools showed that, except in one respect, the numbers were on the increase, the only decrease being in the number of elder scholars. Of course, if this decrease should be maintained, it will be a matter for very serious consideration, but if, as we suspect, it is only an exceptional decrease, the question is not of much importance. It may be noted in passing that in the year 1880 the same number of schools returned just 420 scholars less under this head. Looking, too, at the returns for the last seven years, there is a steady progression in every way, and that is, we submit, the proper mode of looking at figures, and not to institute comparisons between one year and that immediately preceding. We observe with qualified satisfaction that during the past year 349 elder scholars have become teachers. We say qualified satisfaction, because, though we are delighted to find that so many have learned the lesson of self-sacrifice which is involved in being a teacher in a Sunday-school, it is not pleasant to think that possibly they are taking the place of teachers better qualified in point of education for the work, that now more than ever demands the zeal of cultured people. The way in which a scholar may join a congregation is by no means uniform; but we observe that the returns show that 412 have done this, and probably if it were made more clear what joining a congregation means a still larger number of schools would return some of their scholars as having joined.

The plan of having special services for the children seems to grow, the returns proving that more than half of the schools have such services. The friends of juvenile temperance, too, will be glad to note that in fifty of the English and seven of the Irish schools making returns there are Bands of Hope, and this fact may be commended to Mr. STOPFORD BROOKE, who recently stated that he had been told that no organised attempt to deal with the evils of the drink traffic found favour among Unitarians. There is one feature in the returns that we do not regard with much pleasure: we notice that among the institutions connected with the schools there are "dramatic clubs." We confess that it does not strike us that this kind of institution is calculated to serve the object of the Sunday-school at all. The Committee might probably have been justified in omitting these from the returns, but it is evidently better that the fact, however unpleasant it may be, should not be concealed. At present these clubs seem to be in their infancy, but we should view their growth with much concern, and shall watch very keenly the result of the attempts thus made to lower, as we think, the influence of the Sunday-school.

It was a matter of disappointment to many, no doubt, that no definite announcement could be made as to the new building for the society, in which it could carry on its operations and hold its meetings. Matters have not, however, progressed sufficiently for that, and in the present delicate nature of the negotiations a discreet silence was the best course to take. When the matter becomes more ripe we shall, as the President himself remarked, hear enough about it. It is satisfactory, however, to learn that the question has not been lost sight of. The only word of counsel we would give is, that too much time should not be concentrated on obtaining one particular spot or site, however much that may appear at first sight to have a monopoly of advantages. A central position is no doubt an essential; but that it should be in, or even contiguous to, a main thoroughfare is not so important. The men who have the matter in hand may, however, be trusted to do all that is necessary, and we may indulge the hope that at the next annual meeting, if not before, a definite and satisfactory announcement will be made.

It was unfortunate, perhaps, that more time could not be given to the discussion of Mr. MILLSON's wise and practical paper. We say "perhaps," because we are tempted at times to doubt the value of discussions by persons who, on the inspiration of the moment and without any previous thought on the subject, seize upon some minor point, and draw away the attention of the audience from the main and important part of the subject for consideration. At the same time we should have liked to have heard some of those who have long been engaged in this sort of work give us the results of their invaluable experience. We hope that those who are interested in this important sphere of usefulness, and who have had the opportunity of reading the paper in our columns, and those teachers who will no doubt read it in Teachers' Notes, will carefully consider Mr. MILLSON's suggestions. We are convinced with him that "religious influence" has now become the "substantial reality" of Sunday-school work. But that such influence can be brought about by the old methods it would be absurd to imagine. The wise teacher will recognise this, and act in accordance with his perception of the fact. We hope that the Committee will find an opportunity of carrying out Mr. MILLSON's suggestions as to a graduated series of books. The volumes that they have recently issued show that there are writers fully capable of taking part in such a scheme.

GARIBALDI.

ANOTHER of the heroes of the nineteenth century has gone. GARIBALDI the Dauntless, the soldier of freedom, has passed upward to his reward, while his memory remains warm and living in the hearts of the friends of progress in every land—for he belonged not only to Italy, but to the world. It is true that he was a soldier, that he shed blood in scores of battles, in many lands and many climes, but he did not follow the dreadful trade as a profession, but rather as a means of overthrowing the enemies of mankind, and setting free those enslaved and oppressed by them. To gain these ends he fought not only with his sword, but also with his pen. His one great passion was liberty, and he became its armed apostle. And in his circumstances, with his temperament and mould of mind, he could hardly have given himself to anything else with the same energy and devotion he gave himself to this. When he had made possible the one main object of his life, the unification of his country, like a modern Cincinnatus, he retired to his island home and his plough, leaving kings and diplomatists to plot and quarrel, and prepare new work for the sword.

Born in 1807, he was purely a son of the nineteenth century, which has done so much to liberate men from the evils which enthralled them in the past, and which promises to do so much more to extend all kinds of liberties before it passes on to join the centuries that have gone before it. We hold that to the men of vigorous faculties and enterprising temperament it has been a privilege to live during this century, for though it has been a stormy one it has been full of achievement, and also full of promise for the future. Negro slavery, which all but universally prevailed when the century came in, has been, with rare exceptions, extinguished. GARIBALDI was a sworn enemy to it, as he was of all kinds of bondage. The divine right of kings, which had received several severe shocks at the end of last century—and one most terrible one in the century before—has received its final death stroke in this. Only in the mind of the antiquated soldier-Emperor of Germany does it seem to have any vitality in our day, as far as Europe is concerned, and when this stern strong Christian son of ODIN passes from the earth it will have finally left the convictions of men. Of course we do not count the Bourbons of either France or Italy; they are the fossils of the political world, and have no real place in the nineteenth century. And though BISMARCK professes adherence to the doctrine, he has too strong and clear a head, and he understands the realities of the time too well for it to be any more than a profession. With all the best minds of the age, GARIBALDI was a Republican, that is, he believed in the rule of the people by the people, for Republicanism is not a mere form of government but a principle. GARIBALDI, a right noble representative of this leading order of mind in the world, subordinated his preference for the special form of government without a hereditary head, to the choice of the people themselves whose right it is to rule; and thus proved his real belief in their right to decide their own destinies. And when his nation insisted on having a king at its head as the symbol of unification, he hailed VICTOR EMANUEL as monarch of Italy as sincerely as any one in the country. Unyielding as fate in principle he could give way with a good conscience as to matter of form, knowing full well that the form will come, too, when the people are really prepared for it. In this course of conduct he proved himself wiser than some who refuse to help in the development of a cause because they cannot start where they wish to end.

GARIBALDI was born an Italian, but the subject of a foreign Power; and he gave his life up to the liberating his country from the various yokes which at once oppressed and divided it. He saw that the sense of subordination kept back the development of the nobler powers of his fellow countrymen, while calling into activity the meaner ones. Thus a people with a remarkably rich nature, full of the vital sap of humanity which produces talent of all kinds, and wonderful works of genius, had their faculties thwarted, and their lives dwarfed and demeaned. With a passion-kindled soul, such as GOD had given to him, what could GARIBALDI do but flame up into a life-long wrathful action in his endeavours to destroy the hateful yoke of the foreigner—specially when associated with such infamous doings as the Bourbons in Naples and the two Sicilies, and in the Papal States?

GARIBALDI was born into a Roman Catholic family, superstitious to fanaticism, and devoted to the Papacy. In the course of years experience taught him how the rule of the priest blighted what is most divine in the human soul, and withered the highest faculties of the mind, leaving the people subject to it children in intellect while men in their passions. He saw the prince and the priest in a conspiracy against humanity. The spies and the soldiers of the first made public life impossible, and social life a dwarfed and tainted existence; while the priest through the Confessional stole into the family, and made domestic life a misery and a degradation to the active minded. Is it a wonder that a fierce unreasoning hatred to the priest has taken possession of the minds of so many Italians; and that GARIBALDI, the representative soul of Italian hopes and aspirations, should have waged such relentless war against the order? And yet even here he showed that it was not so much hatred of systems, however foul, as love of his country and devotion to its welfare that animated him; for when the POPE for a time professed himself a reformer, GARIBALDI hastened to offer himself as a soldier in his service. It was a strange sight—the head of the most conservative institution in Christendom, professing to believe in progress and openly proclaiming his intention to lend it aid. As it is in our country at the present hour, the chief of a vast secret influence through the Confessional, condemning secret societies, a palpable contradiction, so it was then, and it could not possibly go on long. Of course they who claim a monopoly always protest against anybody's else monopoly; and these societies endanger the power of the Confessional. Of course, 1848 revealed the real sentiments of the Pope, or at least proved that the system was too strong for the man, and GARIBALDI was thrown by a strong reaction into a fiercer antagonism to the priest than ever. Henceforward his words were flames against the Papacy, and his actions were such as left deep marks on the body at which he struck. An illustration of his depth and strength of feeling was furnished during the extremity of the siege of Rome in 1849. The overwhelming forces of the French under General OUDINOT, after the most heroic and exasperating defence, threatened to lay the city in ashes, and the Triumvirs were for capitulating. Even the proud will of MAZZINI seemed for the time to be cowed. But GARIBALDI was for holding out to the last. "Let them destroy St. Peter's," he exclaimed; "when the monuments of a base superstition have perished the superstition itself will die." The Romish Bishop of Salford may denounce him as a cutthroat, as he did only a few weeks ago with singular bad taste, and inappropriate temper, for it was in a meeting that had been called together for philanthropic purposes, but it was only as SALMASIUS termed MILTON a truculent rebel against the LORD's anointed; or as the southern slaveholders of the United States denounced GARRISON as a robber and a disturber of the peace and an enemy of the Union. It has been the fate of the liberators and saviours of men in every age to be thus denounced by the priests and the princes of the world, against whose rule they have warred for humanity's sake. At all events he won the devoted love of those who knew him best, who worked with him, and fought under him—his friends and his soldiers all but idolised him. In any case we in this country have no right to complain of his estimate of us, for he loved England, and it was while he laid wounded at Spezzia he said, "The sound of an English voice does me good." When he had established a provisional government in Naples, after the flight of the King, the first act he did was to grant to the English community there a free site on which to build a Protestant church. And many years ago he declared that "England is a great and powerful nation, independent of auxiliary aid, foremost in human progress, an enemy to despotism, the only safe refuge of the exile, friend of the oppressed; but if ever England, your native country, should be so circumstanced as to require the help of an ally, cursed be that Italian who would not step forward with me in her defence." At all events he showed his love for this country, and if Bishop VAUGHAN had been an Englishman first, and an Ecclesiastic second, he would not have made his singularly misplaced attack upon him.

GARIBALDI was a hero—that is, he was utterly disinterested, self-sacrificing, brave to rashness, and terrible in the hour of battle, both on sea and land. He was singularly negligent of his own interests while serving those of his country, and "he who was greater than a king in the possession of those virtues by which he was distinguished, and in the veneration of millions of human beings;" who gave provinces to the King of Italy, and made the unification of his country possible; who, thoughtless of himself, exposed his person in battle more than even the private soldier—when his work was done resigned power, wealth, station, almost the intercourse of man, and retired to his island farm and devoted himself to its cultivation and improvement. By the flight of a roguish agent with the balance of his small fortune he was left in such embarrassment that his country had to step forward and relieve him from it. So did his mission consume him that when he retired at different times to Caprera between his various campaigns, it was not to rest, for letters and manifestoes on many subjects, and especially against the priests of the Romish Church, poured forth from him thick and fast. Though he warred against "the Church," it was not that he had any quarrel with religion generally or Christianity in particular. He was a devout worshipper of the One Supreme Spirit of the Universe, the Father and Providence of men; and he honoured JESUS as one of the greatest redeeming persons that God had ever sent to the earth. He even denounced the priests as the enemies of the good JESUS. He was a Liberal Christian, so far as a devout soul brought up in the Church of Rome could be one, who rebelled so fiercely against the faith of his early days as to blind him even to the merits of the system he has been compelled to leave. At least he has made the conditions in Italy such as that for the future our free faith will have fair play to plant and diffuse itself throughout the country. And now the indomitable will rests in quiet, the strong heart is stilled, the large and generous soul is with his God, and he is on earth no more—

"Be still, false tongue!

He's with us yet in what he's done!"

Instead of mourning him let us thank God for the gift of him to the world, and that he stayed with us so long. For, in spite of the constant dangers he seemed to delight in, and of the hardships and wounds he suffered, he lived the allotted years of man, and has passed away amidst the love of those he strove to serve, and of the nation he had so much to do in making. He was in the seventy-fifth year of his age when he died. God be thanked that now and then we are presented with instances of what human nature is capable of at its best!

W. M.

GETTING AT "THE MASSES OF THE PEOPLE."

THE discussion which took place at Essex-street Chapel on Thursday week on "The Duty of our Churches in Relation to the Masses of the People" was at all events suggestive and lively, if not characterised by anything very original or striking. The opening papers, especially that of Mr. BOWIE, were almost exhaustive in the way of suggestion as to methods. The illustrations supplied by subsequent speakers were, on the whole, pointed. But it struck us that some of these did not come from the organised action of societies, or churches as such, but from individual efforts and experiments. That, for instance, related by Professor ESTLIN CARPENTER of the good minister who opened his chapel punctually on week day mornings to the loitering work people, who, having eaten their breakfasts, did not seemingly know what to do with the next spare half hour, and who interested while he instructed them in a way to win their attention sympathies and regard—that was an act at once simple and original, but strictly individual. An act of this kind, however, can hardly be formally undertaken by a Church, and would be utterly spoiled if used for anything like proselytism. It is this bye end of proselytism, this hidden purpose of gaining converts by side ways, that spoils and mars so much that is done or attempted to be done for "the masses." They are shrewd enough to detect the medicine hidden in the sweet which it is hoped they will thus swallow.

It strikes us also that mere "methods" of action are too much dwelt upon in meetings and conferences such as that held on Thursday week. The spirit that creates or suggests the "method" is everything; the form is altogether secondary, is even useless and certain to fail if a mere imitation of what somebody else has tried, with perhaps some measure of success. We are reminded in this connection of a fine saying of EMERSON:—"The reform of reforms is accomplished without means." The idea here is obvious; the Spirit of GOD must come into direct contact without media, as it were, with the spirit of man, and thus the supreme end is gained. Now no machinery or method of ours can create this spiritual vital contact. These, if treated or used as essentials, may even stand in the way and prove rather a hindrance than a help. The artificial heat that comes from the bodily exercise that profits but little is often mistaken for the Celestial fire itself. It is in this light we view the Salvation Army efforts. They are altogether too violent to continue long without reaction, and perhaps collapse. Mr. PAGE HOPPS bore testimony on the Thursday evening, without giving details, to the sad perversion of religion he witnessed at one of the recent gatherings of the Army. Men of coarse nature, wholly unguided and unrestrained by right reason or homely good sense, get violently excited, rave and shout amidst a perfect storm of ejaculations, till the so-called prayer or worship seems to come from Bedlamites. The vulgar familiarity with the sacred Name, the noisy importunities addressed to GOD, the getting Him so to speak into a corner till He is supposed to grant the petition, shouted at rather than addressed to Him—all this is painful to the reverent while it amuses the outside irreverent spectators, and often leads to those unseemly scenes of mob violence that have now become as notorious as they are disgraceful. The so-called successes of the Salvation Army are, we believe, greatly exaggerated, and only time is needed to test their validity. Assuredly if their methods are right those of the Great Master of Christians were wrong or defective. If he did not strive or cry, or cause his voice to be heard in the streets, he must have failed to affect the multitude according to the Salvation Army modes of procedure. Yet he did, as we know, effectively draw and win the common people. He did indeed kindle a sacred quenchless fire, but it was in the deepest affections of the human heart, which, perhaps, feels most truly when there is no speech or language, and its voice even is not heard. We, at all events, speaking as Liberal Christians, are not likely to be carried away by the tempest of unnatural—certainly not supernatural excitement that now rages in many parts of the kingdom. But we may be tempted and led astray by craving for visible successes, to adopt not as originators, but as imitators, the methods that are supposed to be needful to success. Where there is real religious fervour and singleness of aim almost any method or means will do to express and kindle something of the same fervour in others. Now at the recent Conference it struck us that many speakers yielded to the feeling of the moment, and became somewhat unreal and consequently ineffective. There was a quite superfluous amount of exhortation on their part as to what others should do. Ministers especially were told what were their duties and responsibilities. Last year instead of going to the five-shilling soirée at Richmond they should have gone to Drury-lane, and, no doubt, attempted the conversion of the very low class of people to be found in that crowded unsightly quarter. The speaker himself did not do this either last year or last Thursday week, we presume. That was for somebody else to do. The suggestion raised a smile and a laugh, no doubt, and perhaps that was all the speaker meant to accomplish. If so he had his reward.

But now, in all seriousness, is there that pressing need for new methods, merely because they are new, when plenty of old tried methods remain waiting to be used, when competent labourers in the field of the world are ready to offer and consecrate themselves to the service of the Lord of the harvest? There are now three or four vacancies for domestic missionaries, but where are the men who are duly qualified to fill these posts of honourable toil? For five months since the death of the devoted JOHN WILSON, Birmingham, has been without a suitable successor to him. Liverpool has now two such vacancies; are the right men likely to be found to fill them—thoughtful, ardent, modest, self-forgetting men? The London Committee has just advertised for one such to start a third mission; will their appeal meet with a prompt and satisfactory response? Judging from the past, notwithstanding the Liverpool Conference, and that held last week, we are somewhat fearful, lest these missions—true methods of expressing and promoting the Christianity of CHRIST—should fail to find duly qualified candidates. It is, perhaps, no real disparagement to students or ministers if they shrink from seeking to occupy positions of a kind that demand so much variety of not merely pulpit, but administrative power. The Rev. Dr. MARTINEAU did at one time in his early ministerial days think of devoting himself to domestic missionary work, but ultimately with instinctive modesty shrunk from undertaking its manifold duties. That he would have fulfilled those duties efficiently and raised the office itself in the eyes of men to an altitude of great dignity there can be no question. On the other hand, we cannot but believe that the thinking religious world would have sustained an irreparable loss by the non-publication of those "thoughts that breathe and words that burn" which he has only too sparingly given for the spiritual refreshment and delight of his numerous readers.

When, then, the old and well tried methods, quite adequate to convey the influences of GOD and men breathing His inspirations, are fitly employed for these ends by qualified agents we may trouble ourselves to find and try the newer. There is room enough, indeed, for both. Let Conferences also continue to be held to compare and test experiences and offer fresh suggestions. But real success must entirely depend not on the methods, but on the divine power which inspires and sustains them—or rather the human agents who so inspired and sustained use them simply as instruments, mere means to reach divinest ends.

C. L. C.

OUR CHURCHES AND THE PEOPLE.—I

[The following paper, by Mr. Edwin Ellis, of Guildford, on the question, "By what practical means can our churches best enlarge and extend their religious influence?" is printed as a contribution by a layman to the discussion of last week. It was written, however, before the three papers published in our last number.]

This is a question that recurs over and over again to the earnest religionist. It is, indeed, the vital question for him to answer. If he is conscious of having absorbed the principles of his faith into his life, of being influenced permanently by them, and that all his actions are more or less the manifestations of them, he cannot contemplate their absence in others with a philosophic indifference. If his religion is to be a power in the world it must be an essential to himself, and, on the other hand, if it is vital to him he feels that it must be vital to the world at large.

Then comes the query, "What can I do to increase the influence of my Church? how can the Church best enlarge and extend its influence?" The solution he arrives at, that is if he ever does arrive at a solution, will be suggested as well as coloured by the ideas he holds as to his Church's special work. It appears to me that Unitarians are fast awakening to see that the work of their body is thoroughly constructive, and that a great Unitarian Church is a possibility.

I can never think of our religious ancestors without admiration and respect. Whether "Presbyterian," "General Baptist," "Arian," "Old School Unitarians," or whatever they called themselves, or we call them—their memory and their work are a rich legacy for us. Few in numbers, living semi-isolated lives, with a despised belief, branded as Atheists and shut out from political honours, they yet made themselves felt and feared. Their churches were centres of light, their Sunday-schools dispersed rays of secular knowledge when the clergy were decrying its influence and trying to stifle its results, their members were always to be found advocating liberty of thought and speech, educational influences, and public as well as private morality. Looking back on the effects produced by individual members of these Churches we must come, I think, to the conclusion that they had a distinct mission, and worthily performed it. Their religion was in so far constructive that it made them men—the great aim of all religion after all is said and done. But they were necessarily and righteously destructive, seeing that there was no room for them till the accretions of ages were swept away. They saw, in fact, that the ears of the people were stopped; till they were opened what chance had they? If their views of the character of God, of the everlasting life, of the position of Christ were truer, higher, and more beneficent than those around, could they expect to spread them among a people who could read nothing and think only their clergyman's thoughts? They found that the religious instincts of the people were so interwoven with a "scheme of salvation and a mythological record that any teaching which attacked the verity of these appeared irreligious, unchristian, and blasphemous. They said, "This is the result of ignorance; give knowledge, disperse this darkness, and our views must prevail," and forthwith they set themselves to spread education in every practicable way. Thus every Church was at least an enlightening agency in its district and had real power and influence because there was at the root of it thorough belief that it was going to do a great work outside of itself. This educational work was the only manifestation of the missionary spirit then possible, and this spirit—without which no Church can advance—was kept alive by a deep appreciation of the value of its faith. In thus reviewing the position we may perhaps be inclined to believe that our forefathers were over sanguine—that they were themselves so accustomed to the "sweet reasonableness" of their faith that they forgot the presence of other obstacles besides ignorance; that they underestimated the power of associations; the love of the marvellous, and of mysteries, and altogether overlooked the erratic workings of the religious sentiment. But much of the work done in the world is the result of an exaggerated value put on some guiding idea. Enthusiasm, however misplaced, is a necessary element in success, and a lover who could value his beloved at her actual worth only—as she might appear in the eyes of a philosopher—would be deficient in the first element of conquest.

Thus rapidly I have glanced at the past influence of our Churches (and in these fast moving days let it never be forgotten how great that influence has been), as showing how strongly our forefathers grasped the educational idea, and how essential to their work was the so-called destructive work they did. Our work, indeed, is made possible by theirs. For like all good honest endeavour, pursued by right methods it spread roots far and wide, the principle of growth was inherent in it, and thus we now see that much of the work these men originated is being pursued by others in various churches or outside all of them. Education is seen to be a national question, and the very existence of society to depend on it. The press has attained an influence of surpassing magnitude, relative to which the influence of all religious bodies diminishes, while that of our own diminishes also in relation to theirs. Thus the conditions of life require that all agencies be modified to meet them.

Here for a moment let us glance at the churches around us and at the work they are doing. As respects the Roman Catholic there is little need to speak. She is, as ever, the great refuge for the blasés and the ignorant, apart from the progress of the world around her. The Church of England having thrown off the lethargy and indifference that characterised her at the beginning of the century is perhaps more truly beloved by her adherents than ever before. The high type of her Ritualistic clergy—spite of errors incident to the anomalous position they occupy—their arduous labours among the people and their self-denial endear her to the people, while as the Church of the upper classes she procures the nominal adhesion of tens of thousands who care nothing for religion, as well as of those who having grown out of her creeds, yet dislike and despise dissent and dissenters. The orthodox dissenting bodies—notably the Baptists and the Congregationalists—are absorbing the people of England into their folds, perhaps I should say the religious people of England; that is, people in whom the religious sentiment predominates over the intellectual, and determines for them their theological position. The causes of this are, I think, very patent, and need hardly be discussed here; but in my opinion the result is greatly to be deplored. It is no slight matter to see the gentler, more receptive, and more emotional natures possessed by a theology so narrow and imperfect. It is a terrible thing to see so little connection recognised between the professions of religion and the actions of every day life! But there is another great section of society especially massed in great towns; those who have never assimilated the orthodox teachings into their systems. In many cases they have been brought up under orthodox influences against which perhaps they have never openly rebelled. But their surroundings set on them simply as clothes which one wears, but regards as outside of himself. These men exercise their intellects on religious as on secular questions, and go their way generally without guidance from any quarter whatsoever. They probably grow to despise religion and religious teachers—not to hate them. Their feelings in connection with the subjects are not strong enough for this, but they leave religion, as they say, "for the women folks," and are content if their wives and families get some satisfaction out of it. They discuss the only "Christianity" of which they know anything with very little respect, and are keen enough to see its weak points. Probably they stop short of being, or of regarding themselves as Atheists, although if fashionable they would have been called "Agnostics;" but they are living without the help which we believe a pure religious faith would give them, and nothing is put before them in such a way as to induce them to join any religious body, or listen to any religious teacher. This section of society is increasing day by day. It contains the élite of the working classes, the men with robust minds and large brains who will in some way or another leave their mark on society. If they do not learn to build up, they will assuredly pull down—and that perhaps rather blindly—anything which they may think "cumbrous the ground." I have sometimes thought that the Unitarian body forget this section of society, and what they might do for them. I believe that here is our proper recruiting ground, that here may be found men to carry on and extend the work that is special to Unitarians. Rely on it, if we cannot help these people no other religious body can. The Roman Catholic, the Anglican, the Evangelical dissenting bodies exert great influence over large masses, but they have no place for these. It is only, I fully believe, by influences akin to those we advocate that this large growing portion of society will attach itself to religious organisations. You say "it is a difficult work to get these men inside the Church." I reply, in Carlyle's language, "Did you ever know any work that was worth doing that was not difficult?"

Now let us assume that we have a Church composed of men and women who thoroughly believe that they have grasped grand religious truths, truths which if accepted and acted upon would revolutionise society. If that belief burns in them and if they don't get rid of all the heat generated by prudential and selfish feelings, they will feel that their whole duty is not done when they have listened to their favourite minister or joined in the service of a Sunday. They will feel "I am greatly blessed, I have a faith that lifts me altogether out of the atmosphere of mistrust or dread in which millions of my countrymen are living—out also of the centre of indifference—and which makes me feel that I am a part of the Universe and a co-worker with God. And how a co-worker? I must do as I have been done by. This blessed religion which binds me to the spirit of the Universe must be made helpful to others as well as to myself." I care not how busy this man is—the busier the better; in the work room, the shop, or the warehouse he must be a missionary of his faith. Even if he never mention it—which is a pity—yet his life and all his actions are tinged by it, and a silent influence goes out from him, most eloquent in itself. There is all the difference in the world between this man and he who simply attends a Unitarian place of worship, because he likes to have his critical palate tickled by a sermon from an educated stand point. The latter is only in the first stage of religious growth, he has been dissatisfied and is looking for something more acceptable; but you can hardly expect that he can exert the power of one who has made a faith his own. It is so true that the secret that lies at the root of all power and influence is firm faith in your work and in the value of it to mankind. This means enthusiasm, and without it you can neither touch the heart nor the feelings.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY'S EXHIBITION.

We have never yet had great expectations of our countrymen in the realm of the Fine Arts. There is something in our temperament, in the absorption of thought by political and commercial activities, and something, too, in our climate, which seems unfavourable to the enkindlement and sustaining of genius in relation to Art. But though we did not look for eminence we expected improvement, and we are deeply sorry to say that the exhibition of the Academy this year disappoints us grievously. England is great in so many other particulars than Art that we must not be too much humiliated and ashamed to confess our inferiority in that. Still, the time will come, we hope, when we shall add the dulce to the utile and taste to skill.

The members and associates of the Academy have hitherto been accused of a tendency to monopolise wall-space. They have not sinned in that particular this year. They have even been self-denying in the small number and moderate size of their pictures, and have allowed the outsiders to have the Exhibition chiefly to themselves. There are as usual a great number of portraits, and some of these, in respect of drawing and colour, are the best things on the walls. First among painters of this class we place Mr. W. Oulless. He has four pictures, 23, 122, 446, and 1,498. For manly vigour and decision of touch, for watchfulness of characteristic expression and quick seizure and skilful presentation of it when caught, we know of none that quite equal him, not even Millais; for this latter great artist is more marked by delicacy and refinement than by power. He has, however, three portraits of very superior quality in this exhibition: Sir Henry Thompson (127), the little Princess Marie (353), and Cardinal Newman (1,514). All these three manifest some power of touch, as well as purity of tone. Another painter we could mention as approximating very closely indeed to the excellence of Mr. Oulless is Mr. Frank Holl. Every one of his seven portraits on these walls testify to his great abilities. There is not a trace of hesitation or timidity in a single line. As for the other innumerable portraits by various artists in this exhibition, we have no doubt they are the productions of able and accomplished men, but who on this occasion have not been fortunate enough to make their works interesting. The sitters perhaps were in some degree to blame. The artist would fain have them unconstrained and natural, but he cannot always succeed in dispossessing them of that self-consciousness which tends to all sorts of affectations of pose and expression. Landscapes and sea views are not first-rate this year, and in pictures demanding any height of imagination and depth of feeling there is but little manifestation of those qualities. Mr. Joseph Clarke in such pictures as "Waifs and Strays" (151) shows a fine, generous sympathy with that numerous class of our fellow-beings, the ragged, homeless, neglected poor. His pictures have a pathos and Christian sentiment which strongly incline us, though possessing no knowledge of him personally, to think as highly of his character as we do of his work. We trust he will meet with ample encouragement and rich reward. Mr. T. S. Cooper, R.A., is commonly considered very great in cattle-painting; but we cannot say that we like him this year. His cows have exaggerated glare of colour, and seem to us to be defectively drawn. Having recently seen the pictures of Cuyt and the Flemish painters, whose cattle have natural tone of colour, and something even like grace of form and tranquillity of expression, we are the more struck by the unpleasant contrast in these pictures of Mr. Cooper's. He has done better before, and will doubtless do better again. Sir Frederick Leighton is always elegant, refined and classical, but always peculiar. His thought, imagination and taste go back to the Greek and Oriental world of past ages. His mind is far away—not here in English London. We do not at all like his contribution to the proposed decoration of the dome of St. Paul's. Illustrations tions taken from the wild and incongruous imagery of the Book of Revelations are out of place at this period of the nineteenth century, when every thoughtful student knows that these wild visions of the old writer had really no prophetic character, no reference to things that are yet to be. There are some pleasant things among the water colours, but nothing very remarkable. We like Mr. Dobson's "Christmas Carols" as well as anything in this room; nor did we turn away with and prudish feeling from the oil painting by the same artist called the "Golden Age" (200). The figure is utterly nude, but perfectly innocent and lovely. No one could ask that child "Who told thee that thou wast naked?" She is utterly unconscious of it in her happy sweetness and purity. There is very great loveliness in a picture called "Dreamers" (407), by A. Moore. These girls, too, are such as might be supposed to live in a golden age.

Eyes better trained than ours may have discerned merits in pictures that made no impression upon us. It is very likely. However that may be in the present exhibition, whether it be rich or poor in works of excellence, the main thing to be striven for is improvement in the future, and that we trust will be realised.

E. A.

DR. WILLIAMS'S TRUST.—XXXI.

[CONTRIBUTED BY W. D. JEREMY, ESQ.]

182. JOHN BOUCHER, Esq., M.A. (1847-52).—The eloquent and popular minister of the Gravel Pit Chapel, Hackney, during the years 1846-52, and a member of the Presbyterian Board; but his views having undergone a change he renounced his nonconformity in 1852, and entered St. John's College, Cambridge, with the intention of taking Orders in the Church of England. He was soon, however, overtaken by severe ill-health, from which he never fully recovered. He died at Chesterton, near Cambridge, in March, 1878, in his sixtieth year. In a brief obituary of him in the Inquirer it was remarked that so far as was known he never said or wrote a word of bitterness against his former friends and associates.*

183. REV. THOMAS SADLER, Ph.D. (1849-).—Minister of the Rosslyn-hill congregation, Hampstead, since 1847. Author of the "Silent Pastor," "Closet Prayers," &c. Editor of the "Diary, Reminiscences and Correspondence of Henry Crabb Robinson," 3 vols, 1869. A member of the Presbyterian Board (1859-73). On the death of Mr. Towgood Dr. Sadler became "the father of the Trust." He is a member of the Book (or Library) Committee, and of the Schools and Distribution Committees.

184. WILLIAM SMITH, Esq., LL.D. (1851-60).—Editor of the well-known classical dictionaries and other works which bear his name. He was a valuable member of the Glasgow College Committee, taking part regularly in the examination of candidates for scholarships, and his resignation in 1860 was greatly regretted.

185. THOMAS PICKARD WARREN, Esq. (1851-67).—Son of John Warren (No. 103 supra) and nephew of John Raymond Barker (No. 113) and of John Wansley (No. 117), and great nephew of the Rev. Edward Pickard (No. 76), whose sister was married to Francis Warren of London, son of the Rev. John Warren, Minister of the Great Meeting, Coventry. Mr. Warren, who was born in 1789, was educated by the Rev. Eliezer Cogan (No. 139) at Cheshunt, and afterwards at Walthamstow. On leaving school he entered into business in a branch of the silk trade, from which he retired at a comparatively early age, and thenceforth gave up a considerable portion of his time to the management of various trusts and charities in which he took an interest. He was a member, and for many years the treasurer, of the congregation of Little Carterlane Chapel (where his family had attended from its formation), and one of its representatives at the Presbyterian Board for thirty-two years (1835-67). He was one of the managers of the "Widows' Fund" and the "Aged Ministers' Society," and a member of "The New England Company" from 1833 up to the end of his life. He died Jan. 20, 1867, aged seventy-seven years. Mr. Warren married Wilhelmina, daughter of William Taylor, Esq., of Bocking, Essex, and granddaughter of the Rev. Henry Taylor, A. M., sometime rector of Crawley, and vicar of Portsmouth, author of "Ben Mordecai's Apology for Embracing Christianity," and other controversial works of considerable note in their day. His name is introduced here as a representative of the Arian section of the Anglican clergy of the eighteenth century.

186. RICHARD MARTINEAU, Esq. (1852-65).—Of London and Walsingham-le-Willows, near Ipswich. A magistrate for the county of Suffolk. For the greater part of his life Mr. Martineau was an active member of the well-known firm of Messrs. Whitbread and Co., brewers, of which his father had been a partner before him. He was born in London in 1804, educated by Mr. Cogan (No. 139) at Walthamstow (1811-19), and at York College (1819-22). A member of the Presbyterian Board (1843-65). Treasurer at successive periods of the Gravel Pit Chapel, Hackney, Little Carter-lane, and the Rosslyn-hill Chapel, Hampstead; one of the founders of University Hall, Gordon-square; a supporter of University College and Manchester New College, and a warm friend of the London Domestic Mission; but of all charitable institutions hospitals won his chief sympathy. On Dr. Williams's Trust (the general meetings of which as well as those of the Estates and Audit Committees he attended with regularity) his judgment and counsel were of the highest value. He died on the 14th of August, 1865, in his sixty-first year.

187. REV. THOMAS LETHBRIDGE MARSHALL (1853-).—Educated at the Latin School, Boston, U.S., and at Manchester New College (1841-46), minister at Warwick (1846-53), at Hackney (1853-57), and at Brixton (1862-73). Editor of the Inquirer since 1856; a member of the Presbyterian Board since 1853; secretary since 1856. One of the managers of the Widows' Fund and the Aged Ministers' Society.

188. SAMUEL SHARPE, Esq. (1853-57).—A distinguished Egyptologist and Biblical scholar, a munificent friend of higher education, and a zealous promoter of the religious opinions which he held. Author of "History of Egypt" and numerous other works, but his magnum opus was his Translation of Griesbach's text of the New Testament, and of the Hebrew Scriptures. His donations to University College, London, are estimated at £20,000; President of Manchester New College (1876-78), and a constant benefactor of the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen. Mr. Sharpe was proud of his descent through the maternal line from the Rev. Philip Henry. See his account of the Life of Samuel Rogers, 1859. On Dr. Williams's Trust he was a most regular attendant, and for many years after his resignation in 1857 acted as one of the honorary examiners of candidates for scholarships. He died 28th July, 1881, in his eighty-third year.

189. REV. JOHN JAMES TAYLER, B.A. 1853-69).—Son of the Rev. James Tayler (No. 123), Minister at Manchester (1820-53), and at Little Portland-street Chapel, London (1859-60). For twenty-nine years (1840-69) Professor at Manchester New College, which was removed to London in 1852; Principal from 1853 until his death. Author of "A Retrospect of the Religious Life in England," 1845; "An Attempt to Ascertain the Character of the Fourth Gospel," 1867, &c. Volume of Discourses, and other works. He died 28th May, 1869.

(To be continued.)

Occasional Notes.

A CLERICAL correspondent of the Guardian writing from South Africa, warns the readers of that paper against the employment of clergy who have accepted a license from Bishop Colenso, or have been ordained by him without previously requiring of them distinct proof that they have made their submission and received absolution from the Bishop of Maritzburg—the High Church rival of Bishop Colenso. See how these Churchmen love one another!

The June Century prints an unpublished poem by Longfellow, consisting of a single verse, which the editor recognised above a rustic well at Shanklin, Isle of Wight.

O traveller stay thy weary feet,
Drink of this fountain cool and sweet.
It flows for rich and poor the same.
Then go thy way, remembering still,
The way-side well beneath the hill,
The cup of water in his name.

WE cut the following notice from the Christian Register of Boston, U.S.:—"Lend-a-hand Chapel, 2169 Washington-street: Sermon every Sunday evening at 7.30 o'clock, by the pastor, Rev. John Williams. Temperance meeting every Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. Visitors cordially invited." "Lend-a-hand Chapel" does not strike us as a very felicitous name, but that is a matter of taste. The Rev. John Williams here mentioned is the late well-known minister of Christchurch, Nottingham.

WE learn from the New York Independent that Miss Anne Whitney, of Boston, U.S., has made a very successful statue of Harriet Martineau, if the critics of the conservative old city may be credited, and they are a pretty sound set of critics. The cast has been exhibited, and represents Miss Martineau sitting in a straight-backed garden-chair. She has a manuscript on her lap, upon which her hands are crossed naturally. The expression of the face indicates deep meditation. The statue is said to be a good likeness, though somewhat idealised. It is to be executed in marble, and will cost, when finished, something like 12,000 dollars, all of which has been subscribed by women.

OUR valued friend Miss Humphreys has lately been contributing to All the Year Round a series of very interesting and instructive papers on such subjects as "A Leicester October Cheese Fair," "In the Phrase of Queen Anne," a pleasant account of "familiar phrases" in the "methodical French grammar of M. Boyer, of French dictionary celebrity;" and "Buy a Broom," an account of the broom manufacture at Eaton. Miss Humphreys's papers are always characterised by considerable descriptive power, and a pleasant vein of humour.

THE article on "The Poor in our Great Cities" in last week's Inquirer contained some mistakes of the press, obvious enough, however, to the reader; but the writer's statement as to the £450,000 estimated to be spent in the East of London for "drink" is open to misconception in so far as regards the cost of education. It is evident that that vast amount would very much more than pay the whole of that cost, even at ninepence per week each scholar. What the writer meant to convey was that the proportion of that sum expended by families having children of school age would, if saved by their self-denial, be amply sufficient to pay the ninepence per week, in other words, would give Mr. Bartley his penny out of each sixpence now expended on drink, to supply the educational wants of the square mile of East London. In any case, no doubt, there would remain a large number of children to provide for, owing to the poverty of their parents.—C. L. C.

SOME of our readers will see with great amusement the following paragraph extracted from Dr. Sexton's "Shield of Faith":—"The officers and faculty of the 'American Anthropological University,' St. Louis, have conferred the degree of 'Doctor of Divinity' upon the Rev. F. R. Young, the assistant editor of this paper. This honour came to our friend perfectly unexpectedly to him, and without any solicitation, direct or indirect, on his part." "Dr." Frederick Rowland Young's religious services at Camden Town, which were so extensively advertised some months ago, have come to an end, and the Rev. Doctor is open to engagements "in any evangelical pulpit," as we hear from the same paper, where also we read:—"Dr. Rowland Young, at the request of the deacons, will conduct the Thursday evening services at the Rev. J. Baldwin Brown's Church, Brixton-road, during the months of June and July. He supplied Mr. Brown's pulpit at that gentleman's personal request, on April 23."

* When commencing my studies at the University of Glasgow in 1845 I formed the acquaintance of Mr. Boucher, who was then the Unitarian minister there, and found in him a most genial friend. I called to see him at Hackney in 1851, and well remember a casual remark he made denoting dissatisfaction with the drift of Unitarian thought. "Religion," he said, "is a delicate plant. If you touch it, you kill it. Unitarians dissect it, and expect it to live." I replied that it had happened to me some years previously to be present at a large religious gathering at which the preacher prefaced his prayer by explaining the use of that part of the service; and it struck me at the time (although I was but a youth) that the earnest prayer which followed would have been far better without the introductory "philosophy." Mr. Boucher then related with inimitable humour the laconic advice given him by an ingenious and most excellent friend at Glasgow (whom I knew) on leaving for London: "Energy! my boy, energy! but aye be phoe-lo-so-phical."—W. D. J.

GARIBALDI died with the window of his room wide open, while the sun was setting behind Corsica. Before the last agony began, a bird alighted, twittering on the windowsill. Garibaldi saw it, and stammered, "Quanto e allegro" ("How joyful it is.") These were his last words.

TO-MORROW is Hospital Sunday, when the annual collections will be made in the various churches and chapels of the metropolis in aid of the hospitals and dispensaries. These institutions number about 145, and the income necessary to support them amounts to more than £500,000. The collections have progressively increased since the establishment of the fund, about ten years ago, but not in proportion to the marvellous increase of the population, or the growing number of the sick and the suffering. After making all abatements that may be required by a searching criticism no institutions are on the whole better managed or do a larger amount of good than our hospitals and dispensaries, although we are among that class of social economists who would have less eleemosynary charity and more of the provident and self-helpful spirit. Our institutions "supported by voluntary contributions" are the admiration of all our foreign visitors and the glory of our country, and there is no form of charity which is less open to abuse than our hospitals, or which makes a stronger appeal to universal human sympathies. Our friends will, no doubt, do their duty and respond with accustomed liberality to the appeals which will be made to them to-morrow. The hospital fund is admirably and most impartially administered by a Council comprising representatives of all the religious denominations, including our own, working together with the utmost harmony in the cause of universal charity.

THE Duke of Argyll has introduced into the House of Lords a Bill relating to Parliamentary oaths. The proposal is that, if a peer or a member of Parliament writes that he has a conscientious objection to the form of the oath, or that the taking of an oath would have no binding effect on his conscience, he may make and subscribe a solemn affirmation. This affirmation would be in the form of the present oath, except that the words "solemnly, sincerely, and truly declare and affirm" would be substituted for the word "swear," and the words "So help me God" would be omitted.

THE address of the Moderator, Professor Milligan, at the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland last week, shows that some of the most enlightened divines along the border still cling to that fascinating vision of Comprehension which is given up as hopeless by Liberal thinkers in other parts of the country. Professor Milligan is held in high esteem both outside and inside his own communion as a fair-minded man, and being a philosopher by profession, he does not treat his subject in a one-sided fashion as a partisan controversialist. He admitted frankly that if the State had to face the subject of establishment now for the first time it would not endow any sect in Scotland. But he argued that the Church's patrimony having been formed by the gifts of men who designed them for spiritual purposes, a particular government is no more entitled to apply them to secular uses than it would be entitled to lay its hand on any other trust funds, and apply them to other objects than those for which they were expressly destined. Still, however, the difficulty remained that these bequests were made for the people, and the people are not enjoying them. Well, Professor Milligan pleads, let us try our hand, in an earnest and large-hearted way, at reconstruction. Are there insuperable difficulties lying in the way of that consummation? He thinks not. Even the Voluntary United Presbyterians accept endowments when coming in the shape of legacies from friends, and why should not they take the benefits of bequests made freely to the Church long ago? As for the Free Church, there was no indisposition to make concessions to it, if it could only be persuaded to return. And as the picture of a re-united communion grew under the hand of the Moderator, he asked, Why should not we even embrace the Scottish Episcopal Church in one great comprehensive confederation?

HINDOOISM, MAHOMEDANISM, AND CHRISTIANITY.—A lecture was delivered on Wednesday week before the University of Oxford, by Professor Monier Williams on the three principal religions now confronting each other in the world. Buddhism, he contended, was not entitled to be called a religion, for it recognised no God and no immortal soul. It was our duty to examine non-Christian systems reverently and impartially, and on their best side as well as on their worst. Christianity was the perfect embodiment of eternal truth, fragments of which were scattered through other systems. There was more common ground between Hindooism and Christianity than between Islam and Christianity. All three religions asserted the unity of God. According to Islam God was absolutely one, and had never become incarnate. According to Hindooism the one God manifested Himself in innumerable incarnations and visible forms. The Koran and the Veda claimed to be the actual words of God. They were objective revelations, and had no subjectivity like the Christian's Sacred Scriptures. The feeling after truth in Hindooism was remarkably displayed in its doctrine of triple manifestations of the Godhead. The Indian's daily prayer from the Rig-veda might be used by Christians, if "Sun of Righteousness" were substituted for "Sun." Hindooism has no one special founder, and Mahomet denied that he was the founder of Islam. His mission was to bring back the people of Asia to the true Monotheistic creed, which he affirmed had existed since Abraham—the first Moslem. Yet Islam certainly centered in Mahomet. His career was divided into two halves. At Mecca he was the earnest religious teacher and enthusiast. At Medina he was far more, he was military leader, statesman, and king. The Koran grew like patchwork, piece after piece, botch after botch; its teaching expanded in response to the needs of the mighty forces set in action by Mahomet. The Talmud and the spurious gospels formed the soil out of which the tangle of later doctrine ramified. The heaviest charge against Mahomet was that he encouraged by precept and example sexual license and a low estimate of women. This was a canker ever eating into Moslem home life and spreading to Moslem national life. It was true that Islam was once the soul of progress, but having reached a certain point it appeared to lapse backwards, whereas the Christian's career was ever onwards. In some parts of India Mahomet and Ali received divine honours, and the lowest classes of Hindoos were occasionally to be found worshipping at Musselman shrines, as Musselmans were at Hindoo shrines. The two religions now co-operated harmoniously. Temples and mosques were reared side by side. Could no treaty of peace be adjusted between Islam and Christianity? The lecturer thought not. A vast chasm separated the two systems. A Trinitarian Christian would have less difficulty in coming to terms with Hindooism, notwithstanding its repulsive idolatry and its doctrine of soul-transmigration, than with Mahomedanism. Christians could never have fellowship with a religion which regarded the doctrine of Christ's association with God the Father as a blasphemous fable, and offered its adherents a paradise more material and carnal than that from which their first parents were expelled.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Nervous Debility.—No part of the human machine requires more watching than the nervous system—upon it hangs health and life itself. These Pills are the best regulators and strengtheners of the nerves, and the safest general purifiers. Nausea, headache, giddiness, numbness, and mental apathy yield to them. They despatch in a summary manner those distressing dyspeptic symptoms, stomachic pains, fulness at the pit of the stomach, abdominal distension, and overcome both capricious appetites and confined bowels—the commonly accompanying signs of defective or deranged nervous power. Holloway's Pills are particularly recommended to persons of studious and sedentary habits, who gradually sink into a nervous and debilitated state, unless some such restorative be occasionally taken.

Reviews.

Progress. By James Platt. London: Simpkin, Marshall and Co. 1882.

The best parts of this book and of previous books by the same author consist of quotations and borrowings. If there is not much originality shown in such a proceeding there is at any rate, in this volume, judgment and taste. The borrowings are all good, and taken from first-class minds in their respective departments of thought. But though Mr. Platt is chiefly a borrower, he is by no means feeble in thinking power of his own. With fine, healthy, active natural talents he might, with a little care, produce a book of deep and lasting influence, and write like one "having authority," and not as an ordinary scribe, if he would only slacken speed a little, give himself time to reconsider as well as to consider his subject, and to digest inwardly what he has read, marked, and learned. So long as he confines himself to strictly commercial matters the reader of his pages finds that he is dealing with a very competent and experienced man; but, unfortunately, our friend has a didactic habit and a tendency to give advice with the air of one specially called upon to do so, and hence a tendency to go beyond the range of his specialities and to wander a little way into realms of natural and moral philosophy, and even to touch on the border lines of Religion. When he does this he shows the insufficiency of his present amount of knowledge and thought, though that is by no means despicable. There is nothing false and wrong in that which he inculcates and advises; but it has all been said before by other writers with more depth, and with far more pith and concentrateness of expression. Truisms and vague generalities are the characteristics of his writing when he deviates from his proper line. His allusions to religion are slight and brief, and not marked by any hostility to the faiths of other people; but we infer from one or two expressions that he himself has by no means a vivid assurance of life hereafter. He seems to think that human hopes and aspirations in that direction have a somewhat unhealthy tendency to detach thought, energy and desire from the necessary labour and obvious duties of the present life. For our own parts, we have no word of approval for those who force their minds into rapt expectations of heaven, and repudiate the world and its concerns; and we hold it to be a sin in any man to shirk the responsibilities and neglect the duties of the present hours; but at the same time we think that, taking into view the fragmentary, incomplete, and unfinished state of all human endeavours and their results, the finest natures have been irresistibly led to the conclusion that there must be supplement and continuation of life in some higher sphere, where Thought shall grow brighter with light, Affection grow warmer with Love, and Activity become wider in scope and better in aim and issue. And so far from this conviction having a tendency to make men supine in the performance of mundane duties, it has had in innumerable instances just the opposite effect. In general we think it will be found that no men and women have worked more strenuously for the good of humanity in this world than those who have been animated by belief in another.

The Irish Land Act comes in for a large share of our author's denunciations, as it did before, if we remember rightly, in some of his preceding books. We concur in the general principle that it is not well for a State to be too paternal and a people to be governed too much. Contracts and agreements between man and man, whether referring to rent or other things, are, in general, better formed and better carried out without any legislative meddling, and when left to the operation of ordinary human intelligence, human honour, and human perceptions of self-interest and mutual advantage. But it now and then happens that contracts are entered into with all the sagacity and astuteness on one side, and nothing but ignorance, incapacity, and want of foresight on the other. All the axioms of political economy need in practical life and the actual intercourse of men to be brought into union with the moral sentiments, so that the one may impregnate the other. But moral sentiments are things far too subtle and delicate to be dealt with by Parliaments and Courts of Law. Those agencies are quite unfit for such a work.

Society, however, requires for its peace, order and security, that all the transactions between man and man should be not only "legal" but just, not only formal and exact according to "the bond," but fair, considerate, and humane according to the higher requirements of moral feeling. The subtle and beautiful elements of true justice which Parliaments can never effectually make or control should, in practical life, mingle with those imperfect forms of justice which Parliaments do originate and can control. If this blending and mingling be neglected by society there ensues sooner or later violence and rebellion. The laws of political economy having been left to work without their proper accompaniments of the moral sentiments to modify and meliorate their action, at last lose their natural beneficence; they engender irritation instead of content, and lead to political disorder so serious that the Government itself is obliged to intervene and form courts for the remodelling of contracts upon principles that ought voluntarily to have been adopted in the first instance by those who formed them. Government intervention is bad as a precedent, very sad and regrettable; for Parliaments, however excellent may be their intentions, never possess all the knowledge which is necessary to manage these delicate matters well. If men in their contracts and agreements will of their own accord act considerably and equitably one to another, there will be no need of legislative intervention. The less of it the better. But if men will not so act, and allow discontent to inflame into passion, Government itself is ultimately obliged by political necessity to make an endeavour to force the wanting moral elements into the activity of the legal ones and to do by the awkward and irritating agency of an Act of Parliament that which should have been quietly, privately, and voluntarily done from a feeling of natural equity or Christian duty.

If all the mercantile information and sound advice on business management in this volume could be separated from its other contents it would form one of the most valuable little manuals of the kind we have ever seen; for the writer is a sound free trader, with a clear perception of all protection fallacies, however speciously disguised. He will have nothing to do with special "interests" when they are opposed to the general welfare. He writes like a man of large experience, of well-tested principles and of honourable feeling. There is a good deal in this little volume that is extraneous, unnecessary, and not pleasing; but that is more or less the case with every book, and the reader who is generously intent to pick out from a volume only that which is good may certainly find enough of it here to reward him for his pains.

E. A.

The Contemporary Review. Strahan and Co.
The Nineteenth Century. Kegan Paul and Co.

This month we place the Contemporary first in point of both variety and interest.

Ireland occupies the most prominent place in both the Reviews; there are no less than three articles in each bearing on the great question of the day. The Contemporary opens with two articles written from the Home Rule point of view, which show that this aspect of the controversy of ages is rapidly coming into the range of what is called "practical politics." The first is "Self-Government for Ireland," by G. B. Finch; the second is "Ireland Under the Legislative Union," by W. J. O'Neill Daunt. Both give a sad picture of English misgovernment and the failure of our statesmen to comprehend the real wants of Ireland, and both declare that the radical disease of Ireland is the want of a domestic legislature in harmony with the national sentiment. What the majority of the people really want is the abolition of landlordism, and that cannot be done without an enormous pecuniary compensation. And as regards a local legislature it seems obviously just that Ireland should be treated as a colony with its own government and its own laws, or made as integral a part of the British Empire as Wales or Yorkshire. The present system only perpetuates memories of past wrongs. There is also an instructive article on "Judicial Rents," by

W. S. Seton-Karr, whose main object it is to show that the relation of Zemindar and Ryot, or landlord and tenant in Bengal, bears a fair analogy to that which is attempted to be set up in Ireland, and that the recovery of Irish rents by judicial process should be fenced and protected by all the safeguards found imperative in India during nearly a century of administration devoted to a thorough examination of the great question of rents, revenue and the ownership of the soil. In the Nineteenth Century we have two articles under the common heading "Home Rule," by the Marquis of Blandford and by Justin McCarthy, M.P., and both are designed to break down the prevailing prejudice that Home Rule is a theory which is not even to be allowed a hearing. The Marquis of Blandford maintains that "the landed class in Ireland have been from time immemorial the bane of the country, and have shown themselves incapable of identifying themselves in any way with the Irish people." He is in favour of a far more extended form of local government, and adds that, pending the purchase of their interest, the landlords would do well to consider the present Land Act as the charter of their liberties, instead of characterising it as an act of spoliation. Mr. Justin McCarthy makes it quite clear what the Home Rulers really want, and at the same time points out that the interests of Ireland are not necessarily divided from those of England in the matter of Imperial taxation, or of postal arrangements, or of colonial and foreign policy, or even of tariffs and commercial treaties. There is also a long article on "Ireland," by Earl Grey, who characteristically criticises the policy of both the great parties in the State, and, in accordance with his whig principles and traditions, strongly objects to the Coercion Act, and condemns the policy of punishing men for being suspected. Earl Grey warmly censures the whole Irish policy of the Government, and of Mr. Gladstone in particular, and impartially objects to every proposition from every quarter, without suggesting any policy of his own, except that "the one great need of Ireland at the present moment is to re-establish security and the reign of law." This is a simple platitude, but unfortunately the noble writer does not suggest how it can be carried into effect, so that his paper hardly comes within the range of "practical politics."

The other articles on politics in the Nineteenth Century are "Peel and Cobden," a very interesting sketch of two great men of kindred genius, by Professor Goldwin Smith; "The Birmingham Caucus," a not very intelligent denunciation by the renegade Liberal, Mr. W. T. Marriott, M.P., of the admirable local organisation created by Mr. Chamberlain and his friends; "The Allies: A Political Dialogue," written from the Conservative point of view, by H. D. Trail; and "The Friends of the Farmer," in which J. Woulfe Flanagan reviews recent works on the Land Question by Mr. Kay, Mr. Caird, Mr. G. C. Brodick, M. de Lavergne and Arthur Arnold, M.P., defending the existing English system, and reasoning, inconclusively as we think, against peasant ownership, while admitting some of its brilliant triumphs.

Theology is not strongly represented in either Review this month. In the Contemporary the principal article is the second part of the valuable treatise on "The Philosophy of Religion," by Dr. A. M. Fairbairn, the president-elect of the Congregational Union, who discusses the religious philosophy of Schelling and Hegel with singular acuteness and learning. Mr. Francis Peck also has an essay on "Science and Revelation," which cannot be regarded as a valuable contribution to the subject, inasmuch as he evidently knows but little of science, and regards Scripture-revelation as an infallible authority. If in any respect it comes into conflict with the ascertained conclusions of science, it is, he says, not the sacred writings but our own views of them that are wrong and have to be modified. This is mere trifling with a momentous subject. The remaining articles in the Contemporary are, "The Boundaries of Astronomy," in which Professor Robert S. Ball traces some parts of the boundary line which divides the truths established in astronomy from those parts of the science which must be regarded as more or less hypothetical; "Notes on the Royal Academy Exhibition," written in a somewhat caustic tone by Harry Quilter; "Henri Heine," a delightful "family portrait" by Nina H. Kennard, founded on a little work recently published by the poet's grand-niece, the Princess Della Rocca; "Newton and Darwin," in which R. A. Proctor shows that the work of Darwin is akin to that of Newton, in that it extends indefinitely our conception of the range of natural laws; "The Revival of Italian Industry," a gratifying report of material and intellectual progress in the peninsula, by Professor Leoni Levi; and, finally, "Alter Orbis," by Edward A. Freeman, D.C.L. This last article is directed against the Channel Tunnel scheme. Mr. Freeman maintaining that the insular character of Britain is its greatness as a separate world lying outside the world of the Continent. With this article should be read the "Three Sonnets" immediately preceding, by Alfred Austin, "written in mid-channel," which are very spirited and patriotic. The preponderance of intelligent opinion and of more or less reasonable sentiment is certainly against the Channel scheme.

In the Nineteenth Century there are but three papers besides those above noticed; "The Tower of London," an historical and architectural sketch by Algernon B. Mitford; "Shakespearean Criticism," one of Walter Prollock's delightful essays; and "Thought-Reading," a joint contribution by Professor Barrett, Edmund Gurney, and F. W. H. Myers, with a postscript by the editor, all which, with all due respect to these accomplished writers, seems to us to be the apotheosis of—humbly.

It will be seen that the Contemporary is gaining the start of its powerful rival.

Short Notices.

The Epoch of Reform 1830-1850. By Justin McCarthy, M.P., Author of "A History of Our Own Times." Longmans, 1882.

This is one of the most valuable books of that very instructive series "Epochs of Modern History," because the history of the preceding generation is often less known to the youth of the present age than the history of preceding centuries, which has been more or less closely studied at school and college. The object of the little work, which is written in the attractive style of the author's "History of Our Own Times," is to give a clear and concise account of the changes in our political system, from the introduction of Lord Grey's first Reform Bill to the death of Sir Robert Peel. That epoch of reform encloses a group of constitutional changes so important as to entitle it to a distinct place in the history of England. Lord Grey's Reform Bill established the basis of a popular suffrage, gave representation to the great industrial towns, and abolished many old-standing anomalies and sources of corruption. The tithe system was brought to an end in Ireland. Slavery was banished from our colonies for ever. The working of women and children in mines and factories was placed under wholesome regulation. The foundation of a system of national education was laid. Our penal code was made human and reasonable. The corn laws were repealed. These changes, and others hardly less important, are the birth of that marvellous period of political activity. Moreover, during this epoch of Reform the relations of the Sovereign to Parliament, and of Parliament to the people, were established on a well-defined and satisfactory principle. The manner in which all these changes were brought about is a lesson of the deepest political interest to every student. The author has been especially anxious to show how the policy which opens the way to reform is the true antidote to the spirit of revolution, and how our English Statesmen had learnt the wisdom, then almost unknown on the Continent, of yielding in time to the clear expression of public opinion, even when it ran counter to deeply-rooted class prejudices and strong political convictions. The author has given a clear picture of the leading men on both sides during this stirring epoch of reform. He justly reminds us that the more vivid an impression we can form of the appearance, the bearing and the personal peculiarities of a Statesman, the more likely shall we be to understand the part he has taken in public affairs, and the purposes and principles which inspired him. No period of equal length in English history includes a greater number of remarkable figures than the statesmen, orators, and politicians from Lord Grey, Lord John Russell, and O'Connell, to Sir Robert Peel, Lord Palmerston and Mr. Cobden.

What I Saw in Norway. (Manchester: Johnson and Rawson. 1882.)—We have read with so much interest two former books by the author of this little work, describing his Continental holidays, that we were quite prepared to give a cordial reception to his account of a month's visit to Norway. The holiday traveller is the Rev. W. Harrison, Unitarian minister of Glossop, who gives so pleasant an account of his cheap Norwegian tour last summer that the present writer quite longed to be one of the party. He goes over ground which is still fresher, though it is rapidly losing its novelty, than the ordinary Continental tour, and his little book is really quite a valuable little guide for that portion of Norway he describes. There is a pleasant vein of humour throughout his narrative, and he is evidently one of those model travellers who are disposed to make the best of everything and to look upon the favourable side of the men and customs of other countries. His journey cost him just £25, and for that moderate expenditure he had a month's holiday of almost unalloyed enjoyment.

The Life of Charles Darwin. With British Opinions on Evolution. (London: G. W. Bacon.)—Mr. Bacon, the well-known publisher in the Strand, has published in a pamphlet form the Times memoir of Darwin, together with an account of the funeral, and in Memorial articles from various papers, metropolitan, provincial, and foreign, making altogether a compendious account of the great naturalist, and the principal features of his scientific teaching. It is remarkable that while Darwin from the first has been known and studied by the cultured few, it was only on occasion of his death that the attention of the great mass of the public was drawn to his great work, and only then that the conviction was brought home to the whole nation that one of the greatest men of this century had been living a quiet student-life in our midst. Our prophets are never duly honoured until they have passed away.

Elements of Morality in Easy Lessons, for Home and School Teaching. By Mrs. Charles Bray. (London, Longmans, Green, and Co. 1882.)—We are able to give this book very high commendation. It is happily free from that confusion of thought as to the true basis of morals which characterises so many attempts of the same kind; and, in a series of thirty-one short lessons, overflowing with bright, sparkling suggestion, it covers well nigh the whole ground of conduct, from the first early impulses of dawning consciousness to a reverent appreciation of our union with the unseen. It must prove exceedingly valuable to both school teachers and parents.

Cookery and Housekeeping; a Manual of Domestic Economy for Large and Small Families.—By Mrs. Henry Reeve.—Longman, 1882.—The writer, who bears a name well-known to most of our readers, has for many years given her attention to those branches of domestic economy which deal with the food of households on a moderate scale, where importance is attached to good cookery and to great variety of dishes. She now gives the results of her long experience to the public in a very attractive form. It is one of the best books of the kind we know for households of the well-to-do class, but is not adapted for families who are obliged to study economy. There are several full page coloured illustrations, and a large number of wood-cuts.

Good Words brings to a close, we are happy to say, Mrs. Oliphant's story "Lady Jane," the feeblest and most ineffective which she has ever written, in which there is not a single character that interests us, the hero being a muf and the heroine a noodle. There are continuations of two far more effective tales, "Kept in the Dark," by Anthony Trollope, with illustrations by Millais, and "The Golden Shaft," by C. Gibbon. There is the second part of Mr. Joseph Thomson's "Adventures on the Rovuma," and of Dr. W. F. Stevenson's "Bible Truths and Eastern Ways." The bold meteorologist Clement L. Wragge gives an interesting illustrated chapter of "Watching the Weather on Ben Nevis," and Miss E. J. Whately has a fine sketch of the pathetic career of "Frederick Chapin," with a life-like portrait of the great musician. Two remaining articles will probably attract more attention than all the others, Bret Harte's personal reminiscences of "Longfellow" in a brief interview twelve years ago; and the first of Professor Robertson Smith's papers on "The Place of the Old Testament in the Christian Church," which seems to be a popular version of the work not long ago reviewed in these columns.

The Day of Rest brings to a conclusion Hesba Stretton's story "The Lord's Pursebearers."

Among other contributions are an interesting account of an expedition "To the North Cape," by the Rev. J. F. Buckler; "An Incident in the Life of John Barker," by Reuben Ashe; and the always charming "Children's Pages," by "Prudentia." There is so little difference between "The Day of Rest" and "The Sunday Magazine" that we are not at all surprised to learn that they are in future to be incorporated in one; and we should be thankful if a good many other magazines could be merged into one another in the same way. Both are doing a good work in supplying healthy literary food for Sunday reading, characterised by a fervent religious spirit, entirely free from bigotry and exclusiveness.

The Journal of the National Indian Association has for its principal feature this month the important lecture on "Female Education in Bengal," by Pundit Shivanalt Shastri, who gives some valuable suggestions in the direction of reform. Other articles are "Snakes and Snake Charmers in India," a review of "Vernacular Scientific Books," and "Female Education in Mysore."

We have received from Messrs. Cassell, in addition to the magazines noticed last week:—

The Family Physician, Part XXIX.

Cassell's Illustrated Universal History, Part IX.

The New Testament Commentary for English Readers, edited by Bishop Ellicott, Part XXVII.

The Bible Educator, edited by Dean Plumptre, Part III.

We have received from Messrs. Longman Realities of Irish Life, a cheap reprint in the Sunbeam Series of the graphic work by W. Steuart Trench, which made so strong an impression on its publication many years ago, and has painful interest when read, in connection with the present crisis; and The New Testament, Part I., of an exact reproduction of a richly illustrated work which was published many years ago at a very high price and was greatly appreciated for its artistic beauty.

Literary Notes.

MR. J. A. DOYLE, Fellow of All Souls' College, Oxford, is engaged upon a work treating of "The English in America," with special reference to the States of Virginia, Maryland, and the Carolinas.

The Century magazine for June contains an unpublished essay by Cardinal Newman on "The Inspiration of the Bible," together with a portrait of the author for a frontispiece.

An examination for four open scholarships at University College School will be held on July 4 and following days.

The proposed memorial to the late Mr. Darwin is not to be a portrait, but the committee contemplate a bust, or, if possible, a statue.

The Academy says that Emerson has left a large store of unpublished papers: Of these it is understood that his correspondence with Carlyle will be the first published. It covers a period of nearly forty years. A life of Emerson, by Mr. J. Eliot Cabot, who is described by the Literary World as his literary executor, may also be expected in due season.

MR. JOHN C. FRANCIS, the sole surviving son of Mr. John Francis, has succeeded his father as publisher of the Athenaeum and Notes and Queries.

The Athenaeum says that the ancestors of the poet Longfellow were originally settled in Yorkshire. The local papers say that in a sale which has just taken place at Bradford there was an old chest from a farmhouse at Ilkley, which upon its centre panel bore the following inscription:—"Jon Longfellow and Mary Rogers was married ye tenth daye off April, Anno Dm. 1664."

NATURE is publishing from week to week a valuable series of articles on "The Life and Work of Charles Darwin," under the superintendence of Mr. Romanes. It states that a committee has been formed of gentlemen of the highest influence, comprising the leading foreign ministers, the two archbishops, and the best known names in all ranks and professions, for the purpose of establishing a fund associated with Mr. Darwin's name, the proceeds of which will be devoted to the furtherance of biological science.

MR. J. W. MACKAIL, lecturer at Balliol, has printed privately some specimens of his forthcoming prose translation of the "Æneid." Mr. Mackail's object is to produce a readable translation that shall be strictly literal, and it seems likely, judging from the printed specimens, that he may possibly be successful in his difficult undertaking.

A NEW objection to the want of an international copyright between England and America has been felt by the editors of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," who have lately experienced some difficulty in securing the literary assistance of American authors, owing to the reprinting of that work by a Philadelphia publishing house, who, not content with reproducing the English contributions, have pirated the American articles as well.

THE South London Free Library—the only one in South London—is for a time closed, as a reply to the authorities of Lambeth, who have demanded payment of rates by the library, which, it is contended, is exempt by an Act of Parliament. The Library has been for four years supported chiefly by non-local subscriptions.

MISS MARY ROBINSON has written for Harper's Magazine an article on the career of Dante G. Rossetti. Miss Robinson has had the advantage of consulting Dante Rossetti's brother with regard to the biographical facts of which her summary may thus be regarded as an authentic record within the limits of its range.

MR. MONCURE D. CONWAY is engaged on a work embodying recollections of Emerson and his friends at Concord. The volume, which will be entitled "Concordia," and illustrated, relates especially to the time when Thoreau and Hawthorne were living in the village. Mr. Conway will also give the result of his studies of Emerson's works and observations of his influence as a religious teacher on American life and thought.

A LONGFELLOW MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION has been established at Boston, Massachusetts, to erect a public memorial to the poet near his home at Cambridge in the same State. In their appeal to the public the committee state that their aim is to testify to future generations the tender respect in which the pure and gentle life of Longfellow was held by his contemporaries.

AGED MINISTERS' SOCIETY.—The anniversary meeting of the Society for the Relief of Aged and Infirm Protestant Dissenting Ministers was held at 56, Old Bailey, on May 30. The society was formed in 1818, to give assistance to pastors who, when compelled by age and other infirmities to resign their office, are left without adequate means of support. Sixty cases of this kind have been aided during the past year, the grants to which have amounted to £607. More than £27,000 have been thus distributed since the formation of the society. The committee would be glad to extend their efforts where a little additional relief would diffuse more gratitude and joy in many hearts and homes. Philip Cadby, Esq., St. Peter's-square, Hammer-smith, is the treasurer, and the Rev. E. Rogers, of No. 2, The Villas, South Norwood Hill, is the secretary. Among the Presbyterian managers are the Revs. Dr. Sadler and T. L. Marshall, and Messrs F. Nettlefold and John Warren.

NEWNHAM COLLEGE.—The Vice-Principalship of Newnham College, with the charge of the north hall, which will be resigned by Mrs. Henry Sidgwick in October next, has been offered to, and accepted by, Miss Helen Gladstone. The Council of Newnham College will award, on the results of the higher local examination, in June, 1883, three scholarships of £50 for two years, given respectively by the Companies of the Clothworkers, the Drapers, and the Goldsmiths, and the Cobden Scholarship of £50 for two years, given by Mrs. Stephen Winkworth. These scholarships will be continued for a third year to promising students preparing for Tripos examinations. The council will also award one or more scholarships of £35 for one year, open only to candidates who have not commenced residence. Mr. Stephen Winkworth has recently given to Newnham College a scholarship of £50 for three years, which will probably be awarded, in addition to the scholarships already announced for this year.

THE REVISED VERSION OF THE BIBLE IN GERMANY.—The Committee appointed in 1863, at Eisenach, for the revision of Luther's translation of the Bible, has held its last meeting at Halle, and there is every prospect that the Revised Version will soon appear. Out of the thirty original revisers, fourteen only remain, sixteen having died since the work began. No alteration of Luther's translation has been admitted unless sanctioned by two-thirds of the Committee. The next step will be the publication of the text, as now revised, in order to submit it to the judgment of the theological faculties in the Universities, and to the criticisms of scholars, as well as to the public at large. After their remarks have been received and considered, which may take two or three years more, the new version will be published and recommended for adoption to all Protestant churches in Germany.

Our Contemporaries.

MODERN JEWISH LITERATURE.

The Jewish Chronicle, referring to "the outburst of Jewish literature among Christian Hebraists that has characterised the past ten years," writes:—

Since the time of Lightfoot, Selden and Spencer, England has never possessed so many men of such acquirements in Rabbinical literature, and the two flourishing epochs may probably be traced to a similar cause. As it was after the preparation for the Authorised Version of 1611 that the earlier school arose, so we may conjecture that the later scholars owe their interest in Hebrew studies to the revision of that version which has now been going on since 1871. It is at any rate to this fact that we can trace the predominant care for Biblical exegesis and Hebrew grammar that has been displayed by the Oxford school. It is, however, to be hoped that the movement will lead, as in the case of Lightfoot and Selden, to a renewed investigation of Jewish law as a development of Biblical legislation. There is one point of difference between the two epochs which marks a great advance since the seventeenth. Saving some acquaintance of Hugh Broughton, the master of Lightfoot, with Jewish Rabbis of the Continent, the earlier school were unconnected with the leading streams of Jewish tradition. Nowadays, on the other hand, we have to trace to the influence of two Jewish scholars the thorough scholarship which characterises the modern English representatives of Jewish learning. Dr. Neubauer, at Oxford, and Dr. Schiller Szmieszy, at Cambridge, have been the motive causes of the new movement, and, if Englishmen of other creeds have shown but little appreciation of the fact, it should be the more heartily recognised by English Jews. We regret that we cannot as yet trace a native school of Jewish Hebraists to the indefatigable exertions of Dr. Friedländer, a worthy third in the triumvirate of Jewish scholarship in England.

OLD TESTAMENT CRITICISM.

The Athenæum, reviewing Professor Robertson Smith's new work on the Prophets of Israel, writes:—

The criticism of the Old Testament is at present in a transition state. Unlike that of the New, which is pretty well settled in the opinion of the best scholars, the discussion of the Jewish records has not resulted in conclusions which competent critics can agree in accepting. Possibly a few years may witness a different state of opinion, but that is by no means certain. When we look at the various theories which have been broached—the speculations of Von Bohlen and George respecting the Pentateuch and the counter current set in motion by Tuch and others; the sweeping criticism initiated by Graf, which has been carried forward by eager disciples and is now predominant—it is impossible to believe that opinion has settled down on a permanent basis. There exist in many quarters a craving for new views, a curious search for hidden ideas, a love of microscopic analysis or of fine distinctions, which prompt enthusiastic inquirers to put forth conceptions fresh and startling, though they be crude or untenable. Young German scholars are peculiarly liable to this temptation, and even English ones are apt to yield to it. In the present state of knowledge regarding the books composing the Jewish Bible, their text, their times, their genesis, their editing, their interpretation, a critic is bound to be cautious. The last word about them has not been said. Inquiry is still in progress and may lead to some results contrary to those which are popular. If scholars are divided even at the present time, they may be much more so by-and-by, when new men rise up to dispute the ground on which various critics have confidently posted themselves.

The Spectator, in a review of the same work, writes:—

Like revolutions generally, the critical revolution is busily engaged in devouring its own children. Already those who were in the van a dozen years ago are superseded and out of date. Such names as Ewald, Schrader, and Dillman have become the Girondins of a new advance, which has found its Robespierre in Wellhausen. Already there are signs of the advent of a critic who will be to Wellhausen what Wellhausen has been to Ewald.

In concluding his review, the writer thinks he is justified in asking from the critics some adequate explanation of such astounding literary ability, and such marvellous dramatic power as are shown in the Old Testament writings:—

We venture to tell them that this ought to be their first task. They show a marvellous ignorance of the forces which mould and guide human character, of the laws of human imagination, and of the facts of human life, if they imagine that any amount of literary analysis of the documents of the Old Testament, or any comparison, however minute, of the legislations with the history, will enable them to dispense with this necessary task. The writers of the Old Testament and their representation of the history of Israel will maintain possession of the field, until the critics learn the secret of the marvellous verisimilitude of reality and appearance of historic truth which these writers have been able to impart to the writings of the old Testament. Nor will diligent dissection of documents and minute analysis of the historical books ever lead them into possession of this open secret. They seem to us to be altogether on a false scent, and have followed their microscopic investigations to such minuteness as to be unconscious of the greater difficulties which await their own solution of the problem. One of these we have briefly stated, and space prevents us from naming others. Weighted as the traditional view is with innumerable difficulties, it still makes a less demand on human belief than the view which Dr. Smith regards as demonstrated. The inevitable conclusion is, that the last word on Old Testament criticism is not yet spoken. The final solution, if ever we have a final solution, will probably be as far removed from the view of Dr. Smith as it will be removed from the traditional view. For notwithstanding the ability of its advocates, their acknowledged scholarship, and their undoubted love of truth, we must say that a theory which postulates the existence of unknown writers of the skill, deftness, and power of those of the Exile period, is, on the face of it, incredible.

"THE DECAY OF PREACHING."

The Chicago Advance devotes a leader to Mr. Mahaffy's book on "The Decay of Modern Preaching," and says:—"The burden of this Dublin Professor's charge, that the day for preaching has mostly gone by, is stiff and nonsense. Never, since the world began bearing on its bosom beneath the infinitely pitying eye of God its burden of immortal human souls was there ever greater need of, or more inspiring opportunities for, true preaching, by the living voice of the men of God, than there is to-day; and that, too, in poor distracted Ireland as well as in this vast America. Modern society has not outgrown, it is not likely to outgrow, the sacred preacher. Times have changed no doubt; but not so as to leave less necessity for that consecrated personal leadership, instruction, argument, appeal, instant enforcement, the inspiration and propulsion of the many under the oratorical spell of one man whose heart and brain and entire nature shall be set burning with God's own thought, presence, love and communicated power, in the supreme sacrament of true gospel preaching, which transforms truth into character. Say that the preacher's calling is more exacting than ever; granted; but so is [the] popular need of it. The only thing that is true in the book referred to is, that the preaching of the time should be suited to the time. And in demanding this, on the part of our theological seminaries, and then of the ministers themselves, however exactly, there will be no injustice. Only, let it be remembered, the main part of our religious necessities are such as are common to all ages, to all days, and to men in all places."

CREMATION.

The Pall Mall Gazette, in an article on this subject, writes:—

The chief objections to cremation are those which are made by those who plead religious principles, and by those who lay stress upon the impossibility of procuring evidence as to poisoning after the victim has been cremated. The first objection is not serious, and in Italy, according to M. Martin, the clergy have already accepted the process, and are now seeking permission to place the funeral urns containing the ashes of the incinerated faithful within the walls of their churches. The difficulty as to poisoning is more important, and it undoubtedly constitutes an objection to the new system. But the cases in which poisoning is discovered by exhumation are few. Only three cases have occurred in Paris in eight years, and in two of them a close examination of the corpse which would be obligatory before cremation would have led to its detection. Many poisons are undiscoverable by exhumation, and others, such as arsenic, antimony, lead, &c., can be detected in the ashes of the crematory furnace or in the fumes which are given off in the process. At Milan the presence of arsenic in the ashes of poisoned dogs has been repeatedly discovered; but of course in cases where the surviving relative was the guilty party the ashes would not be allowed to remain for any time in the funeral urn. On the whole, notwithstanding the pleas urged by its advocates, cremation can hardly fail to increase to a small degree the chances of a poisoner's escape.

THE REVISED NEW TESTAMENT.

Referring to the pamphlet recently published entitled "The Revisers and the Greek Text of the New Testament," by two members of the New Testament Company, the following occurs in the Church of England Pulpit and Ecclesiastical Review:—

What amount of influence has been exerted on the public mind by the articles in the Quarterly Review on the Revised Version of the New Testament it is not easy to ascertain; but it is probable that, while their tone and spirit have been widely felt to be offensive and repelling, a not inconsiderable amount of uneasiness and doubt has been created in regard to the merits of the Revisers' work. Strong assertion, unfaltering self-confidence, contemptuous depreciation, an ostentatious display of learning—these are things which, in spite of the sober judgment, are apt to make an impression, and to steal a verdict which ought to have been withheld till sound arguments should have been produced, and critical capacity evinced. The general reader, familiar with the better characteristics of Anglican scholarship, might easily be led to think that articles so blazing with passionate vituperation and scorn could scarcely have been penned by an English Churchman, unless his contention had the strongest grounds in its favour, and from the high character of the periodical which admitted and adopted them, the inference might well be drawn that they must be very much more than tales, "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing." In this way, apart from any real solidity or logical cogency in them, these notorious articles have probably produced a considerable effect on the minds of those who were neither acquainted with the subject, nor initiated in the open secret of their authorship. If any such be among our readers, we recommend them to study the quiet, dignified reply, which in the pamphlet named above, two of the Revisers have given to the world. We can promise then that they will not encounter here anything justly offensive to Christian feeling, or to the honest love of truth. In these pages there is no reckless assertion, no calumnious imputation of evil motives, no insolent pelting with opprobrious epithets, no incandid misrepresentation, no misquoting of authorities, no pretension to infallibility. The Revisers write like scholars, gentlemen, and Christians; patient in collecting, and scrupulously honest in weighing all attainable evidence, and without fear or favour making it their one object to ascertain the truth. And it is not to defend themselves that they write, but to rescue the truth from perversion. As they well say, "Silence is the best reply to flouts and gibes. But the questions which are connected with the text of the Greek Testament are so important and lie so far out of the track of the ordinary reader that we cannot allow the reviewer's observations upon this subject to remain wholly unanswered." How the reviewer fares in their hands, and what a sorry figure he becomes as his rhetorical disguise is stripped off and the reality appears in its naked proportions, how the tempestuous wave of his invective is shattered against the rock of solid fact, and dispersed in harmless froth; how scholarly skill, like an inevitable Nemesis, tracks him down through his fallacies and misstatements—all this may be seen in the pages before us. It is the old story of the practical uselessness of an ill-digested mass of learning, apart from the faculty to use it rightly. So to compare small things with great, have we known fourth-rate preachers and writers, innocent of the very elements of logic and exegesis, go on supporting their private crotchets by fluent quotation and exposition entirely to their own satisfaction, while to the more intelligent spectator it was manifest that they were vainly floundering in interminable quagmires of nonsense.

RELIGION AND SCIENCE.

The Lancet states that as a matter of fact it does not think there are many, if any, of the true workers in science who are absolutely unbelievers, or disbelievers, in the Unknown. There is a heroic impulse which leads men to deny what they cannot understand, but at heart they must and do make this reservation, "so far as our present knowledge extends;" and this reservation is the very seed and essence of faith. The scientist draws as largely on fiction for the solution of his difficulty when he affirms that life is an attribute or property of protoplasm, as the non-scientist can do when he accepts and adopts the doctrine that man lives because the Creator breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and that all life, whether that of plants or animals, came from God. In short, science gains nothing in point of precision by scepticism in matters of religion. The scientist simply draws on conjecture in his own province to compensate him for the lack of that aid which is offered him from the province of Revelation. The professed "Materialist" has no ground for the belief he hugs that he is a stronger-minded and more rational man than his brother who believes in the Bible story of creation; because the scientific hypothesis of life in protoplasm is equally incredible if we come to demonstrable facts, and requires not less "credulity" if we speak of inferences. This is the sum of the whole dispute of Science versus Faith.

MR. MATTHEW ARNOLD AND THE DISSIDENT IDEAL.

In a paper contributed by Mr. Arnold to the Fortnightly Review of this month a passing reference occurs to the late Dr. Raleigh, whose memoir was recently reviewed in the Inquirer, not altogether favourably, our reviewer in common with Mr. Arnold being struck with the circumscribed religious ideal of the Evangelical Dissenters. Dr. Raleigh is selected in the Fortnightly Review article as a typical leader of a class of Christians whose souls are "imprisoned" in a "Judaic conception," and who transfer their ideal from earth to the sky. All this is introductory to a comparison of English schools and forms of civilisation, illustrated by the career of a manly Eton boy. As a set-off against the gloomy life which Mr. Arnold supposes Nonconformity to lead, he gives us in this article in the Fortnightly an account of a young officer who fought and died in the Zulu War, who is taken as a mixed product of our wholesome country home life and our public school system. The Nonconformist, commenting, unsympathetically, on this comparison, writes:—

What troubles Mr. Arnold, and may well trouble him, is this. He sees what has been accomplished in the strength of that faith which he strives to undermine. He sees it in his Eton boy; he sees it in Dr. Raleigh. After remarking that we are so little like his ideals, he says, "Nevertheless, what a store of virtue there is in the main body of serious people even now, with their minds imprisoned in this Judaic conception; what qualities of character and energy are in such leaders of them as Dr. Raleigh! Nay, what a store of virtue there is even in their civilisation itself, narrow and stunted though it be! We see its faults, we contrast it with our ideal; but our ideal has not yet done as much; and for making itself fact this civilisation has found in its Judaic conceptions the requisite stimulus and guidance, and probably only in conceptions of this kind could it have done so." These are serious facts; we are not sure, however, that Mr. Arnold apprehends them in all their import, for he says that, when he lays down the memoir of Dr. Raleigh, he feels that, crude and faulty as is the type of religion offered by Puritanism, "yet the seriousness, soberness, and devout energy of Puritanism are a prize once won never to be lost; they are a possession to our race for ever." Are they? Then by what title? They came to us through faith, as they are being produced in all parts of the world at this hour in the hearts and lives of men, hitherto strangers to them. The strength and virtue which Mr. Arnold admires have sprung from confidence in God as a Father ever near to defend His child, enabling him to become good and to do good, and guaranteeing him final success in his great conflict with sin and sorrow; and the anxiety of those who teach an abstract autonomous morality is justified by history and experience. As Nonconformists, however, we shall do well to remember that only those Protestants can give a complete answer to critics like Mr. Matthew Arnold who can show that, in their scheme of thought and life, every healthy and noble human force has or may find a natural home and receive religious sanction.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON.

BY BISHOP F. D. HUNTINGTON, D.D.

Mr. Emerson's withdrawal from the pastorate of the Unitarian Congregational Society in Boston, where he was colleague with the younger Henry Ware, after a ministry of only three years, marked as distinctly as any other event a transition period in what has been called the Liberal Religious Movement in New England. It attracted little attention at the time, and made no profound impression on the public mind. The young preacher, then less than thirty years of age, had not been greatly distinguished in the pulpit, being less fervent and less practical than Dr. Ware, and less commanding in eloquence than Channing or Buckminster, or Dewey or Kirkland. He was known as a young student of retiring habits, good scholarship, and uncommon skill and taste as a writer. Averse to popular notoriety, he made as little parade as possible of his disagreement with his people; and when he went away, instead of being exalted by his heresy, as has sometimes happened, to a more conspicuous theatre, he passed quietly to a small farm in Concord, the country village of his ancestors. Nothing could have looked less like the putting on of armour or the seizing of a trumpet for the tumultuous career of a great reformer. He avowed it as his intention to divide his time between some light agricultural employment and study; but it was not long before he confessed that, in any attempt to combine practical husbandry with success in literature, one or the other must presently succumb. As the world very well knows, however, this hiding of a lofty head in a rural homestead turned out to be only a signal step in a sure ascent to a lofty place among the intellectual masters of his age.

It was characteristic of the man's mind that he broke with his denomination not over any doctrinal system or ecclesiastical law, but over a single ceremony, scarcely belonging, where he found and left it, to any ritual at all, and not significant of any particular theological belief. The general view of the Lord's Supper, taken by the Unitarians of that day, was essentially Zwinglian; certainly not higher than that; but the minister, with his keen perception and honest conscience, saw that the rite meant something to the worshippers which it did not mean to him, and that was enough. Instead of compromising and parleying and twisting about to find new meanings for old religious words, he took his leave. It must be owned that there was a certain moral dignity in the act. It was in wholesome and handsome contrast with those unmanly devices whereby incumbents, here or there, have gained or kept their stations and salaries through the trickery of a double sense. And this quality of candour, this standing squarely at all hazards on the fact, let it be said, was as obvious in the man as any other trait, to the end. This does not require us to conclude, however, that all his reasons for abandoning his profession and quitting his sect were proclaimed.

Up to that time the Unitarians were generally of one mind. Their negations and affirmations were pretty well understood. They denied the generally accepted doctrines of the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Personality of the Holy Spirit, Salvation only by the sufferings of Christ, native depravity, with the absolute need of Regeneration by Divine Grace, and all the Calvinistic points. They preached personal righteousness, the virtues, the Christian graces, the Fatherhood of God, and the Perfect Example of individual holiness in Jesus Christ. As to Christ's nature, they differed widely, their opinions ranging all the way down from high Arianism to the profane theory that the Son of Mary was fallible and peccable. Some were Socinians. Some were Sabellians. A few were Deists. All were Arminians. A Quaker estimate of the Sacraments was not usual, and yet was not altogether unknown. But what will strike those who have observed the Denomination only within the thirty years last past as most remarkable is that, even for some time after Emerson threw off his gown in the vestry of the "Second Church," the Holy Scriptures were constantly appealed to as a final authority in religious faith and practice. There were various theories of inspiration; there were sharp exegetical contests over a dozen or twenty passages in the English Version. The Old Testament was sometimes disparaged in comparison with the New. The Gospels were more highly valued than the Epistles. Nevertheless, in all the controversial war, well fought on both sides, from 1810 to 1840, between the Unitarian and the Trinitarian Congregationalists, it was assumed by both parties that when the meaning of Scripture was found out it was binding upon the Christian mind. The Bible was the rule of belief, "the Religion of Protestants." Worcester and Channing and Whitman and Norton and the Wares held to this just as explicitly as Stuart and Woods and Adams and Beecher and the "Panoplist." Among historical lapses from Orthodoxy there has hardly been an instance of swifter decline than this.

A new Unitarian school appeared in Boston and the neighbourhood just before the death of Dr. Channing, in 1842. It was not precisely identical with the transcendental coterie of that period; but it was largely influenced by it. It was partly a philosophy, partly a scheme of interpretation, and partly a social assertion of the liberty of human thought in matters of religious belief. It was not an organisation. Its spirit was too diffuse, its aims were too indefinite, and on many points its leaders were too inharmonious with one another to admit of that. It sat in parlours and private libraries. It was often found at Concord. It held many an earnest and entertaining symposium at the West End of Boston. Its chiefs were Theodore Parker, George Ripley, Hedge, Francis, Stetson, and Bartol. Parker came into Boston about ten years after Emerson went out. A contest which had no charms to the calm and contemplative scholar was fascinating and inspiring to the sanguine and self-confident iconoclast. In his suburban parish, in West Roxbury, a delighted and credulous reader of the modern German Rationalists of all varieties, Parker had gone much further than his rationalising American brethren. To a large majority of the Unitarian people he seemed little better than an Infidel. So, for a time, his fight was as much with the then surviving Conservatives and Supernaturalists—like Gannett and Norton and the elder Frothingham and Putnam—as with the Puritans. Gradually the lines shifted their place. Rationalism gained; Conservatism and Supernaturalism lost. The appeal to Revelation became indecisive and nugatory. The foundations sank away. At his death, if not before, Parker was recognised as a Unitarian preacher, on the whole, sound enough for the congregations. King's Chapel and a few other cautious sanctuaries were never opened to him, and there are Unitarians to-day who disown most of his irreverent and desperate denials, finding in them neither power nor peace. But the drift has been steadily and rapidly the other way; men of Mr. Parker's opinion stand well in ministerial circles. It has been freely discussed in denominational circles whether Unitarians ought to be required to call Christ Lord and Master; to a considerable extent even the forms of baptism and the Lord's Supper are disused; and Dr. James Freeman Clarke, who has generally been upborne by both wings of the descending body, eulogised Mr. Emerson, at his funeral, the other day, without stint or qualification, as a Christian thinker and teacher.

Had Mr. Emerson anything to do with this extraordinary shifting of the denominational landscape? Very much. Personally and visibly, the enchanter was not much on the scene, with his wand; but he was never far absent, and though to most observers he might seem to be only a reserved, careless, or smiling spectator, his potent spirit was always silently at work, creating or energising these changes, and the incisive strokes of his genius were felt everywhere, smiting the old fabric and cutting to pieces the voluntary compact which had hitherto held the scattered Liberal Flocks together. Without the slightest concern or conscious effort to achieve a revolution, he was really undermining the cause for which he tried to keep up a qualified respect and making its inconsistencies ridiculous. His methods were as unlike those of his friend Mr. Parker as possible; not from policy, but because their mental and moral constitutions, like their faces, were of opposite types. One was a man of solitude, thought, ideas. The other was a man of society, objects, reading, and passions. Emerson served his intuitions. Parker served specific ends and his emotions. Both had a high moral sense and meant to be of use to mankind, especially to the abused and oppressed classes; but Emerson wrought with his brain, Parker with his nerves and blood. Neither really cared much for theology; neither had the theological instinct or talent; but both were fond of dealing in a certain fashion with those subjects which theology handles scientifically.

Emerson used to go to hear Parker preach occasionally. It must have been because he relished his cleverness; because they were both in an attitude of repugnance toward the accepted orthodoxy and were together under suspicion accordingly; and because they were both enemies and assailants of the same great social wrongs, the one as a prophet and the other as a crusader. Mr. Parker used to go to hear Mr. Emerson lecture, because he admired his singular gifts, recognised his elevation, and was thankful for his friendship and support.

It was not long after the Transcendental irruption when those minds in the movement which cared more for philosophy and poetry than for any religious creed or cultus drew gently apart from the Unitarian pulpits and pews and arranged themselves in an informal club. To be sure, they left behind them a great deal that went to modify and disintegrate the former substance of the sect; a great deal that has tended and must tend more and more to unsettle the traditions of a religious movement which, we must acknowledge, in its earlier period produced noble specimens of manhood and womanhood; held up an exalted standard of personal character, and, in fact, was a well-nigh unavoidable reaction from some intolerable dogmatic errors and bigotries which had long held in fee simple the Puritan soil. Transcendentalism in itself, however, divested of all ecclesiastical sympathies, took a course of its own, not destined to be very much prolonged, but picturesque and entertaining while it lasted. Through the wit and culture of a brilliant though slightly sentimental circle, having Concord for its first Delphi, with Emerson and Margaret Fuller for its foremost oracles, it presently grouped a community of hierophants and sibyls at Brook Farm, issued the "Dial," put into it a large number of scholarly and striking articles, but made haste to spoil and kill it by the infusion of much laughable and unintelligible orphic nonsense, of which the responsible conductors were in due time, no doubt, heartily ashamed. Community, "Dial," shrine, and oracle have vanished. Exotics wonderful to see and not without interest to the social and critical botanist, they struck no root, whatever indirect influences they may have shed upon the manifold growth and mixed composition of American life.

MANCHESTER.—The new Sunday-school building connected with the Upper Brook-street Free Church was formally opened last Sunday afternoon by the Rev. Wm. Gaskell. The exercises were simple and brief. The falling rain prevented the attendance of many of the smaller children, but a good number of the friends of the school were present. Mr. Gaskell congratulated the church upon the successful completion of the school, and expressed his conviction that no church can do the work it should without the opportunity of influencing the life of the young which a school affords, and concluded his brief address with a fervent prayer. Through the generosity of Mrs. Seaton and other friends, the school was opened entirely free from debt.

CARDIFF.—The Mayor of Cardiff, accompanied by Sir E. J. Reed, M.P., on Tuesday morning declared the new free library building opened. The cost of erection has been £9,000. Among the recent contributors to the art gallery was the late Mr. Menelaus, whose gifts represent a monetary value of £10,000, and Sir E. J. Reed, M.P., has given a picture worth £1,000.

DUDLEY.—The Rev. Matthew Gibson has intimated his intention of resigning the pastorate of the Old Meeting House, Wolverhampton-street, Dudley, which he will have held for about twenty-one years, in November next.

BLACKFRIARS MISSION.—Religious service on Sunday evenings from seven to eight have been commenced at the Mission Rooms with a fair amount of success.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in Packets labelled—"JAMES EPPS & CO., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." Also makers of Epps' Chocolate Essence for afternoon use.

Correspondence.

THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Will your correspondent Mr. Haydn Williams excuse me if I characterise his as an easy faith that could, with so much satisfaction, accept the theory of Mr. Hennell, unsustained by one particle of evidence, in place of the testimony of men who perilled their lives unto death in attestation of their truth?

Mr. Hennell's theory is that Joseph of Arimathea—"an honourable councillor," as he is styled by Mark—"a good man and a righteous," as Luke calls him, aided possibly by Nicodemus, another member of the Sanhedrim, but both secret disciples of Jesus, obtained possession of his body, and buried it secretly, and then told Mary Magdalene a lie—that he had risen and gone to Galilee.

With what object did this "good and righteous man" tell the lie? Was it to prevent Mary and the other women who came that morning to the sepulchre from paying the last tribute of affection to the Master in aiding in embalming his remains? It is not supposed that Mary or these other women had the slightest expectation of seeing him again restored to them. Nothing could be more remote from their minds, if there be any truth in the sacred narratives. The statement attributed to Joseph is a quite gratuitous one, and but little consistent with the character attributed to him.

But perhaps Mr. Williams will fall back on Denton's theory, that Joseph, seeing signs of life in Jesus's body, secretly but successfully used means for his recovery, though the result was death, finally, in Joseph's house, and secret burial by his timid host. If such were the case, why was the fact concealed from the rest of the disciples? Nay, why did Joseph, by his silence, render himself a party to the delusion that subsequently arose? He is "an honourable councillor" who sees these men dragged before the Sanhedrim, threatened, and accused of "intending to bring this man's blood upon us." He knows that they are labouring under a misconception. He knows the agitation prevailing in Jerusalem. And yet he and Nicodemus give no sign. They have not the honesty to send for Peter and John privately, to remonstrate with them on thus aggravating the rulers, and to tell them the truth about the disappearance of the body. Even the stoning of the martyr Stephen does not induce them to disclose their secret. Saul gets authority from the chief priests, with their connivance, to hale men and women, thus deluded, and commit them to prison. And Paul himself, when converted, becomes the dupe of these deluded ones. He was told that Jesus was seen of Cephas, of James, then of all the apostles, and even of five hundred brethren at once, "of whom the greater remain unto this present." And yet a word from these men would have dispelled the infatuation; or, if their word did not suffice, they had the embalmed remains to produce in attestation of their truth.

Again, need I say how each of these theories is equally opposed to that lofty idea which even unbelievers have entertained of the character of Jesus. That idea consists not only in the excellence of his public teachings—his moral apothegms and graphic parables; for in these he had been anticipated by many a heathen moralist. Nor yet was it due to his benevolence of character, as evinced by his power of healing, for of this power our anti-supernaturalists would entirely deprive him. But what has endeared him to the heart of our humanity is manifestly his final act of voluntary self-sacrifice, whereby he not only perfected his own obedience to the Father of spirits, but became, in the words of the writer to the Hebrews—"the author of eternal salvation to all who obey him."

What was the object of that sacrifice? Jesus tells us that it was to bring into the flock other sheep that were not of the Jewish fold. At the last supper he symbolises the wine by calling it "the blood of the new covenant which is poured out for you." Paul tells his countrymen that "by him everyone that believeth is justified from all things from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses." And in his letter to the

Colossians he explains that he had "blotted out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, that was contrary to us, nailing it to his cross."

But, surely, no act of his could in Jewish estimation abrogate a law which God had instituted, unless followed by some signal recognition of the sacrifice on the part of God himself? Jesus had assumed high pretensions. In his Father's name he had cleansed the temple. In presence of the Sanhedrim he had assumed to be that "king of righteousness" of whom their prophets had foretold. He had accused them of being unfaithful stewards of the Father's vineyard—told them that the kingdom would be taken from them, and that the stone they now despised should become "the head of the corner." And how was all this realised to the minds of anxious disciples? Oh, according to Mr. Hennell, by his body being secreted by Joseph of Arimathea and a lie told to Mary Magdalene! And this is the theory that has given so much comfort to Mr. Williams, and caused him in thankfulness to reprint the work. Verily some minds are easily to be comforted!

But the theme is far too sacred to be thus trifled with. The history of that tree whose leaves under Providence have been given for the hearing of the nations, and whose roots were embedded in the social strata of long preceding generations, is quite too sublime a subject to be treated with contempt. The life of Jesus was far too holy to be ended by a lie. The hopes he kindled in humanity are far too sacred to be quenched in so silly an artifice. If Thomas were the God of this world, it might perhaps be possible to admit the mockery. But verily so long as there is in it a "Power that works for righteousness," so long will "the light shine that lighteth every man," and so long it will be found that "no lie is of the truth."

Clonmel, May 22.

JAMES ORR.

THE IRISH QUESTION.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The time at my disposal does not permit of my replying to all the correspondents who have addressed you upon the subject of my last letter, and certainly I have no desire whatever to discuss the question with persons who are apparently ashamed to attach their names to their communications. The letter of Mr. R. L. Carpenter, and the article which appeared in your leading columns, however, seem to call for remark, and I crave your permission to deal with the several topics there adverted to. In this letter I will deal with the question of "strong language," and in two subsequent letters, for which I hope you will be able to find room, I will deal with the subjects, "Ireland for the Irish," and "The Land for the People."

In the first place, then, let me say that it is quite a mistake to suppose which I apologise for, or withdraw anything. I admit that in the almost numberless speeches that I have made in different parts of England, Scotland, and Ireland upon the Irish Question, I may have used strong language occasionally, and I do not expect the present generation of discomfited party politicians to excuse it; but I freely own that I might, perhaps, have served the cause I have at heart much more effectually if I had been able to restrain myself somewhat and had been a little more guarded in my speech. Any regret I have, therefore, is occasioned entirely because strong language gives occasion to the enemy, and not at all because the circumstances of the case have not warranted the use of such language. I may be permitted, perhaps, to add while on this subject that all my speeches in the course of this agitation have had the benefit of supervision at the hand of that Chief Susceptor par excellence, Mr. W. E. Forster, and I have never had any reason to suppose that he could find any fault in them. One of my most recent speeches was, according to Mr. Trevelyan, the new Chief Secretary, carefully considered by Earl Spencer. A garbled and misleading report, the work of an enemy, in which I was stated to have said something about making it hot for Lord Cavendish, was diligently circulated through England; but the Lord Lieutenant obtained from a reporter in Belfast a correct report of my observations; and what happened? The Chief Secretary remarked in the House of Commons that the Lord Lieutenant having carefully considered the evident intention of the language used by me on that occasion did not propose to take any steps in regard to it.

I imagine that it will be very difficult for the Lord Lieutenant to lay his hands upon me, because my constant care is to follow good models, both in writing and speaking. Perhaps you will permit me to adduce some of these models.

For instance, in 1859 or 1860 the Times said—

The destiny of a nation ought to be determined, not by the opinions of other nations, but by the opinion of the nation itself. To decide whether they are ill-governed or not, or rather whether the degree of extortion, corruption, and cruelty to which they are subject is sufficient to justify armed resistance, is for those who live under that Government—not for those who, being exempt from its oppression, feel a sentimental or a theological interest in its continuance.

The Daily News said—

Europe has over and over again affirmed that one principle... the right of a people to choose its own rulers.

"Verax," who is well known to be Mr. Henry Dunckley, the accomplished editor of the Manchester Examiner, said only the other day—

In quiet times an ordinary Irish Bill does not stand the ghost of a chance of becoming law. It can hardly be sure of a hearing... Nothing can be done for Ireland except under the threat of a revolution, and then some great thing will be done.

Again the same writer says—

For any good they (the Irish representatives) are able to do for Ireland they might as well betake themselves to the lakes of Killarney. The cry for Home Rule is an inevitable result of such a state of things, and Home Rule must be granted unless the system can be changed... I cannot pretend to be blind to the conclusion that the union must go unless we can contrive to make it square with the practical concession to Ireland of the rights and advantages of self-government. We must rule Ireland with the consent and with the voluntary co-operation of the people of Ireland, or we must abandon the attempt to rule it from Westminster... As things are now, if I were an Irishman I should probably be a follower of Mr. Parnell.

Now for some model speeches. Lord Ellenborough—

I hope that, stimulated by the insults to Italy which are conveyed in the demands France is about to make in the Congress, they (the Pope's subjects) will rise to vindicate their right to choose their own government, and clutch the arms by which alone it can be secured.

Mr. Gladstone's Midlothian speeches are fresh in everybody's recollection, his intimation that the Clerkenwell explosion called attention to Irish affairs, and afforded him a favourable opportunity, is especially fresh in the public mind.

A passage from one of Mr. Bright's speeches, however, may not be so familiar:—

When law refuses its duty, when Government denies the right of a people, when competition is so fierce for the little land which the monopolists grant to cultivation in Ireland, when, in fact, for a bare potatoe millions are scrambling, these people are driven back from law and the usages of civilisation to that which is termed the law of nature, and, if not the strongest, the law of the vindictive; and in this case the people of Ireland believe, to my certain knowledge, that it is only by these acts of vengeance periodically committed, that they can hold in suspense the arm of the proprietor and the agent—(hear, hear)—who in too many cases, if he dared, would exterminate them. At this moment there is a state of war in Ireland. Don't let us disguise it from ourselves. There is a war between landlord and tenant, a war as fierce and relentless as though it were carried on by force of arms. There is a suspicion, too, between landlord and tenant, which is not known between any class of people in this country, and there is a hatred, too, which I believe, under the present and past system, which has been pursued in Ireland can never be healed or eradicated.

Only one more "model utterance." At a meeting of Unitarian ministers and others in Liverpool the other day, the chairman, Mr. Shaen, referring to certain Acts of Parliament to which he was opposed, said they were of such a character as justified those who were subject to them in offering the utmost possible resistance to their operation. I ventured to say at that meeting that I was astonished to hear an English gentleman say that subjects of the Queen would be justified in resisting any law which Parliament in its wisdom had enacted; but I took occasion to observe also that in my opinion the chairman, in his subsequent remarks, abundantly justified himself.

Emerson's remark that should John Brown be hanged for his armed attack on slavery, he "would make his gallows glorious like a cross" is ample justification for Mr. Shaen, and, to my mind, ample justification for me also, when I say that if such an enterprise had sufficient probability of success, and no other means of securing the same end were available, the Irish nation would be entitled "to rise to vindicate their right to choose their own government," and "to clutch the arms by which alone it could be secured." So much, then, for strong language.

HAROLD RYLETT.

The Manse, Moneyrea, Belfast, June 5.

[Mr. Rylett is clearly entitled to a reply, but our columns are not a fitting place, nor have we space for a discussion on the Irish Land Question.—ED. INQUIRER.]

GOD AND IMMORTALITY.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The President of the London District Unitarian Society, in his address at the annual meeting of the society—is reported to have said among other things that "when he saw ministers and missionaries preaching on such topics as the affirmation of God—the probability, possibility, or certainty of an immortal life—it appeared to him that they were throwing away all their chances of success. The more they talked about the possibility of God, the more they were departing from their true work. The existence of God was to be assumed, not proved." I note here that the speaker got his ideas a little mixed, for he spoke of affirmation and proof as if they were convertible terms; but passing by this and other somewhat perplexing portions of this part of the address, I gather that in the speaker's idea it is no part of the duty of a Unitarian minister to affirm or defend a belief in the existence of God or of a life after death; there is no need for it—time used in doing so is time wasted. But surely a man who speaks thus must be profoundly ignorant of the religious condition of very many of our fellow countrymen, and of a marked tendency of modern thought among them.

The speaker and many more of us may not need any reasoning to convince us of the being of God; but are we in our comfortable belief to lose sight of, and care for, the thousands of our fellow men who have put, or are putting, this belief quite away from them? have we no duty to do for them? can we give them no help? Let us turn from such utterances to some words spoken by Dr. Freeman Clarke in the sermon preached on the occasion of the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association:—"We (Unitarians) were now called upon to defend the existence of God, the immortality of the soul, and the existence of things unseen and real."... "These were matters they had to meet at the present time." These were wise and weighty words, and they point to a duty which we must each of us in our own way try to do.

And of this we may be sure—that as there are many thoughtful men everywhere for whom great difficulties do stand in the way of a belief in the being of God, so any effort made by anyone of us honestly to meet, and as far as possible to remove, such difficulties, will be fully appreciated by a large proportion of those on whose behalf it is made.

A UNITARIAN MINISTER.

MR. BRIGHT ON THE LOVE OF BOOKS.

The new Free Library at Birmingham was opened on the first of the month, and very appropriately the two Parliamentary representatives of the borough, Mr. Bright and Mr. Chamberlain, attended. Mr. Bright spoke at some length, and chose for his subject the influence on the formation of character of the love of literature, illustrating his remarks by relating some anecdotes about persons in the lower classes whose lives had been made brighter and happier by the possession and earnest perusal of a few good books, and by reference to the works of some of the great writers of America.

Mr. Bright began by relating an incident in his own experience, which formed the key-note to his speech. He said that in a conversation he had with the late Sir David Dundas, while that gentleman was on his death-bed, Sir David said: "I have never pretended to be a learned man or a scholar, but God has given me a great love of books." He referred then to the celebrated writings of Lord Bacon, and, taking a quotation from a letter which that eminent man had written to a friend, he turned to me and said, "May God lead you by the hand!" That was one of the passages fixed in his mind from this reading of the works of Lord Bacon.

"That (said Mr. Bright) was a solemn hour with my friend, if I may quote a very expressive and beautiful line from one of Scotland's real but one of her minor poets—from Michael Bruce, "When dim in his breast life's dying taper burned." At that solemn hour, reviewing his past life, reviewing the enjoyment which he had partaken of, he thanked God that He had given him a great love of books. What is a great love of books? It is in point of fact something like a personal introduction to the great and good men of all past times. Books, it is true, are silent as you see them upon their shelves, but, silent as they are, I think—to me it is so—that when I enter a library I feel almost as if the dead were present; and I know that if I put questions to those books they will answer me with all the faithfulness and the fulness that have been left in them by the great men who have left the books to us. On a recent occasion, when a great many persons were assembled at Windsor at a recent marriage, I had the opportunity of spending a quiet hour in the library at Windsor Castle. I have been in other great libraries. I recollect many years ago, at Woburn Abbey, and an occasion not so long ago at Chatsworth, and there are hundreds of libraries throughout the country of the kind that I describe. When you are within the walls, and see on the shelves thousands of volumes, and consider for a moment who they were that wrote them, who had gathered them together, for whom they were intended, how much wisdom they contain, what they will tell to future ages, it is impossible not to feel something of solemnity and tranquillity when you are spending time in rooms like this. And if you go to houses of less note you find libraries that are of great estimation, and which not in a less degree are able to afford mental aliment to those connected with them. And I may say—and I hope if there are some here who have some care for other things they will not blame me—although you may have in houses costly pictures and costly ornaments, and a great variety of decorations, yet, so far as my judgment goes, I would prefer to have one comfortable room well stocked with books to all that you can give me of the decorations which even the highest art can afford. The only subject of lamentation is—and one feels that always, I think, in the presence of a library—that life is too short; and I am afraid I must say, also, that our industry is so far deficient that we seem to have no hope of a full enjoyment of the ample repast that is spread before us. Mr. Bright then went on to say that in the houses of the humble that a little library was a most precious possession. Some twenty years ago, while on a salmon-fishing excursion in Sutherlandshire, he went into a shepherd's cottage, and found there a copy of "Paradise Regained." It seemed to transfigure the cottage.

Mr. Bright then referred at some length to the history of Janet Hamilton, a poor Scotchwoman, who had contrived to read a great many books, and had herself published a volume of poems of striking merit:—

"She said her love for books was her ruling passion, notwithstanding the character of her childhood and the work she had to do. So far as he knew, nothing was neglected, but she suffered from sitting up to read till two o'clock in the morning, for she believed that it had the effect of very much injuring and at last depriving her of her eyesight. This old lady has written poems, of which, if there were time, I would have quoted two or three of them, but certainly there are some of them which, if placed among the poems of Burns in a volume of his, no one would for a moment doubt they were the production of the greatest of all the Scotch poets. That I think is an amazing story. I confess it has surprised me beyond anything I have read for a long time, and I doubt if we have a record of a more remarkable person than my old friend Janet Hamilton. I am very sorry I never had the opportunity of seeing her, though friends of mine were intimate with her, but I had the pleasure afterwards of giving a little subscription to a fund that was raised for the purpose of putting up a memorial to her in her town, nearly opposite, I believe, to the house in which she lived."

The right hon. gentleman also fully discussed the literature of the United States, and spoke of the writings of Bryant, Longfellow, Wendell Holmes, and Russell Lowell, and pleaded for a better acquaintance with the poets on the other side of the Atlantic.

Religious Intelligence.

UNIVERSITY HALL, LONDON.

A special general meeting of the members of University Hall was held at the hall on Friday, June 2, having been convened for the purpose of considering the scheme for the dissolution of the society, and the creation of a new Trust, which had been prepared in accordance with the instructions agreed upon at the annual general meeting, June, 1881. The following life members were present:

—D. Ainsworth, M.P., the Rev. W. M. Ainsworth, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, C. Bischoff, W. F. Blake, E. Bromley, W. W. Bruce, H. W. Busk, the Rev. J. E. Carpenter, W. J. Carpenter, Mrs. Case, P. W. Clayden, T. P. Cobb, the Rev. C. C. Coe, W. C. Coupland, the Rev. Dr. Drummond, T. Ely, R. Field, H. W. Gair, the Rev. A. Gordon, H. R. Greg, R. Harrop, C. Hawksley, J. Heywood, F.R.S., the Rev. P. M. Higginson, B. Hill, E. R. Horton, the Rev. E. S. Howse, C. James, W. S. Jevons, F.R.S., the Rev. R. C. Jones, T. G. Lee, P. Lawford, Miss Manning, D. Martineau, R. Martineau, C. J. Murch, H. New, W. B. Odgers, T. S. Osler, C. F. Pearson, the Rev. Dr. Sadler, R. Scott, the Rev. R. Shaen, W. Shaen, W. G. Shaen, W. A. Sharpe, the Rev. H. Solly, R. Swanwick, J. Taylor, W. Thornely, T. C. Watson, the Rev. J. T. Whitehead, the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, and P. Worsley—holding ninety-eight proxies of life members and four proxies of annual members.

On the motion of Mr. T. P. Cobb, seconded by Mr. David Martineau, Mr. W. Shaen took the chair. He explained the object of the meeting, and the steps which had been taken to ensure a large attendance, the concurrence of one half of the whole number of life members being required in order to effect the dissolution of the society. An informal expression of approval of the scheme had been obtained by circular from three-fourths of the members, and fifty-five were present, fifty-one of whom held two proxies each. The Chairman gave some account of the negotiations which had been going on between the representatives of the Hall and those of Manchester New College since the date of the annual meeting. The final results were embodied in the resolutions which had been sent to every life member, and which would now be submitted to the meeting. Their decision would require confirmation at the annual general meeting.

The following resolutions were then moved by Mr. Harrop:—

"1. That this meeting sees occasion [to] dissolve the society.

"2. That this society shall be dissolved as from the date of the next consecutive general meeting, to be held for the purpose of confirming these resolutions, and thereupon all the property of the society shall be transferred in the manner and for the purposes in the following resolutions directed.

"3. That the property of the society shall upon the dissolution as aforesaid be vested in sixteen trustees, to be held by them and their successors upon trust as in the following resolutions directed.

"4. That eight of the said trustees shall be such persons as shall for that purpose be appointed by the society at its next consecutive general meeting.

"5. That the other eight of the said trustees shall be such persons as shall for that purpose be appointed by Manchester New College by a vote of its Committee of Management.

"6. That the said sixteen trustees when appointed as aforesaid shall have the property of the society vested in them as aforesaid upon the terms of an indenture of assignment and conveyance already prepared, a copy of which marked "A" has been submitted to this meeting.

"7. That the trustees in whom the property of the Society is now vested shall and they are hereby directed to execute the said Indenture of Assignment and Conveyance for the purpose of vesting in the said sixteen trustees the property of the said society

"8. That the said sixteen trustees when appointed as aforesaid shall hold the said property when so vested in them as aforesaid upon the trusts and for the purposes declared and contained in a deed poll of declaration of trust already prepared, and a copy of which marked "B" has been submitted to this meeting.

"9. That the terms and contents of the said two deeds be and are hereby approved, and the appropriation of the said property of the society therein and thereby to be effected upon the dissolution of the society is hereby directed."

In moving these resolutions Mr. Harrop expressed his belief that if they were carried there was every prospect of a new term of usefulness for the Hall, more in accordance with the original aims of the founder than had hitherto been found practicable, and with ample guarantees for the more distant future. He mentioned that it was the intention of the college to reserve a certain number of rooms for the divinity students, and that the rest would be offered at a revised tariff to lay students. Arrangements had been made to place the Hall under the superintendence of one of the most popular of the professors of University Hall, Professor Henry Morley—(applause).

The resolutions were seconded by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed. He looked upon the step which was now proposed to be taken as evidence, not of failure, but of the triumph of the principles which the Hall was built to commemorate, in the removal of the restrictions against which it was a protest. It would now be enabled to continue the spirit of the same work in other forms.

After observations by the Rev. H. Solly, Mr. T. S. Osler, Mr. T. G. Lee, Mr. C. Hawksley and Mr. E. Bromley, the following words—"Subject to any alterations which may be accepted by Manchester New College and approved at the annual general meeting of the society on the 22nd inst.," were, at the suggestion of the Chairman, added to Resolution 8.

The resolution, as amended, having been put to the meeting, was declared by the Chairman to be carried mem. con.

On the motion of Mr. C. Bischoff, seconded by Mr. T. G. Lee, it was resolved "That the cordial thanks of the meeting be given to Mr. W. Shaen for his services as Chairman."

ECCELESIASTICAL AND MORTUARY FEES.

The Select Committee on Ecclesiastical and Mortuary Fees met on Thursday, May 25, Sir ALEXANDER GORDON in the chair.

The Rev. THOMAS E. ESPIN, D.D., Chancellor of the Diocese of Chester, and Chancellor of the Diocese of Liverpool, which was created out of Chester, stated that there are 202 parishes in the diocese of Liverpool, 170 of which are new parishes, for which the Chancellor has statutory power to fix fees, and the table which he had authorised generally gave for burial 2s. to the minister and 1s. to the clerk. Where there was no clerk, the clerk's fee would go to the sexton. Upon application he considered that the Chancellor had also power to approve a table of fees in old parishes. If a man did not pay the fee so ordered, the Ecclesiastical Court might pronounce him contumacious, and upon this being signified to the Court of Chancery, that Court would issue an order for his arrest. For the removal of a body from consecrated ground a faculty was requisite, for which five guineas would have to be paid; one guinea of this would go to the Chancellor, and the rest to the Registrar. For a stone vault or brick grave there was usually a fee of one guinea to be paid to the minister; and for a railing round a tomb, five guineas. In many cases the parish churchyards have been enlarged out of the glebe land, and he therefore thought it quite fair that the parson should have the benefit of the monumental fees paid by parishioners. Of those paid by non-parishioners he thought a portion should go to the churchwardens. He knew of no other case in which, in order to protect the rights of his beneficiaries, a trustee was allowed to put money into his own pocket. He considered that to abolish these fees would be an injury to many of the clergy by reducing their incomes; it would also be an attack upon the property of the patrons of the livings. He knew one living in which there was an income of at least £600 to £700 a year from burial fees. By Mr. Richard: If that living came into the market it would be depreciated by the amount of the fees. By Viscount Folkestone: The fees in the new parishes are charged for the burial of Dissenters equally with the burial of Churchmen, even when the burial of the Dissenter is conducted by his own minister. By Sir E. Leechmere: I should approve of a general law prohibiting railings. As to mortuary fees the witness said he knew of none existing in either the diocese of Chester or that of Liverpool. Anciently there was a mortuary fee payable to the Bishop of Chester on the death of an incumbent; the Bishop had the right to seize the deceased's horse and gown, some of his books, and a variety of things. Those fees were done away with by Act of Parliament in the time of George II.; the rectory of Wolverton was annexed to the see of Chester in compensation for the mortuary fees.

The Rev. GEORGE COLES, rector of Earl's Croome, Worcestershire, proved that by virtue of an old arrangement he was called upon to pay 16s. per annum to the rector of Ripple for the loss of his mortuary fees; he considered this a hardship, inasmuch as no mortuary fees were now paid in the parish of Earl's Croome. The incumbent's stipend at Earl's Croome was £235; that at Ripple about £1,200 per annum.

Mr. JAMES BURGESS, honorary secretary to the Ratepayers' Protection Association at Trowbridge, gave evidence that, when the Burial Board was started in January, 1856, there was a resolution passed by the ratepayers in the vestry that the then rector should receive £20 per annum in lieu of fees he was entitled to for burials in the churchyard upon the erection of monuments or tablets; there was also a resolution to pay the clerk £20 a year; both incumbent and clerk had died, but the payments were still continued. During the last twenty-six years the majority of burials at Trowbridge have been burials of Nonconformists. During the twenty-six years the Dissenters' fees have amounted to £577 9s., and those of people buried in the consecrated side of the churchyard to only £250 11s. The fees received from monuments amount altogether to about £350, that is about £12 a year; the share for the consecrated side would be about £5 a year; that would give about £175 for the incumbent and clerk during the last twenty-six years, whereas they had received over £1,040. The incumbent receives in addition the fees paid for services rendered. The £40 comes indirectly from the poor-rate, to which Nonconformists and Conformists contribute. The arrangement appeared to be in contravention of 15 and 16 Vic., c. 85, which limited the right of the incumbent and clerk to levy such fees to monuments erected in the consecrated part of the burial-ground.

The committee then adjourned.

Obituary.

JOHN ELLIS MACE, OF TENTERDEN.

The death of one whose interest in religious matters was exceptionally great, and who was never absent but when kept away by illness from the services in the Old Chapel at Tenterden, leaves a blank not easily filled.

Mr. Mace's health had been failing for some time, especially during the last five years, and since January, 1881, he had only attended two services. His last act of public worship was joining in the Lord's Supper on the evening of July 3.

He passed away very quietly on Whit Sunday, having nearly attained the age of eighty-eight. He was born on June 23, 1794, of an old Nonconformist family. The Maces originally settled at Exeter, moving from thence to Cirencester, and early in the eighteenth century to Ashford. The father and grandfather of the late Mr. Mace were both surgeons, the latter having come to Tenterden in 1751. On the mother's side there was a relationship to the Hoopes, one of whom, a great uncle, translated Tasso. Mr. Mace was one of a large family, mostly born in the last century, and of which Mrs. Munn is now the only survivor. He had two sisters, older than himself, the elder of whom, as well as his grandfather, died at the age of eighty-one, and his father at eighty. He received part of his education under Dr. Beasley at Uxbridge, and among his schoolfellows were some of the Chamberlain family. He passed through his medical training at St. Thomas's and one or two other London hospitals, taking certificates from the Royal College of Surgeons in January, and the Society of Apothecaries in June, 1816, soon after the passing of the Act of 55 George III.

He remained in practice over twenty years, retiring in consequence of the ill health of his first wife, who was a sister of the late Mr. Munn. She died in 1838, and in 1843 he married Miss Grisbrook, who, with one son, survives him. During the last forty years he has taken great interest in agricultural pursuits and in improvement of land, and though the results of much of his labour in this direction were not encouraging, his hopeful nature always led him to look on the bright side. It was well, perhaps, that he did not realise the dark shadow which has gathered over land and agriculture, and the still darker one over the Sister Isle.

He gave his vote in the 1880 election, when the country rose up against the policy of Imperialism, annexation and war, and he was always strong in support of the Liberal cause. In politics, as well as in theology, he moved with the times, never admitting the former days were better than these. He used to take an active part in elections, much against his own inclination, for he disliked the stir and commotion of public life. He was a magistrate for the borough for many years, and filled the office of Mayor in 1856-7, but he retired from the Town Council in 1862, not being in good health at that time. When in London as a student he attended the preaching of Belsham and Aspland, was present at the meetings of the Unitarian Fund previous to 1825, and has been a member of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association from its commencement, frequently attending its meetings, though considerations of health did not allow him to go regularly every year. The last occasion was at the Jubilee in 1875. He was always hopeful of the success of Liberal Christianity, and firm of belief as to the Universal Fatherhood and unchangeable love of God. Only a few days before his death he said the Saviour taught us to say Our Father, and the whole intensity of his feeling was thrown into his repetition of that prayer. He felt deeply the duty of giving, and was often pained at the small sums given for religious and philanthropic objects by those better able to give largely than himself.

Very early in life he took part in the conferences among the young men of the congregation which were held under the presidency of the Rev. L. Holden, minister of the Presbyterian Chapel, Tenderden, from 1772 to 1844, under whom it was that the congregation developed out of Arianism into Unitarianism.

Missionary enterprise was strong in Kent in those days sixty years ago, when Harding and Richard Wright went about the country. And Mr. Mace was one of those who helped by lay preaching at Rolvenden, Benenden, Woodchurch, and other villages in the neighbourhood, one of the last occasions of doing so being at Battle in 1844. Occasionally, too, in later years he conducted service in his own chapel in the absence of Mr. Talbot, and once or twice has read lessons since Mr. Dendy has occupied the pulpit. The Sunday-school, the first of its kind in the town, was started largely under his auspices as early as the year 1820; and he retained his interest in it throughout life, teaching for nearly fifty years. In secular education also he took an important part, being a manager of the British Schools till within the last four or five years. The funeral took place on June 3, and was largely attended by members of the congregation and other friends, as was also the service on the following day, when a sermon was preached by the Rev. R. C. Dendy from the text, "Patient continuance in well doing."

THE REV. BENJAMIN LEPAUD GREEN.—IN MEMORIAM.

A bare announcement has appeared in these pages of the death at Bowden, near Manchester, on the 10th of May last, at the age of thirty-one, of the Rev. Benjamin Lepard Green, late of Evesham; but to those who knew and loved him—and the terms are almost synonymous—the mere announcement does not suffice. So gentle, so modest, so reserved a nature as his was could not be expected to make a name outside his own immediate circle; he was only known by few. The world has not lost a brilliant intellect, nor a strikingly eloquent preacher, but it would be the better for knowing even a little of one whose place is indeed difficult to fill, and who leaves many a heart richer for having for a time numbered him as friend and poorer for his loss. Mr. Green had the greatest disadvantages for doing a great work; he was perpetually weighed down by physical weakness; indeed, the disease which laid him low in the prime of early manhood had secretly preyed on him for years before he would own himself conquered by it. He was of so sensitive and highly strung a nature that the sins and the sorrows of all humanity oppressed him. He had left the early communion of his youth while unable quite to class himself with the body with whom he cast in his lot as affording him more liberty to speak what he felt to be the nearest truth. Of all men he, who was united to his family by the closest and tenderest affection, most regretted any disagreement with them; but, with all this, no man, whether rich or poor, orthodox or heterodox, ever approached him without a sense of his entire sincerity, devout religion and unbounded charity. He never attempted to proselytise; it was the aim of his life to sympathise with every shade of belief, and to follow in his own life as well as constantly to urge upon others the simple teaching of the gospels. One who differed from him as widely as is possible in mere creed declared him to be the "most Christlike man he ever knew." This is the universal feeling he inspired. No one ever heard him say an unkind word. He went about doing good in secret ways. He was as courteous and as friendly with the poor as the rich. His love of children was the passion of his life. Those who have seen his tall, emaciated figure, with the little ones clinging to him, with his worn, pale face lighted up with playful tenderness as he listened and talked with them as if he were one of them, will never forget the sight. He made them good by sheer love, for the most troublesome never heard any but the gentlest word from him. Those who were intemperate learnt temperance from him, those who were harsh learnt a kinder judgment, those who believed little saw in him a real and living faith which made itself recognised in deeds not words, those who were sorrowful were comforted by an intense sympathy. He was snatched out of the midst of so active and useful a life while his work was absorbingly interesting to him, and doomed first to months of patient endurance, during which he had to relinquish one by one his hopes of recovery, and return to busy life, and he suffered keenly, but he never complained; he thought of others, not of himself; he always had a hopeful word, and the same strong interest in the joys and occupations he had been obliged to lay down. The end was merciful, the pure spirit passed without a struggle, and death was only like sleep. His memory remains in loving hearts, and cannot die.

PERE HYACINTHE'S LECTURES.—On Monday afternoon M. Hyacinthe Loyson delivered in French, at St. James's Hall, the first of three lectures, undertaken for the benefit of the cause of Catholic Reform in France, on "The Duty of Christianity towards Judaism." The chair was taken by Lord Mount-Temple, who, in a few introductory remarks, referred in eulogistic terms to the services of the lecturer in his capacity of a religious reformer, and to his claims to the sympathy of English Protestants. In commencing, M. Loyson spoke of Christians of the present day as being in relation to God and religion descendants of the Jews of old. He also drew a powerful sketch of the social and family life and the monotheism of the ancient Israelites, contrasting these with the inferior social and family life and the polytheism and degrading corruptions of surrounding nations. Having paid this tribute to the remote past of the Jewish nation he turned to their history since the introduction of Christianity, gradually proceeding to modern times. After the destruction of Jerusalem, and with the rise of Christianity, there came, he said, a period of divorce from God, which was foretold in prophecy, and with it was combined a sort of fatalism, the Jews in this state of things enduring at the hands of Christians atrocities that exceeded even those of the present times—atrocities inflicted for imaginary crimes. If Christians wished the Jews to be converted to Christianity they must exhibit towards them the true spirit of Christianity. In the great French Revolution France began the work of emancipating the pariahs of society, the negroes, and the Jews, and England had since carried out that work so far as her power and influence extended. After alluding, in indignant and eloquent terms, to the recent persecutions of the Jews, he cited a statement that there are now two million Jews waiting to return to their own country, and he added that, in accordance with the principle of nationality, the new Eastern question would find its best solution in the presence of large numbers of the Israelite nation in Palestine, quoting prophecies of Hosea and Zechariah pointing to their ultimate return thither after all their wanderings and sufferings following the last great dispersion. On Thursday afternoon M. Loyson delivered his second lecture, the Dean of Westminster in the chair, and the subject being, "The Revelation of God in the World of To-day." In commencing, M. Loyson entered very elaborately into various aspects of what he termed the universal laws of nature and the question involved in them, and he maintained that the very word "laws," as used by scientific men, necessarily implied a legislator. After speaking of the "unwholesome era" in which we live, he proceeded to give a history of deism from the days of Bolingbroke and his philosophic friends to those of the first French Revolution, when he said results justified Bossuet's saying that deism was only a polished form of atheism. In an eloquent passage he said that while the Convention and its armies could defend the frontiers, overrun kingdoms, and enter foreign capitals, they could not conquer religion. He afterwards compared the God of the Positivist with the God of Christianity, the one a being who was above noticing or caring for humanity, the other one who heard the petitions and soothed the sorrows of all who looked to Him for help; and he declared with great animation that he would rather fall down before the idols of the pagoda than before the god of the Deist. M. Loyson concluded by contending, with the aid of numerous passages in the New Testament, that Jesus Christ must have been the Son of God in a sense quite peculiar to Himself, the alternative being actual misrepresentation in Scripture of His true character.—The final lecture will be delivered next Monday afternoon, the subject of it being "Christian Unity."

Our Calendar.

SUNDAY, JUNE 11.

LONDON.

Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, at Little Portland-street Chapel, at 11.15 A.M., "The Things that Remain," and 7 P.M. "The Parable of the Waves."
Rev. CHAS. VOYSEY, at Langham-hall, 43, Great Portland-street, 11.15 A.M.
Rev. JOHN WRIGHT, B.A., at New Gravel Pit Unitarian Chapel, at 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M.

THURSDAY, JUNE 15.

Annual Meeting of the Provincial Assembly at Chaw-bent.
Annual Meeting of the Western Unitarian and Free Christian Union at Trowbridge.

* Notices of Sunday Services are inserted in this Calendar at 6d. a line, and of other Meetings and Service gratis, provided a detailed Advertisement appears.

SELECTED BOOKS.

Aristotle's Psychology, by E. Wallace, 18/
Chronicle of Joshua the Stylite, by W. Wright, 10/6
Emerson (R. W.) Visits to England, by A. Ireland, 3/6
Forster's (F. E. Arnold) Heralds of the Cross, 7/6
James's (C.) Curiosities of Law and Lawyers, 7/6
Jevons's (W. S.) The State in Relation to Labour, 3/6
Long's (Mrs. W. H. C.) Peace and War in the Transvaal, 3/6
Longfellow (H. W.), a Biographical Sketch, by F. H. Underwood, 3/6
Natural Religion, by Author of "Ecce Homo," 9/
Notes on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, 2/6
Romanes's (G. J.) Animal Intelligence, 5/
Walpole's (C. G.) Short History of the Kingdom of Ireland, 10/6

BIRTHS.

GASKELL—On the 4th inst., at Grantchester, near Cambridge, the wife of Walter H. Gaskell, M.D., of a daughter.
MITCHELL—On the 4th inst., the wife of the Rev. W. Mitchell, Longsight, Manchester, of a son—Leonard Martineau.

MARRIAGES.

MAPPIN—HEWITT—On the 3rd inst., at St. James's, Piccadilly, by the Rev. Lionel Davidson, M.A., Joseph C. Mappin, of Broadfield, Reigate, to Mary Kate, widow of James W. Hewitt, of Stowmarket, and youngest daughter of Henry Clarke, Esq., St. Matthew's Lodge, Ipswich.
WINNER—FRETWELL—On the 5th inst., at Mill-hill Chapel, Leeds, by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., Franklin Winner, of Kegworth, Leicestershire, to Edith Marion, third surviving daughter of the late William Fretwell, of Leeds. No cards.

DEATH.

ALLEN—On the 2nd inst., at Montague Lodge, Ealing, Elizabeth Wilton, the beloved and only daughter of Marianne and the late Benjamin Allen, aged 30.

LONDON.—WEST-CENTRAL TEMPERANCE HOTEL, 97, 99, 101, Southampton-row, Russell-square.—Patronised and highly commended by the Rev. D. S. Govett, M.A., English Chaplain, Gibraltar; Rev. H. M. Holden, M.A., St. Bartholomew's, Bradford, Yorkshire; Rev. Canon French, M.A., Killaloe, Ireland, &c. Central, quiet, exceptionally clean, moderate in charges. Visitors' Drawing Room. Breakfast or Tea, 1s. 3d. Beds from 1s. 6d. Printed Tariff Card on application.

FREDERIC SMITH, Proprietor.

A LADY of experience in Tuition seeks an engagement as GOVERNESS. Thorough English, French, and German; also good Drawing.—Address, H. B., 14, Haymarket, Sheffield.

SITUATION as UNDER NURSE wanted for a Girl, aged 15. She has been in her first place for more than a year. Can assist in house work and plain needlework.—Address, A. B., care of Miss WARREN, the Manor House, Streatham, S.W.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK.—Current Accounts opened according to the usual practice of other Bankers, and Interest allowed on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £25. No commission charged for keeping Accounts.

The Bank also receives money on Deposit at Three per cent. Interest, repayable on demand.

The Bank undertakes, for its Customers, free of charge, the custody of Deeds, Writings, and other Securities and Valuables; the collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the purchase and sale of Stocks and Shares.

Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued.

A Pamphlet, with full particulars, on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane.

THE BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY'S ANNUAL RECEIPTS EXCEED FOUR MILLIONS.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH, with Immediate Possession, and no Rent to pay. Apply at the Office the BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH, with Immediate Possession, either for Building or Gardening purposes. Apply at the Office of the BIRKBECK FREE HOLD LAND SOCIETY.

A Pamphlet, with full particulars, on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane.

DIXON'S IRON CHAPELS, SCHOOLS, &c.

ARE tasteful in Design, Economical, Durable, made of the Best Materials, and erected in the most careful manner. Can be taken down, removed, and re-erected at small cost.

Careful comparison of Specifications, Structural and Architectural details, Materials and Workmanship are invited before placing orders.

IRON CHURCHES, &c., usually on hand or in progress at the Works.

IRON BUILDINGS for all purposes and all Climates.

Catalogues, Designs, Estimates, and all information on application.

ISAAC DIXON, WINDSOR IRON WORKS, LIVERPOOL.

SEASONABLE DELICACY.

BROWN & POLSON'S CORN FLOUR

As Blanc-Mange, Custard, Baked Pudding, &c.

WITH

STEWED FRUIT

OF ANY KIND.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

WORK OF UNITARIANS IN THE PAST AND THE FUTURE. The Sermon Preached at the Annual Meeting, May 31, in Unity Church, Islington, by the Rev. Dr. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE. Price One Penny. Fifty copies will be sent, carriage free, for 3s.; one hundred for 5s. A large edition having been printed with a view to the widest possible circulation.

SERMONS, by ROBERT COLLYER. Cheap Issue. Price 2s.

POSITIVE ASPECTS OF UNITARIAN THOUGHT AND DOCTRINE. Cheap Edition, 1s.

TEXTS AND MARGINS OF THE REVISED NEW TESTAMENT. By Dr. G. VANCE SMITH, 1s.

A Cheap Edition of this work is now issued, price 3d.

Address, Miss C. PHILPOT, Bookroom, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London.

Just Published, price Half-a-Crown.

THE BRAHMO YEAR-BOOK FOR 1881 (No. VI.). Brief Records of Work and Life in the Theistic Churches of India. Edited by SOPHIA DOBSON COLLET.

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE, London and Edinburgh.

PRESENT RELIGION, VOL. III.

Now Ready, forming part of the above,

COMPARATIVE ETHICS.

I. MORAL STANDPOINT.

By SARA S. HENNELL. In paper covers, 68 pages, price 2s.

TRUBNER AND CO., LONDON.

NOTICE.

NEW GRAVEL PIT UNITARIAN CHAPEL, PARADISE-PLACE, HACKNEY.

The Rev. JOHN WRIGHT, B.A., has kindly consented to preach the Annual School Sermons on SUNDAY, JUNE 11. Collections will be made on behalf of the Day and Sunday Schools. An Anthem will be sung.

WESTERN UNITARIAN AND FREE CHRISTIAN UNION.

The ANNUAL MEETING will be held at TROW-BRIDGE, on June 15. Business Meeting, 3 p.m.; Public Tea, 5 p.m.; Religious Service, 6.30 p.m., will be introduced by the Rev. F. W. STANLEY, of Bath. Preacher: the Rev. A. N. BLATCHFORD, B.A.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Mrs. HOOD will be pleased to receive a few GIRLS to board and educate. Special arrangements made for delicate girls during the winter months.—Address, care of the Rev. ALFRED HOOD, Bournemouth.

HIGH SCHOOL, STOKE GREEN, NEAR COVENTRY, established (1865) by the Rev. G. HRAVINSIDE, B.A., of University and Manchester New Colleges, London, promotes a Liberal Education at a moderate cost.

MOUNT VERNON HIGH SCHOOL, NOTTINGHAM.

Boys carefully prepared for the Universities, Public Schools, or for Business. Vacancies.

SCHOOL RE-OPENS, May 8, 1882.

EDWIN SMITH, M.A., Head Master.

BRENTWOOD, WORSLEY, near MANCHESTER.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal ... MRS. F. SHAWCROSS,

late of Brook House, Knutsford.

The NEXT TERM begins MONDAY, May 8.

For prospectus, apply to the Principal.

"THE FORT, MARGATE."—APARTMENTS in a well-furnished house, facing the sea, on moderate terms. Address, Mrs. Stabback, Lansdowne Lodge, the Fort Margate.

BRIGHTON.—Apartments, with or without Board, at Miss Wood's, 12, Lower Rock Gardens. Three minutes from Madeira-walk and the Chain Pier.

WANTED, early in September, a comfortable HOME for a young Gentleman about to enter a Solicitor's Office in Birmingham. The neighbourhood of Edgbaston preferred.—Address, Mr. C. W. JOLLY, Bath.

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE, UNIVERSITY HALL, GORDON-SQUARE, LONDON.

"The College adheres to its original principle of freely imparting Theological knowledge, without insisting on the adoption of particular Theological doctrines."

The ANNUAL EXAMINATION will be held in the Hall, on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, the 19th, 20th, and 21st June, 1882.

The Rev. H. W. CROSSKEY, LL.D., will deliver the ADDRESS to the Students on Wednesday, 21st June, at Half-past Four o'clock p.m.

The ANNUAL MEETING of Trustees will be held in the Library, on Thursday, 22nd June, at Eleven o'clock a.m. SPECIAL BUSINESS will be brought forward for Consideration at this Meeting, and the Trustees will receive due notice of this by Circular.

A VALEDICTORY RELIGIOUS SERVICE will be held at Eight p.m., on Thursday, 22nd June, in Little Portland-street Chapel. The FAREWELL, on behalf of the College, will be given by the Principal, the Rev. JAMES MARTINEAU, D.D., LL.D., and the WELCOME into the Ministry by the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL.

R. D. DARBISHIRE, Esq., B.A.,
26, George-street, Manchester;
Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A., } Secs.
Geo Cross, Manchester.

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE.

The ANNUAL DINNER of the Past and Present Students of the College will be held on WEDNESDAY, 21st June, at the INNS OF COURT HOTEL, Lincoln's-inn-fields, at 6 p.m. Friends and Ladies may be invited; and those intending to be present are requested to leave their names with the Senior Student, Manchester New College, University Hall, Gordon-square, not later than the 20th inst.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

The following addition should be made to the first Resolution of the Annual Meeting as advertised last week:—

"That this Meeting desires to place on record its affirmation of the principle that the profession of Atheism should not deprive any citizen of his civil rights, including that of representing his fellow citizens in Parliament if duly elected, and directs the Executive Committee to take every fitting opportunity of petitioning both Houses of Legislature in this sense."

HENRY IERSON, Secretary.

BLACKFRIARS MISSION.

Subscriptions towards the CHILDRENS' TRIP gladly received by Miss PHILPOT, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, and by the Minister, the Rev. Geo. WOOLLES, 21, Great Charlotte-street, Blackfriars-road, S.E.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF PRESBYTERIAN AND UNITARIAN MINISTERS AND CONGREGATIONS OF LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

MEETING for 1882.

The Assembly will meet in CHOWBENT, on THURSDAY, June 15, 1882. The Religious Service will be held in the Chapel at a Quarter to Eleven, the Devotional Part being conducted by the Rev. R. PILCHER, B.A., and the Sermon being preached by the Rev. E. S. HOWES, B.A.

Lunch will be provided in the School-room at Twelve o'clock.

The MEETING for BUSINESS will be held in the Chapel at Half-past One, and will be opened with the delivery of the Minister's Address.

A substantial Tea will be provided in the School-room, at Four o'clock, at a charge of Two Shillings and Sixpence; after which a MEETING will be held at Five o'clock in the Chapel, CALKE WRIGHT, Esq., J.P., in the Chair. Addresses will be delivered by the Revs. R. L. CARPENTER, B.A., J. HARWOOD, B.A., and Cuthbert Grundy, Esq.

WILLIAM GASKELL, President.
H. ENFIELD DOWSON, Secretary.

WEST-RIDING UNITARIAN MISSION SOCIETY.

The SIXTY-SEVENTH ANNUAL MEETING of the above Mission will be held at YORK, on WEDNESDAY, June 21, 1882. Service will be held at St. Saviour-gate Chapel, at 12.30 p.m. Preacher: the Rev. T. W. FRECKENROSE, of London. To be followed by a Luncheon in the Kenrick Hall, Spens-lane, at 1.45 p.m. Tickets 2s. 6d. each.

Afterwards the Annual Meeting will be held, commencing at 3 o'clock p.m., under the Presidency of J. S. MATHERS, Esq., of Leeds.

WILLM. BLAZEBY, B.A., Secretary.

Printed by WOODFALL and KINDER, of Milford-lane, Strand W.C.; and Published for the Proprietors by WALTER MAWER, at the Offices of the SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London, W.C.—Saturday, June 10, 1882.

The Inquirer.

A Religious, Political, & Literary Newspaper, & Record of Reberent Free Chongpi.

[REGISTERED AT THE GENERAL POST-OFFICE AS A NEWSPAPER.]

No. 2086.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 17, 1882.

[PRICE 5D.]

CONTENTS.

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:—

The Deceased Wife's Sister Bill ...	389
The Church Attendance Problem.—III....	389
Sunday Schools and Bible Teaching ...	391
Mr. Forsyth's Letter—an Explanation ...	391
General Assembly of Irish Presbyterians...	392
Our Churches and the People ...	393

OCCASIONAL NOTES ...

REVIEWS:—

Spinoza ...	395
Short Notices ...	397
Literary Notes ...	397

OUR CONTEMPORARIES ...

CORRESPONDENCE:—

Garibaldi ...	399
The Resurrection of Jesus... ..	399
The Churches and the People ...	400

THE LIBERAL PULPIT:—

Dr. James Freeman Clarke's Association Sermon ...	400
--	-----

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE:—

Lancashire and Cheshire Unitarian Churches	401
--	-----

THE DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER BILL.

THERE is practical wisdom in introducing this Bill into the House of Lords instead of into the House of Commons. If it can be carried in the Lords it is sure of passing through the Commons, where its principle has been repeatedly affirmed by increasing majorities. In the House of Lords last year the introduction of the Bill was made memorable by the marked adhesion of the Prince of WALES and the Duke of EDINBURGH, and partly through their influence the majority against the Bill was diminished to twelve. This year the four Royal brothers gave their votes in favour of the Bill, and the majority was further diminished to four. As several peers, both Conservative and Liberal, were absent from unavoidable causes who were known to be favourable to the measure, it is almost certain that next year the minority will be converted into a majority, and the Bill will be carried through all its stages, if the whole time of the Lower House is not occupied with the question of Home Rule, or some other phase of the many-sided Irish question. The Royal assent is about to be given to a similar measure which has just passed through all the stages of the Dominion Parliament. It will be too great a practical absurdity to legalise these marriages in Canada and Australia and to continue to proscribe them in the mother country with all the attendant civil disabilities and social penalties.

The debate on Monday [was remarkable for its moderation and good sense. Lord DALHOUSIE moved the second reading in a masterly speech, which exhausted the argument in favour of the Bill. He wisely declined to enter upon the Scriptural argument, and dealt chiefly with the social aspect of the question, that is, whether or not it is a measure for the general good of the community. We place our advocacy of the Bill on what we regard as the higher ground, that where a measure is not wrong in itself and not opposed to the general good of the community there ought to be no prohibitive law. The broad principle is that in the question of marriage freedom ought to be the rule when no moral law is violated. It is not a question as to whether public opinion is in favour of this Bill or otherwise: it is not a question as to whether marriages of the kind which it is proposed to legalise are desirable or not. It is absurd to assert with Mr. MATTHEW ARNOLD and others that every man has the whole world of womankind outside the circle of consanguinity, except his own sister-in-law. If men desire to marry their sisters-in-law, and believe that under certain circumstances such unions are the best they can form, it is a hardship and a wrong that the law should interfere and prohibit marriages which are innocent in themselves, are not opposed to the social well-being, and are sanctioned by the voice of public opinion, excepting that of a prejudiced body of ill-informed religionists. In the absence of any just grounds for legal prohibition, the question of expediency may be left to the consideration of the persons immediately concerned; and, as Lord DALHOUSIE remarked, the experience of our colonies, which one after another are now legalising these marriages, may be regarded as negating the unfavourable prophecies in which the opponents of the measure are prone to indulge.

In the three speeches which followed, the old Scriptural argument, founded on a mistaken interpretation of a well-known passage in the book of Leviticus, was relied upon only by Lord BALFOUR of Burleigh, a Presbyterian Scotch peer, who approached the consideration of the subject with all the narrow theological prejudices of his sect. Lord WATERFORD, who supported the Bill, and the Bishop of PETERBOROUGH, who opposed it, with his usual fervour and eloquence, both expressly repudiated the theological argument, which is coming to be less and less relied upon in the consideration of questions of even weightier moment. In questions of this or any other social and political character a textual argument from the Old Testament, unless it is in harmony with natural law and universal moral obligation, has really no force whatever.

No delusive theory of Scripture infallibility can make that right which is not conformed to the unwritten law of GOD in nature and conscience, or can make that wrong which is in the nature of things innocent or indifferent. This is the voice of the greatest moralists of all ages; and it would be well that the Churches should learn as quickly as possible the primary lesson that even if the disputed text in Leviticus were as strongly against us as we believe it to be strongly in our favour, this modern age is in no wise bound by the Levitical law, which was instituted solely for a peculiar people in the infancy of religion and of civilisation. It is obvious that even those who appeal to the Levitical code—the wisdom of which for its age and purpose we fully recognise—do so only when it suits their own purpose or their theological prejudices, and entirely reject or disregard other portions of that code which they profess to believe have the same sanction of Divine authority. Our Orthodox friends should at least try to be consistent on this and many other questions of a similar character.

There is but one other argument we need notice, that on which the Bishop of PETERBOROUGH relied in his rhetorical speech, supported by the Times and the Conservative press generally. It is asked where are the supporters of the Bill to stop? If the restrictions based upon affinity as distinguished from consanguinity are no longer to be binding, why not legalise the marriage of a woman with a deceased husband's brother, or of a man with a deceased wife's niece? Well, for our own part we have the courage of our convictions, and are prepared to maintain that there is no natural or moral objection to such marriages, and that there ought to be no restrictions of affinity whatever. They may be undesirable, they may be opposed to public sentiment. In that case leave them to the judgment of society and public opinion, but do not multiply artificial and factitious prohibitions. The objection, however, such as it is, has no practical validity. The question of marriage with a deceased wife's sister has to be considered on its own merits above. Other marriages of affinity are not within the sphere of "practical politics." If ever they become general and are sanctioned by public opinion aproposed further alteration of the law will have to be duly considered, and in this case we may remind our Orthodox opponents, the weight of scripture authority and ancient Jewish practice is strongly in favour of the very class of marriages which they regard with so great aversion.

THE CHURCH ATTENDANCE PROBLEM.

III.—MORAL AND SOCIAL OBSTACLES.

THE moral and social obstacles in the way of popular attendance at public worship keep away a much larger number than the intellectual difficulties referred to in a former article. At the Congregational Union meeting the Rev. EDWARD WHITE took up this aspect of the question, and discussed it with commendable plainness of speech. In the front he puts what is, of course, the principal cause—the alienation of mind which great numbers feel from all religion, all religious services, and association. There can be no doubt that this is the chief obstacle, and how to remove it is the great question. Vast multitudes are conscious of a certain unfitness for religious association and worship. They do not feel at home in church or chapel.

The ministrations of religion are unmeaning or distasteful to them. They are more than indifferent—they dislike all religious profession. Their tone of thought, their habits of life, their daily associations and surroundings, the objects and pursuits that interest them all are absolutely foreign to religion. The restraint which religious profession imposes they do not like. The subjects of religious instruction lie altogether beyond their limited range of thought and interest. Can we wonder, then, that they are utter strangers to church or chapel? They have no faith in either, or what is taught therein. Practically they live without God in the world. All this applies to the working-class, especially in our large towns, and to the same class more or less throughout the kingdom.

"Intimately connected with this moral alienation are," says Mr. WHITE, "the domestic habits of excessive drinking and smoking; and the smoking morning, noon, and night of the artisan class has quite as much as the drinking to do with it. Few things indispose a working man to devote a Sunday morning to learning religious truth more than the strong and early dose of tobacco. His real weariness, aided by the effect of the sedative, renders him lazy, and a stroll in the fields or a spell at the weekly newspaper thus offers much greater attraction than the ordinary service. The women regard Sunday as a day for special dressing, special cleaning, and special cooking, and if they get their children ready for school, they think they have done enough in all conscience in the way of religion. It requires a greater revolution in the domestic and personal habits of the million than middle class folks are aware of for them to become regular frequenters of churches and chapels." Every one acquainted with the habits of the working class will know that this is perfectly true. These are some of the social obstacles that interfere with their attendance at public worship. The effort which it requires to break through these social customs, and rise to a simpler, cleaner, healthier life is much greater than many suppose. If, however, the effort were all, there would be some hope. Unfortunately, they are not disposed to make the effort; and where the will is wanting there is, of course, no inducement to try.

Again, Mr. WHITE is of opinion that the people very widely consider church going an expensive luxury, more suitable to the middle and upper classes than to wage-earning folk; and that if all the seats in the churches were free one evening in the month a considerable number of fresh hearers would be attracted to the sanctuary. We think he somewhat over-estimates this difficulty, except in the case where there are high pew rents, which probably would keep many away. But the experience of Methodism goes to show that the financial difficulty can be successfully met. No congregations contain a larger number of the working class, and none raise more money for church, school, and missionary purposes. No chapels have so many collections as Methodist chapels, yet none are so frequented by the humbler class. The contributions separately are small but frequent, and they make up together a truly magnificent total.

Other social aspects of the question before us are referred to by Mr. WHITE in these terms:—

Then the system of public amusements and excursions is not only expensive, but very enticing, very exhilarating and very wearying, and is brought to bear upon the public, especially on Saturdays, thus leaving the people indisposed on Sunday for the exertion and confinement involved in going to meetings to hear discourses, too often dealing chiefly with an unseen and distant state of being rather than with the kingdom of God here and now. The tone of the Press, too, has something to do with discouraging the visits of the population to the churches and meeting houses. The favourite popular journals are seldom, I fear, written by men who believe earnestly in Christ, more often by those who are glad of any opportunity of representing science and religion as opposing forces. Large numbers of the people are now saturated with the notion that the Bible, as it stands, can no longer be honestly defended as the record of a real divine revelation. The only remedy for this evil is to show that the Bible rightly interpreted—interpreted literally as it stands—is in striking accordance with all the real discoveries of science, and is the only book which meets man's case as a perishing sinner. It is not mere vagueness in doctrinal teaching that we require, but more definiteness. If you persist in telling the people that the Bible contains no definite truth on the nature of God or the destiny of man, you can scarcely expect that the masses will come to church to hear that.

We suppose that our readers like ourselves will find in the above paragraph some things said with which they agree, and some from which they dissent. That the Saturday excursions and amusements of various kinds indispose a great number of persons for attendance at church and chapel, especially to hear long and dreary sermons, is, we think, highly probable. And it is a hindrance not likely to become less in future. The Saturday half holiday, and the numerous excursions absorbing part or the whole of Sunday, cannot fail to have a prejudicial influence on attendance at public worship. With regard to the Bible we differ from Mr. WHITE that when interpreted literally it will always be found in harmony with science. Such a statement, to say the least, is rash and misleading. A clever sceptic would desire nothing better than to take the opening chapters of the Bible and pin him down to this statement. It is precisely this extravagant pretension on behalf of the Bible advanced by its over-zealous defenders that makes it an obstacle in the way of many minds not wanting in reverence, but at the same time earnestly truth-seeking and rational.

Mr. WHITE emphasises with considerable force the view which regards a Christian Church as a spiritual society in virtue of which it becomes "a focus of spiritual light and heat, a school of truth, a temple of true worship, a hospital for wounded souls, a home for God's sons and daughters, a centre of industry for willing workmen, and a foundation of salvation for all their neighbours." He pours contempt on the notion of getting multitudes together in large buildings as seat-holders, and calling that promiscuous assembly a church.

If ever independent churches abandon their fundamental principles and begin a struggle with a corrupt nationalism for the mere possession of the population; when building in brick and timber becomes the most visible aim, and not spiritual edification, in truth-speaking, truth-acting, truth-spreading; when the destruction of rival and erring systems occupies more thought than creative work and self-reforming labour—why, Independency has forgotten its primordial law of being. Its preachers in the determination to win, as seat-holders, the promiscuous crowd, will, under such conditions, lose the divine authority which goes with a heavenly commission, and some of its foremost heroes, in their zealous efforts to please the comedy-loving multitudes, will be in no small danger of converting the pulpit into the stage.

This is plain speaking, but not more than is needed in these days when so much is made of merely building churches and chapels, and "by hook or by crook," getting the multitude into them. Another noteworthy paragraph with which we are quite in accord is the following:—

Whenever the God of whom religion speaks is not a being whose moral attributes commend themselves to the conscience, that religion offers no support to morality. This is the reason why much church teaching has so little authority in the world. God is falsely represented as doing things in the government of the world, which, if any other moral being did them, we should say he was neither just nor good. That is one reason why I have always maintained that until the medieval notions on God's character are displaced by the teaching of Christ and his apostles, we are working on the surrounding population at an immense disadvantage, and weakening theology and morality both at once. In order to produce intense earnestness in outsiders, we must have something which we ourselves can heartily believe. In order to attract the world of sinners, there must be something of the joyful and pitiful affectionateness which in Christ himself drew the worst sinners around him. Thank God for what advances we have made in right thought; but I grieve to say that one of the chief reasons alleged by skilled workmen for not flocking to the churches is because there is often so little to satisfy a man's understanding, to guide his conscience, or to warm his heart.

And the conclusion to which Mr. WHITE is led is this:—

If we go the right way about it, the people can be reached, reached by teaching what the Bible teaches, and in the method which the Bible teaches. All divine teaching is interesting. In nature God teaches, and we are never weary of learning science and poetry there at his feet. In the Bible God teaches by history, by pungent comment on conduct, by argument, by pathetic appeal, by genuine kindness towards man, and therefore it is we are never weary of the Bible. But if God had dropped out of heaven a volume of sermons like so many now published in Paternoster-row, full of abstractions, and deficient in point and passion, few of us would care to read it a second time. We have a tremendous business before us, to reach the English people with genuine Christianity. We must make that positive work our chief concern, not the destruction of any false system, theological or political.

We have quoted these extracts from Mr. WHITE's paper because they contain much that applies as forcibly to us as to the Orthodox Congregationalists. They describe our work as truly as they do theirs. As we have said again and again, it is not mere negative teaching or destructive criticism that will do, but wise teaching, in harmony with the facts of nature and of human experience, and, as regards the Bible, a teaching discriminating carefully between its transient and its permanent elements, between legend and history, between the fancies of superstition, the misconceptions of ignorance, and the everlasting truths of religion.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS AND BIBLE-TEACHING.

EVERY good intention is followed by more or less of good result; but the impulses of sincere minds are not quite so valuable in their effects as the more thoughtful energy of wise ones. Clear perceptions do not always accompany honourable endeavours. When we have weighed the evidence for and against Sunday-schools as they have hitherto been conducted in general, we have often doubted whether the good in the end was in fair proportion to the labour bestowed upon the means. We have always greatly respected Sunday-school teachers, for they are earnest and self-sacrificing. When we consider how delicately-nurtured young girls and refined young men will often on wintry Sunday afternoons leave the warm fireside of home and the bright family circle to go to church or chapel through wind and rain and frost and snow, and sit down with poor children in a comfortless school-room, there to be wearied and confused by the monotonous murmur of multitudinous voices, and often pained by the outbreak of coarse manners; and all this Sunday after Sunday, year after year, from a sense of duty to humanity and to God, our sympathies and affections cling to these unselfish young teachers; we thank them from the bottom of our hearts, and regard them as the conservators of that moral sympathy which is so necessary to prevent the rich from disdainful the poor and the poor from distrusting the rich—so necessary to preserve outward order and inward peace in the habits and temper of this busy, struggling world. There is not much harmony and mutual goodwill between class and class even in the present advanced state of civilisation, but there would have been much less probably had it not been for the influence of Sunday-schools in promoting an intercourse between high and low and rich and poor. Well, that is one side of the picture, and a pleasant one; but there is another, somewhat different in aspect. What is the teaching of the Sunday-school? What is its intellectual value? In so far as it takes a theological and dogmatic turn we fear that its value must be placed very low indeed, not very far from zero; and when we think of the noble youths and maidens just referred to assuming the function of Scripture expositors, and undertaking the instruction of what are called "Bible classes," we confess we are somewhat amazed that they do not shrink from an office for which, in the great majority of cases, they must necessarily be unprepared. In some Sunday-school classes there is judiciously no attempt at Scripture exposition. A good and entertaining book is read, a sweet hymn is sung, personal cleanliness, temperance, and quiet manners are enforced and illustrated. Restraint is imposed when restraint is needed. Encouragement and cheering words are given when young minds faint in difficulty and weariness. That, in many cases, is all that passes between teacher and pupils. And a very good "all" too, for it is this which keeps open the channels of influence between human heart and human heart, between adults in one position and children in another, and enables the salt of the earth to be strewn in places that need to be salted.

But while we deprecate Bible-teaching from necessarily half-informed and poorly-qualified minds, filled with preconceived notions about Scriptural inspiration, we much wish that thoughtful, intelligent people would study the Bible more than they do. Life in this feverish nineteenth century, which is all noise and excitement, struggle and competition, needs a tranquilising waft of spiritual air from devout minds of old in the contemplative, worshipping, Oriental world. In the midst of all our grinding and weaving, our brewing and distilling, our buying, selling, gambling, racing, feasting, play-going, and other fever-heat activities, it would do us good to hear, at least on one day in the week, a still small voice whispering in the pauses of the whirlwind; to listen to such tones as came from the lips of ISAIAH and other great prophets of Israel; to such pathos, penitence, and joyous gratitude as thrilled through the heart of poor, erring, impulsive DAVID; to such earnestness as enkindled the spirit of the noble PAUL, and to such breathings of beauty and tenderness as came from JESUS of Nazareth. All this is to be found in the Bible, but mixed with so much dross and earthy matter that, until the material has been sifted and strained through good mental colanders, it is hardly to be considered in a state of wholesome efficiency. Very few, indeed, of Sunday-school teachers understand the Bible sufficiently well to become its expounders to the illiterate and the young.

We sadly want a new edition of the Bible, with its various books arranged in their chronological order as far as that has been ascertained, with the authors' names and approximate dates given at the head of each composition, and a supplementary account, in succinct language, of the political, social, local, and general circumstances of the times and places in which the various writings were produced. As for notes and commentaries on the Bible, we have great abundance of them in rather ponderous dry-as-dust tomes; but as for any really valuable, well-condensed information, historical, archæological, geographical, locally descriptive and explanatory, bound up with the Bible itself, we have never yet seen such a volume.

A great many things may incidentally serve a spiritual and sacred purpose which do not come under the head of what is commonly called religious teaching; and of late some stress has been laid on the refining, spiritualising influence of science and art. And with a view to the diffusion of this influence among the poor and artisan classes pressure is being put upon the Government to obtain the opening on Sundays of all our national museums and picture galleries. It is thought by many that these might subserve the purpose of Sunday-schools in reformation of behaviour, but with wider range of instruction in general things. We know of no harm that could result from such opening, and, therefore, wish well to the endeavour; but we are not particularly sanguine as to any immediate good, for museums do not teach much to the uninitiated unless the curators or their assistants go round to explain; and as to picture galleries, there is at present so much jargon and conventional phrase about Fine Art that simple folks are at a loss to know what it means. A picture ought to be "a thing of beauty and a joy for ever"; and yet there are pictures of the highest degree of technical merit in relation to drawing and colour that are in choice of subject utterly uninteresting and even sometimes repulsive. Humanity needs the exhibition of fine natures more urgently than a show of the fine arts. Every richly-stored, highly-cultivated mind is a sort of museum that should be opened to other minds comparatively empty. Every fine imagination all aglow with the light and colour and grace of beautiful and heavenly things is a picture gallery that should be visited by those whose minds are circumscribed by bare walls or else hung round with coarse and degrading fancies. The best museums and picture galleries are to be found in the bosoms of cultivated men and women. The purest natures will put forth the purest arts. Let these find their way if possible into our Sunday and other schools, not merely by plans and arrangements of an outward technical character (very needful in their way), but chiefly through the agency of minds qualified for the work by a due blending of the needful light with the still more needful love.

We have had few opportunities of late years of observing how Sunday-schools are conducted by Unitarian Churches. We have no doubt they take the lead in things rational and reasonable. We are pretty certain they do not put forth myths and fables as historic facts and incidents; that they do not place Old Testament cosmogony, geology, and biology above the authority of well-conducted scientific inquiry; and that they do not teach the marvellous as being more important than the true. And yet it has been thought by some observers that the evangelical and orthodox, notwithstanding their narrow dogmas, manage to reach the hearts of their Sunday-school scholars rather better than do the Unitarians. Is it really so? And, if so, why? Some have thought that there is a little too much stateliness and assumption of dignity among our accomplished ladies and gentlemen. When they leave their social pedestals with honest intentions to do some good on their common level of humanity they are apt (some say) to do so in a manner unpleasantly resembling airs of condescension. If that blunder has ever been made it is not likely to be made again, now that it is well known how sensitive the poor are to that tacit though unintentional insult which regards them as inferiors and not as brethren.

Sabbath observances and Sunday-schools are needful for humanity, and, therefore, will not pass away. They are wanted to give a religious bias to the national character, and to make a spiritual purpose work more effectually in the necessary industry of mundane affairs. They are wanted as helps to bring down from on high the calm, the heavenly, the pure, the beautiful, and the sweet, in order that they may temper that selfish, hard-strained vigilance of mind which now, alas! seems one of the requisites for success in the world. The refining, elevating work is not half done yet; but it goes on, very slowly perhaps; still it goes on. Good books and good apparatus of all kinds are being brought into the schools. But no deep, abiding success can be realised by means that are merely outward. It needs in the trainers and teachers of the young a spirit somewhat akin to that which throbbed ages ago in the bosoms of a few poor fishermen of Galilee, of a certain tent maker at Tarsus, and of a gentle carpenter's Son.

MR. FORSYTH'S LETTER—AN EXPLANATION.

In a recent article on "The London Domestic Mission," we spoke of that society as "an essentially undenominational institution, founded for the purpose of promoting the practical Christian life quite apart from any sectarian interests or mere dogmatic purpose." We stated that Mr. Stopford Brooke was invited to preside, as Mr. Picton and his successor, Mr. Forsyth, were invited to attend, on the ground of our "common Christianity, which is paramount to all denominational distinctions." We expressed a hope that at future meetings of this and other of our religious societies we should be honoured more and more "with the presence and co-operation not only of men like Mr. Brooke, who, whether inside or outside of the Established Church, has for years been more or less in conscious sympathy with us, but of men like Mr. Picton and Mr. Forsyth, who still occupy a somewhat outside position, while no doubt owning much in common with a denomination which is aggressive chiefly against sin and ignorance and misery, and dogmatic only in its resolute protest against all dogmatic limitations."

Now, we put it to the candour and common sense of our readers whether in this avowal of a broad and Catholic form of Christianity there is any approach to a desire to make sectarian capital out of the presence of gentlemen whom we are always glad to welcome. Is there anything whatever to justify the charge which Mr. Forsyth has recently made against us—in the most friendly and courteous way—and which our admirable contemporary the Christian World has last week endorsed in not quite so friendly a tone, that the "Inquirer is apt to drag into its camp any whom it found straggling for a moment from their own host, and even to detain those who paid a friendly visit to the Unitarian tents"? Or, whether we deserve implied censure for "this proneness of ours to make too much of some common ground," which it is also alleged is "one of the things that make it so difficult and dangerous to visit our societies."

On one point alone we were mistaken, and we acknowledge our error. Mr. Forsyth, it appears, was not, as his successor Mr. Picton was, an invited visitor at the recent meeting of the London Domestic Mission. It was not a very serious or culpable error, and we hope it has not greatly compromised Mr. Forsyth's reputation for orthodoxy—such as it is. But we must add that it was not an unnatural mistake, in view of the fact that Mr. Forsyth's congregation remains in the cold shade outside the pale of any orthodox association, that several Unitarian ministers have supplied its pulpit, and that it is an "open secret" that not long before Mr. Forsyth's election it was a moot question whether a well-known Unitarian minister would not be invited to occupy the pulpit which he now fills with so much distinction.

Now, let us add as a simple matter of fact that we have not claimed Mr. Forsyth as a Unitarian, any more than we have claimed his friend Mr. John Hunter, the Liberal Congregationalist minister of York, who resented a little too warmly our recent articles pointing out the essential heterodoxy of his valuable theological lectures. We should not think of doing so in either case unless these gentlemen had expressed their adherence as decisively as Mr. Stopford Brooke did at the late meeting of the Domestic Mission. To Mr. Hunter's somewhat acrimonious letter we replied in a former article, and we need only add that in his case we dealt, as we have a perfect right to do, with simple matters of fact. We took his lectures one by one, as reported in the Christian World, analysed their contents, and showed in a series of articles entitled "Dissolving Views of Orthodoxy" that on every fundamental question they gave up the old Orthodox dogmas, and stated views essentially in harmony with those of Liberal Christianity. This is simply a matter of fact, and we advanced abundant evidence in proof of our position. Mr. Hunter himself may not choose to acknowledge that there is so much common ground between us; may still hold opinions respecting the Incarnation and the Atonement, which a genuine Orthodox dogmatist of the old school would stigmatise as heretical and rationalistic; but the fact remains just the same, and we only exercised our simple duty as public journalists in drawing attention to so interesting a sign of theological progress. We have done just the same in regard to the late Dean Stanley, Professor Jowett, and other Broad Church thinkers, and have reason to know that these eminent men so far from resenting the imputation, have been gratified to find that there was so much common ground on which we could meet.

We have no desire to enter into any controversy respecting Mr. Forsyth's interesting letter, which we have no doubt most of our friends read with great interest, even when they differed widely from some of its opinions, wherein, however, for our own part we discern much essential truth underneath somewhat ambiguous phraseology. It sufficiently appears from his own explanation that he is "an outsider" in regard to the denomination in which he was educated, that he has been rejected by "official Congregationalism;" and while we have no wish whatever to represent him as holding our own theological views when he expressly repudiates them, or to compromise whatever reputation he may have for Orthodoxy, we cannot but express our regret that our own churches are not gathered together under a sufficiently broad religious designation to include all who profess and call themselves "Liberal Christians" in one religious communion, bound together by common moral and spiritual affinities amid all our diversities of theological opinion. It is because we fondly hope that the Unitarian Churches in the main desire to occupy so broad a position and to repudiate all narrow sectarian limitations that we ventured to speak of Mr. Picton and Mr. Forsyth, and others of the same school, as not altogether outside our religious communion, by no means intending to claim from them any close theological concurrence. And if there are any dogmatic limitations, expressed or implied, which prevent such men from occupying our free pulpits, and speaking their whole mind, and uniting with us in our unsectarian Domestic Mission work, we can only heartily regret their existence, and express the earnest hope that they may speedily be abolished.

Finally, let us assure our friendly and most liberal-minded contemporary the Christian World that there is not the slightest danger of any of the ministers of other denominations being claimed as our own when they courageously venture on a visit to our camp. At the present time a well-known Congregationalist minister is regularly conducting the services at one of our oldest metropolitan chapels, but although he has ventured into the very midst of our camp, he has not been claimed as a Unitarian, nor is there the slightest desire to interfere with the relations he may still desire to retain with the Congregationalist denomination and its various societies. Let our orthodox and semi-orthodox friends learn to be a little more courageous and less nervously apprehensive of being compromised by any show of liberality. Let them continue to pay us friendly visits, and perhaps they will find in time that we have more in common than they have been accustomed to think; and that, notwithstanding theological differences, we may learn much from each other.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF IRISH PRESBYTERIANS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Looked at from an impartial standpoint, the meeting of the Irish General Assembly last week cannot be regarded as a great matter. The proceedings were enlivened by the annual debate upon the instrumental music question, but the smallness of the majority against the introduction of instruments—fifteen only—shows that the subject is at last thrashed out. The Sustentation Fund was reported to be in anything but a satisfactory condition, and the statistics generally were far from encouraging. The diminution of members was accounted for by the fact that emigration was still going on, and the deficiency of contributions, both to the Sustentation and other funds, was attributed not to the poverty of the people, but to lack of energy on the part of collectors. It would have been better to acknowledge at once that the real cause is, that the people have as much as they can do to make ends meet, and that collectors know this, and are accordingly loth to undertake the unpleasant duty of asking for money when they know full well that it is a scarce commodity. The Moderator this year is the Rev. Mr. Killen of Belfast. His address makes no contribution at all to the great question of the day. It is a catalogue of deprecations. Men eminent in science, the Broad Church school, the disciples of a pretentious higher criticism, the Revised Version of the New Testament, the departure of the young people to the Episcopal Church, upon each of these points the Moderator uttered deprecatory remarks, but he grappled with none of them. Men eminent in science, it seems, have been endeavouring to shake the foundations of the faith, and explaining the phenomena of nature in such a way as to render a great intelligent First Cause unnecessary. But the rev. gentleman does not specify any man in particular, which is a pity, because then the Moderator's tilt at men of science in general would look less like a general warning to his co-religionists to beware of science—less like a survival of the old spirit of persecution. The Broad Church school, it seems, is emasculating Christianity of its most vital and distinctive doctrines, while it retains the Christian name and nomenclature. The Moderator quotes Dean Stanley as a horrible instance. He has apparently been reading some review of the Dean's "Christian Institutions," and quotes the reviewer to the effect that "all the characteristic and distinguishing elements of the Religion of Jesus Christ are quietly eliminated from the Dean's theology." Our readers will be surprised to learn this; but the announcement of the Moderator is but another illustration of the fact that we must go from home to hear news. The "Pretentious Higher Criticism" which has made its appearance in Scotland, "threatening to pollute and poison the very fountains of theological learning," next receives attention. The Moderator does not meet it boldly, however. He merely deprecates it. "Its tendency," he says, "is to unsettle our faith in the divine authority of the Holy Scriptures." "In its pride of learning," moreover, "it ventures to cut and carve the Old Testament according to its will." Against all this the Moderator protests, and, if not with the pride of learning at least with Pharisaic complacency, he observes, "our own theological colleges are perfectly free from the taint of this dangerous system." But the rev. gentleman does not tell us in what respect this higher criticism is erroneous, and gives us nothing to assist us to escape the danger. He talks about the forces of error being so powerful that it is necessary that "they" should "gird on their armour and furnish their weapons for the imperial conflict;" but surely a Moderator ought to have his armour always on and his weapons always ready, and ought ever to be prepared to give a reason for the faith that is in him. Instead, he contents himself with bellicose platitudes. "Surely," he says, "when the very foundations of our religion are being assailed and the enemies of Christianity mustering their hosts for an assault upon the citadel, we should not waste our strength in provoking and maintaining internal conflicts, but should close our ranks and combine our energies in a united effort to defend our bulwarks and hurl back the enemy from our battlements."

How this is to be done the Moderator tells us with a charming frankness. "We are bound to study deeply the questions which are agitating thoughtful minds, and master the problems which are causing anxiety. We must be able to grapple with the doubts which perplex the minds of educated young men and women. We must cherish and manifest a genuine sympathy with them in their difficulties. We must keep abreast of the literature of the day and know as much of science as will secure for us the respect of all our hearers. We must make our sermons fresh and instructive. We must have our minds so thoroughly impregnated and fortified with the truth that we shall give forth no uncertain sound in regard to the great verities of our faith. We must seek for ourselves a fresh baptism of the spirit." Later on in his address, dealing with the question as to how to keep their young people from going over to the Episcopal Church, the Moderator adds:—"We must pray well, and preach well, and work well." All most excellent advice, especially the latter part of it; but what if the study on the part of Presbyterian Ministers of these questions that are agitating thoughtful minds leads to the agitation of their own? More, what if, keeping abreast of the literature of the day, they are led to think that the Westminster Confession of Faith is not the be-all and the end-all of the Christian religion; and what if, acquiring as much science as will secure for them the respect of their hearers, they are led to acquire as much as will command the respect of men eminent in science—and what if, then, they are led to hold views not dissimilar from theirs? For all this the Moderator makes no provision. He is satisfied apparently that if Presbyterian Ministers study deeply the questions which are agitating thoughtful minds, they will be able to grapple successfully with the doubts which perplex the minds of educated young men and women. We fear the rev. gentleman does not speak from experience. If he has himself studied deeply these questions, and if he has successfully grappled with the doubts which perplex the minds of educated young men and women, he gives us no hint as to how he has done so. We fear very much that if many Presbyterian ministers do act upon the Moderator's advice, and if they do study the questions which are agitating thoughtful minds, they will share the fate of others before them. If a deep study of these questions must necessarily end, as the Moderator so confidently declares it must end, how is it that bulwark after bulwark yields to the attack of the enemy? The deep study of questions that agitate thoughtful minds, and the grappling with the doubts which perplex the minds of educated young men and women, have been attempted by all the Churches in England and Scotland, with the result that one after another the great fundamental verities have been either distinctly abandoned, or we have had triumphantly presented to us dissolving views of them. Science increases their students from day to day. Broad Churchism is likewise in the ascendant. The higher criticism practically prevails everywhere but in Ireland. The ministers of all Churches in England and Scotland have tried the plan of keeping abreast of the literature of the day, and of acquiring as much science as would secure them the respect of their hearers—only to find how true it is that a little knowledge is a dangerous thing for orthodox theology; and if they have gone further it has been but to fare worse. Ripe scholarship, generous culture, to say nothing of the genuine Christian spirit, are dead against the maintenance intact of ancient bulwarks and battlements. There never was a time when the Christian ministry was more highly educated than now, and yet there never was a time when the old creeds were held in less regard. In fact, what the Moderator calls the “forces of error” are gathering in strength every day, while the “baptism of the spirit” seems to fall not on those who defend the narrow systems of a bygone time, but rather upon those who hold that God hath some new word to speak to every new generation of the Son of men.

On the whole, therefore, the address of the Moderator of the General Assembly clearly makes it necessary that the Liberal Churches of Ireland should apply themselves more zealously than ever to the task which they have undertaken, and in that they will need all the sympathy and support of their sister churches in England. For they can scarcely expect so much assistance in the work of spreading a more liberal and enlightened religious faith as the English Churches have. The population of Ireland is mainly agricultural, and education makes but slow progress amongst the agricultural classes. In England there are educational forces at work which have practically little operation in Ireland. In England we have a system of compulsory education in operation. In Ireland we have a population so poor that children are taken from school, generally speaking, the moment, they reach the fourth or fifth standard. The large towns of England and Scotland all have free libraries, and there is scarcely a village, and certainly not a small town, in England or Scotland where a library of some sort does not exist. In face of this rapidly extending educational force the old orthodoxy is not able to make a stand worthy of the name. It is giving way at all points, and there is scarcely a Church in either England or Scotland into which heresy has not crept, while in many of them it presents a very bold front. In Ireland, however, we have but little of this force at work, and consequently there are no indications of any disturbance of the orthodox calm—unless these frequent warnings of successive Moderators portend something. For the present, however, it would seem that Ireland can produce nothing better than political heretics. The day will come doubtless when some young minister, following the Moderator's advice, will study deeply the problems which agitate the minds of thoughtful men, and grapple with the problems that perplex the minds of the educated young men and women of the Presbyterian Church, and then the sluggish waters will be stirred, and we shall have a heresy hunt. And we venture to say that when it does come, it will come with a vengeance. It is impossible to believe that amongst the Presbyterian ministers and laymen in Ireland there is not one who entertains doubts about the verities of the faith. But until such a man appears, however, the duty devolves upon the Liberal Churches in Ireland to keep their lamps well trimmed and their vessels well filled with oil, ready for the appearing of the bridegroom. From America, from Germany, from France, the higher criticism has found its way. The Atlantic Ocean, the German Sea, the English Channel hindered it not, and is it not a pretty conceit that the Irish Channel shall be able to say—thus far, but no farther? The new light will dawn on Ireland yet, and before its brilliant blaze the old light which is but darkness will fade and disappear. There will fall upon that country, as upon others, the light of truth—the old creeds will tumble to pieces; men will ask then, who now will show us any good? and it will be the duty of the Liberal Churches to bid them welcome.

OUR CHURCHES AND THE PEOPLE.

II.—PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS.

By EDWIN ELLIS.

I have said that belief—thorough belief—is essential to missionary work and to personal influence. With it, however defective may be the organisation of his Church or its corporate work, the possessor is a living limb through which blood circulates, muscles move and nerves tremble connecting it with the body. So far so good; but if the Church in its corporate capacity is to influence society, well sustained and organised efforts must be made in the same direction.

Now let us first of all admit that we are novices at missionary work, and that as a rule Unitarians have not succeeded well wherever it has been attempted. The reasons for failure are obvious. Let a Unitarian church or individual attempt to influence outsiders he finds himself engaged in a war of controversy. He is fiercely attacked from all sides, and the energy which was to have helped to build up religious lives is expended in demolishing old mythologies. It is seldom that bitterness of feeling and of expression on one side or the other can be kept down, and even those who are permanently influenced find themselves engaged at once in the hottest of controversies. It is well to recollect this when the failure of Unitarians to influence the masses is spoken of, because it is an experience that no other dissenting bodies get. The Church does not attack them as it does those it delights to term “Socinians.” For them it has no weapon so deadly as the phrase that “They deny the Lord who bought them,” and those of us who have considerable intercourse with members of other communities know how such a phrase as this closes the avenues of intimacy, and how hard it is to get a hearing. You may demur to its truth, you may ask what your friend himself really means, you may try to explain your position, but over and over will come the refrain, “But you don't believe in the Bible! You don't believe in Christ!” And yet you hardly like to admit it.” Now we know this is entirely untrue and unfair, and yet we feel that with nine out of every ten people that we meet with words will be thrown away and arguments lost. Nevertheless we feel bound to put them on the right track, as far as we can, though we may be unable to hold our own in a theological controversy with a clever sophist or an obtuse bigot. After all we generally conclude that the only good result is that we have saved our self-respect and proved to our opponent that we are not ashamed to stand to our guns.

In my opinion our Church should take up a different position. As there is before it a vast field for missionary work it should not waste its strength in controversy. Let it gather its members and its young people as closely together and to itself as possible by emphasising in every conceivable way its beliefs and affirmations. Let there be one service every Sunday which shall be purely and simply devotional, in which not one word is uttered which reflects on other faiths, not one word, if possible, which stimulates the critical faculty at the expense of the devotional. We do not sufficiently consider how one harsh term or judgment from the pulpit jars through many a mind, and how impossible it is to shake it off during the service. Do we consider how many among a congregation have been working and fighting their own or others' battles through the week, how weary seems the world, how hard seems life, how incessant the annoyances and irritations of the week day! Again, there are probably present those suffering from the loss of friends, bitter disappointments, grievous failures, loss of self-respect, the consciousness of error, if not of sin. Every one of these should go away comforted and strengthened by the devotion of the service and the worship of the congregation. If any one such person expressed his feelings on hearing a controversial discourse, or even a Biblical exposition, he would probably say, “I wanted bread and you gave me a stone.”

The same affirmative position should be maintained in general lectures or services which especially appealed to the outside public. I would assume that what we have to say is sure to find its way to the hearts and minds of some of our hearers, and I would rely principally on the best tracts I could get to answer the objections of opponents.

Apart altogether from the services of the Church I would have lectures given—if possible in public halls—which should deal with the controversy of the Churches. Every such lecture, whether from chapel or hall, should be well advertised. The public and the members of any especial body alluded to should know exactly what subject was to be discussed, so that they might attend or be represented if they so desired. There is something that savours of unfairness in making an attack on a church or an individual behind its back, or at any rate without due notice given, and I am certain that this course would make a speaker very careful. The position and views of others are often misinterpreted and misrepresented by earnest zealots, however honest.

If it were thought desirable to have a controversial sermon now and then I would have it distinctly understood by the congregation, and notified at the chapel door. If the minister at least a week before could give notice of the subject of his next discourse it would be helpful. I would have it simply announced both at the chapel and in the local papers. It is astonishing how the knowledge that a certain given subject is to be treated of stimulates thought and inquiry in the same direction, and many a “casual” will drop in “just”—as he expresses it—“to hear what he's got to say on that.” Again—when interest has been excited among outsiders in any especial direction, advertise in local papers cheap Unitarian publications bearing on the same subject, affix prices and names of publishers—many a person will send to London for a pamphlet, the title of which attracts him, who will take care not to buy it in his town or inquire for it of local Unitarians.

I have thus far tried to show that among the masses of thinking men we have the opportunity of doing work which no other body can so well perform, and that to do this we must appeal to them and make ourselves known through the Press and by the Platform; but, that to exert our best influences we must keep the two portions of our work, the controversial and the religious, as distinct as possible. We must not allow the ferment of the one to disturb the calmness of the other, but must let the world see that we fight, that we may live and not live to fight.

Let us have lectures, controversies, discussions as many as you please, but keep them out of our religious services. Let our children also (to whom as well as to the aged controversy is wearisome) feel that appeals and stimulants to their higher feelings are the especial province of the Church, and not grow up to swell the ranks of those outside all the churches.

It is sometimes said that we have nothing in our faith by which the drunkard or the profligate may be reclaimed, as also that we do not attack social vices as other religious bodies do. This charge is not altogether unjust. I do not for a moment doubt that we have in our faith every essential for reclaiming the sinner if we would believe it. I fear we have come to believe and to persuade ourselves that a coarse phase of religion, which would be utterly repugnant to ourselves, is yet more suitable and more effective on coarse natures. I believe this is utterly wrong. We hear of converted prize-fighters and regenerate blackguards who are brought prominently before the public, and for a few brief days figure as examples of the miracles that may still be wrought by faith, and who, in their own opinion at least, are marvellous instances of regenerate man; but these cases will not bear investigation. Ostentatious virtue and over-weening conceit are far enough removed from the nature just awakened to a sense of sin. Dickens preached an altogether different and a truer gospel. With him it was the pure and simple maiden with love and pity in her heart, who, by her very presence and kindly words, removed the veil from sin and revealed it in its true colours. It was the kind, hearty, honest merchant, who transformed the people he had to do with into noble souls by the force of his goodness of heart alone, and without either cant or claptrap. And yet we have apparently persuaded ourselves, and consequently the world, that we have no message for the outcast; in fact, that our work lies quite in a contrary direction, and we view with a feeling akin to satisfaction the manner in which the orthodox churches influence the lower strata of society. As a matter of order and police I, too, am glad that some influence shall be exerted restraining the drunkard and the criminal, but only on this ground can I feel satisfaction at the means employed. The result has been accomplished by an appeal to fear, or selfishness, or conceit; the foundation is bad, and the work will have to be redone. Surely we can do some work of a better kind in the same direction. We can have no better guide in this matter than Christ. He steered clear of all degradation of method, and yet it was in this direction his work was done. Are we content to leave all the treatment of social evils to others while we walk by on the other side? Many of us do not believe in turning drunkards into slaves by pledges or prohibition, but surely it is incumbent on us to show our better way of dealing with them. Our forefathers rightly saw that their work was agitation against unjust and tyrannical laws—most of them have been repealed—and yet I think we go on laying more stress on what may be done by law than on what may be effected by personal contact with sin.

A paper on this question should hardly avoid a reference to Sunday-schools. In some places, and where it is possible to get thoroughly efficient teachers, considerable influence may be exerted by them. A great work was done in the last generation through their instrumentality, but more in the common rudiments of secular education than in any other direction. The position is now altered, and teachers are required of altogether different attainments to speak on religious topics, and to direct children's minds towards religious thoughts. I cannot say that I think the influence of our Churches will be great in this direction. It would, however, be a great gain if we could attach children to a church by a participation in good and generous works. Many efforts to help the needy and to minister to the relief of suffering which are now made privately by individuals or families would be helpful to a church if done by its organisation. Suppose, for instance, you get a benevolent fund in connection with a church vested in the hands of a large working committee, and this committee (ladies and others) investigate and prescribe on all cases of distress brought under their notice by members of the congregation. This would be very helpful, and the young people would be greatly interested in the work. Let us, if we do not imitate the methods of our orthodox brethren, yet take a leaf out of their book by setting every body to work in some direction or other. "Bands of Hope," "Juvenile Templars," and the like attach children to a cause, not so much by their intrinsic merits as by giving occupation and excitement to the children. Are there no means by which we can do this?

The influence of a Church is greatly promoted by the visit and preaching of a well-known or famous man, provided that care is taken thoroughly to advertise his visit. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association would do well to retain the services of two or three first-class preachers for itinerant work. It cheers and encourages both people and their minister to have a little fresh life thus poured in upon them.

It will probably be urged against the various influences I have spoken of that they all mean outlay and expenditure. True. I have in vain tried to conceive of any work possible that does not involve expenditure, either of time or of money. But a Church must have faith that if it really does a lot of work the money with which to pursue the work is sure to come. Though not myself a very sanguine man, I should always make calculations on this basis, and those Bible Christians who say that their necessities are always relieved by prayer would soon find how ineffectual this was if they had no works to show.

The question under consideration is, "By what practical means can our churches best enlarge and extend their religious influence?" And the answer that I have tried to suggest through various agencies is this: "Your first work is to impress upon every member of your little body the vital importance and necessity of his work. When you have done this, you have done infinitely more than this. Churches are not kept together by people who happen to be in accord on various metaphysical problems, and aim simply to get their solution embraced by others. Probably some of the greatest rascals in the universe, for instance, are Monotheists; but churches take root, live, and grow where their adherents have absorbed their principles and found them essential parts of their lives. I would say to every member of a Church, "Put aside all namby-pamby arguments by which men persuade themselves that other people should be left to their own faiths. Do not be afraid of being called narrow or bigoted, but work to influence the world you come in contact with, as though you had attained concrete truth, and felt that the day was short, and 'the night cometh when no man can work.'"

THE UNION OF BENEFICES BILL.—On Thursday week, on the motion of Mr. Tomkins, the Court of Common Council unanimously agreed to oppose the Bishop of London's Union of Benefices Bill, which has now passed the House of Lords. The Bill was described as proposing an act of vandalism in destroying objects of so much beauty and historical interest as Sir Christopher Wren's churches. The mover of the resolution also stated that many of the churches outside the City, which had been erected out of the proceeds of the City churches already removed, were worse attended than the old ones they replaced. The resolution was referred to the Tithes Committee, who have instructed the Remembrancer to take the necessary steps to oppose the Bill.

THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD reassembled on Thursday after the Whitsuntide recess. There were three candidates for the vacancy caused in the representation of the Tower Hamlets by the retirement of Mr. Scrutton. The names of two of them—Mr. Edward Bond, barrister-at-law, and Captain Bedford Pim—were put to a vote. The former gentleman was elected by a large majority. For the nomination of Mr. W. T. Wiseman, the third candidate, there appeared no seconder.

SCARBOROUGH.—The eighth annual meeting of the Unitarian congregation took place on Friday week, and was highly successful, both as regards attendance and general interest. The chair was taken by Mr. Morton. The proceedings having been opened by a hymn, the report and statement of accounts were read and adopted. Mr. Morton then rose and made a humorous speech, in which he made special reference as treasurer to the unsatisfactory financial position of the church, and said that although he had always held that endowments as a rule were unwise, as tending to cripple the active zeal of congregations, yet he could not but think that Scarborough was exceptionally situated in this respect, and what a highly satisfactory condition of things he should feel it to be if they had a good round sum, say even £1,000, lodged in the bank to rely upon, and in conclusion urged upon the visitors the necessity of supporting the church to the best of their ability. Other speakers followed, notably the Rev. D. Agate, B.A. (of Gorton), the late minister, who in a very eloquent address stated his satisfaction at the growing numbers of the church, and hoped that, speaking financially, the church had now passed the low-water mark. Mr. Laycock, of Sheffield, expressed his deep regret at losing the services of Mr. Agate as minister, and congratulated the congregation at having secured such an able man as Mr. Amos as his successor. The ordinary business of the meeting, such as election of committee, thanks to officers, &c., having been transacted, Mr. Amos delivered a closing address, in which he urged the necessity of continued energy on the part of all members of the church, even of the smallest and weakest. The proceedings were concluded with a hymn.

THROAT IRRITATION.—Soreness and dryness, tickling and irritation, inducing cough and affecting the voice. For these symptoms use Epps's Glycerine Jujubes. Glycerine, in these agreeable confections, being in proximity to the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of sucking, becomes actively healing. Sold only in boxes, 7½d. and 1s. 1½d., labelled, "JAMES EPPS and Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." A letter received:—"Gentlemen,—It may, perhaps, interest you to know that, after an extended trial, I have found your Glycerine Jujubes of considerable benefit (with or without medical treatment) in almost all forms of throat disease. They soften and clear the voice.—Yours faithfully, GORDON HOLMES, L.R.C.P.E., Senior Physician to the Municipal Throat and Ear Infirmary."

Occasional Notes.

In a recent sermon the Rev. M. J. Savage, of Boston, U.S., said, "When in Chicago I had for a neighbour a brilliant orthodox minister, who was afterwards settled in Brooklyn, and has since died. He confessed to me that he did not believe in the infallibility of the Bible, he did not believe in everlasting punishment, he did not believe in the trinity. Yet he stood day by day on a creed that committed him to all these doctrines, and in a pulpit where he was expected to believe and preach them all. Only a little while ago a minister of a well-known city of New England came to my study, and I had several talks with him. He confessed that he was looking for a Unitarian Church, but, as he did not find one to suit him, and did get a pleasant call from an orthodox church, he is preaching there."

The Boston Commonwealth gives us news of an old acquaintance when it writes:—"Attention is being widely drawn to the discourses of James Kay Applebee, at the Parker Memorial, on successive Sundays. Many who listen to him regard him as the ablest preacher since Mr. Parker's day. He is close in logic, eloquent in utterance, with suggestive and informing matter, and great readiness and adaptation to the special topic in hand. The old parishioners who have listened to him have become much interested in him, and the attendance is weekly increasing. His discourse last Sunday, on 'Emerson as Man and Poet,' was a fine tribute to the departed, and won many encomiums. Tomorrow he speaks on 'Emerson as a Thinker'; and we advise those fond of a high order of intellectual discourse, combined with reverence and spirituality, to listen to him. Mr. Applebee was formerly a Unitarian preacher in England."

MR. HENRY DUNCLEY, the well-known "Verax," whose articles on "the Crown and Cabinet" excited so much attention in the latter days of Lord Beaconsfield's Ministry, has been contributing another series of articles to the Manchester Examiner on the Irish question. Mr. Duncley sets his face against a Parliament on College-green, believing Home Rule to lead inevitably to independence; but he regards such an issue as unavoidable unless the Irish are reconciled to the Union. In order to attain that reconciliation he insists upon (1) Allowing Irish members to decide Irish questions; (2) appointing none but Irishmen to Irish offices; (3) the introduction of Irish green into the British flag; and (4) an annual visit by the Queen to a Royal residence in Ireland.

THE Hospital Sunday collections in London this year seem likely to exceed the average. The largest collection as yet announced is that at the fashionable church of St. Michael's, Chester-square, £691 16s. 6d. St. Paul's Cathedral raised £298 9s. 10d.; Westminster Abbey, £228 19s. 9d.; St. Andrew's, Well-street, £231 2s. 6d.; St. Jude, South Kensington, £503 12s. 6d. Among the Dissenters the largest collections are Union Chapel, Islington (the Rev. Dr. Allon), £147 16s. 5d.; City Temple (the Rev. Dr. Parker), £120; Metropolitan Tabernacle, £200. Our Unitarian and Free Christian Church collections seem fair considering the proportionate size of the congregations. At Effra-road Chapel, Brixton, the collection was £47 11s. 6d., about double that of any former year; Little Portland-street, £22 2s. 10d.; Free Christian Church, Kentish-town, £22 10s. 1d.; Rosslyn Chapel, Hampstead, £67 4s. 6d.

At the Oxford Commemoration on Wednesday several distinguished candidates for the honorary degrees were presented to the Vice-Chancellor by the Regius Professor of Civil Law. In representing Sir William Muir, he dwelt upon the merits of his civil administration in India and upon his literary success. For Mr. Goldwin Smith he claimed the affection and the honours of the University as for a most eloquent son and most redoubtable patriot in spite of his expatriation. The name of Mr. Robert Browning, whose psychological subtlety and nervous poetry were the professor's theme, was received with enthusiastic greeting and with the display of a cartoon, bearing a likeness of the poet and the figure of a member of the Browning Society despairingly appealed to him for an elucidation of his obscurities. The laughter rose to a greater height when a red cotton nightcap [not a fool's-cap as some of the morning papers absurdly have it] dangled from the gallery, after resting on the head of the Professor of Divinity, was skilfully transferred to the poet himself before it fell into the hands of a triumphant pro-proctor. The allusion was, of course, to Mr. Browning's poem, "Red Cotton Night Cap." Then came the turn of Dr. Allen Thomson, the distinguished physiologist. Last in order, but not in interest, Mr. Watts came forward to receive the distinction awarded to him at the Encænna of last year—an artist, the professor said, worthy to take rank with the Venetian masters, for whom he claimed a distinction which his pencil had conferred on others. Two distinguished men, Baron Nordenskjöld and M. Pasteur, who had been invited to do honour to the University by accepting honours from it, were prevented by the backwardness of the Hebdomadal Council in forwarding invitations from adding to the lustre of the proceedings by their presence.

MR. A. S. NAPIER, an old Oxford man, who has for some years past acted as teacher of the English language in the University of Berlin, has just been appointed an "extraordinary professor" in the Philosophical Faculty at Göttingen. This is probably the first modern instance of an Englishman achieving such a position in Germany.

THE warders of convict prisons have found a defender in the Rev. Charles Voysey, who, in a letter to the Times, contends that the conditions of a warder's life make him "exceptionally tender, sympathising, and emotional." In the exercise of his profession, Mr. Voysey adds, it has often been his painful duty to visit convicts, and he has "never once met with a brutalised warder or seen anything approaching unkindness or levity in the treatment of convicts." This may not be universally applicable, but it is well that we should hear all that can be said on behalf of the existing system of prison discipline as well as all that may be alleged against it.

PROFESSOR PAULI.—We regret to have to announce the death of Reinhold Pauli, Professor of History at Göttingen, which occurred on Saturday week, at Bremen, whither the deceased had gone, apparently in his usual health, to visit some friends. He was scarcely sixty years of age, and therefore his death may be mourned as a premature loss to that science of which he was such a brilliant ornament. Born at Berlin in 1826 he studied and taught successively at the Universities of Bonn, Rostock, Tübingen, Marburg, and Göttingen, at which last place he was appointed to the Chair of History. In his earlier years he acted as private secretary to the Chevalier Bunsen, Prussian Minister at the Court of St. James's; and it was at this time that he formed those connections and made those loving and laborious researches which resulted in the publication of his "Geschichte Englands Seit, 1815," in 1874, and of his "Bilder aus Alt-England" (Pictures from Old England), in 1876. He had also previously written a continuation of Lappenberg's "English History."

PERE HYACINTHE'S LECTURES.—On Monday afternoon M. Loyson delivered at St. James's Hall the last of his series of lectures in aid of the work of Catholic reform in France, the subject of it being "Christian Unity." Canon Farrar, in the unavoidable absence of the Archbishop of Canterbury, occupied the chair. M. Loyson, in treating his subject, reminded his audience that the Church was essentially one all over Christendom—that there could not be a separate Church in London, in Berlin, in Paris, and in Jerusalem, with separate localisations of one eternal truth. Regarding the Church as the one spouse of Christ, he considered the relations in which she stood to the mind of man and to society, and he maintained that the creed which they held in common was what could alone unite Christians of different nationalities. In concluding, he expressed his sense of the value of episcopacy as the guardian of the cardinal doctrines of the Church against eternal assault.—On the motion of the Bishop of Nelson, seconded by Lord Mount Temple, a cordial vote of thanks was given to M. Loyson for his lectures.

Reviews.

Spinoza, a Novel, by Berthold Auerbach. Two Vols. London. Sampson Low and Co.

Baruch Spinoza is the greatest Jew of the last eighteen hundred years, condemned by Christians and Jews as much as Jesus was by Jews alone. His philosophy is once more beginning to demand attention. In recent years a number of eminent authors have expounded and criticised it, and told afresh the story of his life. Mr. Froude, Dr. Willis, Mr. G. H. Lewes, and last of all Mr. F. Pollock, have attempted with more or less sympathy and success to interpret the heretic Jew to modern Englishmen. In France M. Saisset has translated all Spinoza's works, and reprinted the two earliest lives which were written of him. The philosophy has always been a fertile source of strife, and there is no likelihood for many a day yet to come that men will reach unanimity concerning it. But this at least is certain, that, true or false, it is completely religious in its basis, its aim, and its tone of thought and language. No one would dream now of styling it atheistic, as Bayle does over and over again through a score of folio pages of vituperation. The logic may not satisfy us, and we may conclude that in his devotion to the Infinite he practically sweeps the finite realities absolutely away. This, however, so far from denying God, ends in too much of God, and gives us Pantheism but by no means Atheism. Novalis said "The God-intoxicated Spinoza," and this now famous and oft quoted phrase comes much nearer to the truth. Let opinions as to the ultimate drift of the philosophy be what they may, we must always bear in mind that Spinoza did not intend Atheism any more than St. Paul did. "One God, and through Him and to Him are all things," argued the Apostle, and Spinoza aims at the same conclusion. With him, as with the Apostle, Pantheism is on the surface, Atheism is nowhere, and there are frequent and perhaps inconsequential lapses into genuine Theism, both in thought and emotion. The lapses into Theistic language are inevitable in the nature of things.

About the simple beauty and integrity and the practical piety of Spinoza's life there are hardly two opinions. Friends and foes of the philosophy unite to sing the praises of the man. We see him rich enough to satisfy his modest desires on an income smaller than that of a poor Nonconformist parson or a half-starved curate of the wealthy Church of England. We see him content with a scanty portion of daily food—far less than the allowance of a modern pauper or convict, earning it by grinding optical glasses, and his sole amusement watching the conflicts of spiders. We have often regretted that so few details of his life have come down to later times. We are obliged to gather them as well as we can, and that is badly, at the best, from the pages of the early biographies, from his letters, and from the numerous works published with a view of refuting what were considered his pernicious doctrines. If he had been a soldier or a politician we should have known much more about him than we should care to know. As it is we regret that we know so little. Philosophers live outwardly uneventful lives. The great public is contemptuously indifferent as to their good or evil fortunes. And when the philosopher is a Jew and a heretic—Jew to boot, he is fated beforehand to dwell in the shade. So all we know is his descent from a family of Portuguese Jews settled in Amsterdam, his artisan occupation, his expulsion from the synagogue, his few friends, and his books, the most important of which, the "Ethics," was published after his death. And his death occurred at the age of forty-four.

With respect to great men, the more influence they have exercised in the development of the thought of the following centuries, the more we desire to see them in the setting of contemporary circumstances, and especially to see how they grew out of the old state of mind, and emancipated themselves, and became the famous thinkers whom we know in the maturity of their powers. Pictures of this sort are the best pictures of great men that we can have, and it is the business of good biographers to collect materials for them, and then to paint the pictures. Sometimes we have happy autobiographic sketches, and so can see the upward progress of men's minds step by step from the unreasoning faith of childhood to the reasoned system of the ripe period or life. In this way Cardinal Newman has painted himself, and so has Professor Newman. So, also have Harriet Martineau, Theodore Parker, and partly Goethe and Carlyle. When there is no autobiography, and the actual facts that we know are few, and even when we have many helps in the shape of undoubted historic facts, good service may still be rendered to us by poets and novelists, and they may paint pictures half ideal and half real which express the true natures and experiences of great men more admirably than any bare narrative of facts would do. Lord Lytton has conferred this benefit upon us in the case of Rienzi, and George Eliot has done it in the case of Savonarola. No ordinary historian could reproduce the Rome, or the Florence of the fourteenth century, and the political and religious passions then at work, and show Rienzi and Savonarola in such appropriate settings as has been done for us by these two masters of the imaginative art.

Holland is an unromantic-looking land; Amsterdam is a city unsuggestive of poetry; and Spinoza seems a very unpromising subject for the imagination to deal with and make interesting to the vast community of the readers of light literature. All the greater credit therefore is due to Berthold Auerbach. He has grappled with what at first sight appears an insuperable difficulty, and mastered it. He has presented an idealistic sketch of Spinoza's early days up to the time of his excommunication, which enables us to understand his life, and the mighty transformation which occurred to him when the young Jew threw off the trammels of the synagogue and claimed and exercised the rights of a freeman in the world of philosophy and religion. Auerbach was himself a Jew, and only died at the beginning of the present year. Evidently also he sympathises with Spinoza, which is the best qualification for his self-imposed task that any biographer, real or ideal, can have. Besides this, he is thoroughly familiar with Jewish ideas and ceremonies in their minute Rabbinical and Talmudic details. The consequence is that we get from him a trustworthy historical work of art, and can place ourselves in the midst of the Amsterdam Jews in the seventeenth century, and can see the young Spinoza, first one of them, and afterwards growing out of them. Many of the incidents we know to be true, and all the characters mentioned really played the parts ascribed to them in Spinoza's struggle with his co-religionists. The author has simply arranged the incidents in the light of his knowledge of contemporary circumstances. For Judaism as it was in the days of Spinoza we can imagine no better authority, and for an insight into Spinoza's early conflicts of soul we can imagine no better introduction. The narrative ends with his excommunication. It deals, therefore, only with his abandonment of ceremonialism, and his first breathings of the atmosphere of intellectual liberty, and not with his representative philosophical works, which were produced after his excommunication. But whoever wants a life-like picture of what the youth of Spinoza may have been, and, indeed, almost must have been, may be safely recommended to go to Berthold Auerbach for it.

On a Friday afternoon in April, 1647, Uriel Acosta is buried hurriedly in the Jewish burying ground at Amsterdam. He has been excommunicated for heresy, and the rites are maimed. Baruch Spinoza, a youth of fifteen, already noted for his acquaintance with the law, watches the ceremony, and pities the dead man, for he himself is not so sure as he once was, and unuttered questions slumber in his mind. On the Sabbath he goes to the synagogue. Entering it, he and his father wash their hands, the right hand first. They descend three steps. Every synagogue must be below ground; for it is written, "Out of the depths have I cried unto Thee, O Lord" (Psalm cxxxi.). Three sermons were preached, and at the end of them the dignity of Rabbi was conferred on Spinoza, "Rise, our teacher and master, Rabbi Baruch Ben Benjamin," said the reader of the law. The honour for a youth of fifteen was unprecedented. The contrast between the free speculative mind of Spinoza himself and the mind of the strict Orthodox young Jew is brought out by Chisdai, a fellow student of Spinoza, who has a keen scent for heresy, and guesses that the seeds of it are springing up in his companion. He tries him on the subject of angels, good and bad, and in Spinoza's young talk we may discover the germs of the future Pantheism:—

"Do you not believe in bad angels?" asked Chisdai.

"Do you believe, and do you believe? You ought to ask what is written, and as far as I know our Bible there is nothing in it about such a Satan or Devil as the Christians believe in. The history of Job, according to the Talmud, is merely a poem. To God everything is good, it is only to us men that many things appear bad, as it stands in our glorious Isaiah (xlv. 6, 7). "I am the Lord, and there is none else; I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace, and create evil!"

"But can there not be bad angels?"

"No, the distinctive mark of an angel is, that he is a mere tool of God without free-will. Satan is said to be a fallen angel, who rebelled against God; but that could never happen if God did not rebel against himself" (vol. I., p. 177).

This is damnable heresy in Chisdai's ears. For the correct Jew liked them to believe in bad angels, and outcast nations so long as the Jews themselves were a peculiar and favoured people of God, even as some Christians now have a selfish delight in dreaming of a heaven of which they are heirs, and are untroubled by the wretched inheritance of hell for the rest of mankind. Spinoza wants to know more than the Bible and Talmud, and so he learns Latin and makes acquaintance with a wide field of learning into which ordinary Jews did not care to enter. He is initiated into the mysteries of the Cabbala, in the hope that they will remove his rising doubts. But they only confirm them. Then he studies with Dr. Van den Ende, who is a Lucianist, laughing at everything religious in private, believing in nothing, yet preserving an aspect of respectable conformity to the Christian world. Baruch, however, is sincerely religious in feeling, notwithstanding his difficulties, and the Lucianist shocks him. Baruch tells him confidentially that he has lost the power to pray, and is laughed at for his pains. To the physician all religions are either ignorance and superstition or impostures. The old Judaism and the new or Christianity, are equally rubbish. He says, "Your Judaism and our Judaism are worth nothing now; your Judaism was a memory long ago, and a puff of air will scatter it in dust; ours, till the beginning of the last century, was pure barbarism; it has imbibed a classic spirit, and this spirit will explode it. Enter the bright halls of classic wisdom, you will there learn to enjoy, to jest, and to be silent." This hypocritical winking at known falsehoods, or what are believed to be falsehoods, seems a horrible labyrinth to Baruch. Indeed, all religion is a mysterious labyrinth; but he is sincere and earnest, and feels that a clue to guide him through it must be found. We know how a friendship that once promised to ripen into love grew up between him and Van den Ende's daughter. At her request he changed his name from Baruch to Benedict, both meaning "blessed;" but Benedict was a tacit document of his Hebrew faith, and a step to liberty, if not to Christianity. His father now called on him, being a Rabbi, to preach and pour forth the living word of the spirit of God for the whole congregation. Alas! the father knew nothing of the son's state of mind. And the son himself was undecided. The preparation for the first sermon, and the attempt to preach are graphically described. The overstrained youth spat blood and broke down in the middle. He and his father went home together, the father sorrowing that his own pious Jewish hopes were blighted, and the son thankful in his sufferings that God, Providence, or Nature, all the same reality under different names, had saved him from following a vocation where in every step he would have been untrue to himself and a secret lie. The end of it is he cannot be a rabbi; and he determines to earn his living as a handicraftsman. Much to the discontent of his father he chooses a craft that is poorest paid, viz., that of grinding optical glasses. In the quiet and retirement of his work, mingled with frequent conversations with two liberal and cultivated thinkers, Meyer and Oldenbourg, followers of Descartes, he leaves his old Judaism entirely behind, ceases to attend the synagogue, goes beyond Descartes who furnishes him with the starting-point of his speculations, and arrives at Pantheistic conclusions, in which alone he has peace of mind. And now the ecclesiastical authorities took note of his lapse from the synagogue, and his notorious indifference to the ceremonies of his forefathers. He was summoned to attend the synagogue and to live according to the rules of the Jewish Church. He refused, and the lesser excommunication was passed upon him. It banished him from the Church for three months. But as he had already banished himself that did not matter to him. At length he was told he must choose between submission and the extreme penalty of cutting off. The physician Solomon da Silva called and argued in favour of conformity without believing, like an astute modern Broad Churchman. The conversation is worth quoting, and reads remarkably like conversations which might easily take place to-day. But we have not space for it. The opening shows the colour of the talk clearly enough. De Silva says:—"I confess that Judaism contains many abuses and abnormal developments which ought to be got rid of; when I was at your age it used to weigh on my mind too. The impetuosity of youth always wants hastily to cut away what displeases it, but that will not do; men must first win respect and confidence, and not shock people; then, later on, something may be permitted to you, and you can carry out your plans by degrees."

"The Talmud teaches that you should keep no false measures in your house," answered Spinoza; "does not that refer here?"

The sophistical arguments in favour of accommodation are used by De Silva with great force, but they have no effect on a man obstinately honest. De Silva offers on behalf of the congregation a pension of a thousand gulden if Spinoza will only promise not to write against Judaism. In vain. "The proverb says if the people wish to silence a man they must stop his mouth with broth," replied Spinoza. The casuistical reformer departs defeated. The young man's brothers-in-law and sisters beseech him to save the family name. His old nurse comes and cannot believe her pretty babe will desert the faith of Moses. Chajé also comes to weep and curse. All these talks throw a rich and varied light on the Judaism of traditional and Rabbinical orthodoxy.

In 1657 he went to the house of Jacob Synagogue, in Amsterdam, to meet his enemies face to face for the last time. The ten judges sat together, Spinoza stood four paces distant, and the crowded, angry congregation watched the proceedings with vivid interest. The President said: "With the help of God we are here assembled to declare judgment and law on thee Baruch Ben Benjamin Spinoza. Swear to us in the name of the Almighty God that thou wilt neither deny nor conceal anything from us, and that thou wilt submit to the sentence which the Lord shall make known by our mouths."

"Deceit I know not, and lies are far from me," answered Spinoza. "I will submit to your judgment if you judge me according to the divine word, and not according to the inclinations of your own hearts and interpretations of the Rabbins."

After Sabbath-breaking and neglect of the ceremonies had been proved against him, the chief accusation came: "Have you not said that in the Holy Scriptures many imperfect and false ideas of the nature of God are to be found?" He answered:—

I think I honour God more than you by that. Is not God called "great" in the Bible, and is there a "greatness" without limited extension in space? It is true the Bible can only be explained by itself, it carries the ground of its truths in itself, it will not be measured by the laws of intellect, but neither will it over-rule them. The reason God has given us, therefore, is no less divine, and can and must create its ideal of God for itself, and find in itself what is necessary to the leading of a godly life. The Bible itself recognises this sacred right of our reason, in recognising a godly war of life in the men who lived before the revelation on Sinai, while it detracts from the truth in the law-giving of Moses as a merely temporal revelation, by saying: "It is not in heaven that thou shouldest say, who shall go for us to heaven, and bring it unto us, that we may hear it, and do it? But the word is very nigh unto thee in thy mouth, and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it." In our reason, on the height of pure religious thought, there is our Sinai. I will faithfully and openly explain to you my views of higher things; if you refute me by reason I will submit to you."

"Reason," cry the Rabbis in scorn, "they will have nothing to do with reason." It is a mere Baal. To Spinoza, on the contrary, Reason is the voice of God in man, the only authentic oracle, which must be obeyed, whithersoever it commands us to go, and whatsoever it commands us to do, and to their scorn of it he replies, "destroy it if you can." Finally their patience and that of the congregation is worn out. They insist on recantation. They will be content with no less. They will allow no liberty. Rabbi Aboab said:—"Will you recant? I ask for the second time. I ask for the third time, will you recant?" Spinoza looked up and answered in a firm voice, "I cannot, but neither can you do otherwise, I curse you not." Then Rabbi Isaah Aboab tore his mantle, and Rabbi Saül Moreira took the Schofar that lay covered before him and blew it three times, so that it echoed on all sides of the dome, the sacred ark was opened, all present arose, and Rabbi Isaah Aboab read from a parchment:—

"In the name of the Lord of Lords
Art thou, Baruch, son of Benjamin,
Laid under the greater ban.
Be thou under the ban of both laws,
Heavenly and earthly:
Be banned by the saints above,
Be banned by the Seraphim,
Be banned by the Ophanim.
Shut out from all communities,
From the great and from the small.
On thee be great and heavy plagues,
Painful and horrible sickness;
Thy house be a dragon's den,
And thy star vanish from above.
Be thou the pest and horror of men,
And thy carcase the food of snakes.
Be thou a sport unto thine enemies,
And the goods that thou mayest possess
Be the portion of strangers.
Before the doors of thine enemies
May thy children wail,
And because of thy life's tortures
Be thy children's children struck with horror.
Be accused by all spirits.

Michael and Gabriel,
Raphael and Meschartel,
Be accursed of the great God.
By the seventy spirits' names,
Subjects to the great King,
By the great seal Zartok,
Go to hell like Korah's band.
And with trembling and quivering
Thy soul go out of thee.
God's terrors slay thee,
Overthrown like Achitophel
In the snares of thy plots.
Gehazi's leprosy be thine,
And from thy fall may'st thou never arise,
Where Israel's graves lie
Be thy grave never dug.
Given away to the stranger
Be thy wife; in thine hour of death
May others defile her.
This ban, and this curse
On Baruch, son of Benjamin.
But on all Israel
And on me rest the peace of God
And his blessing eternally."

On this the Rabbi took the Thora from the sacred ark, unrolled it and read (Deut. xxix. 19, &c.), "And it came to pass, when he heareth the words of this curse, that he bless himself in his heart, saying, I shall have peace, though I walk in the imagination of mine heart, to add drunkenness to thirst: the Lord will not spare him; but then the anger of the Lord and His jealousy shall smoke against that man, and all the curses that are written in this book shall lie upon him, and the Lord shall blot out his name from under heaven." The Thora was returned to the sacred ark, the Schofar was again blown, and all those present said, turning towards Spinoza,

"Cursed be thy coming in, and cursed be thy going out."

All spat towards him, and recoiled four paces, as with unbroken firmness he left the synagogue (vol. II., p. 227).

But he left it with a conscience void of offence. He had not condescended to ask pardon by subterfuge and equivocation.

Thus cast out by the Jews, and unable to become a Christian, he was left alone with God and with the consciousness of integrity of purpose before the Infinite and Eternal, whose organ he was. His love cast him off as his co-religionists had done. Her unbelieving but conforming father did not care for an honest man who declined to earn bread and butter by conventional lying. Yet one night Spinoza saw a grand vision, and a voice said to him: "Thou art come to be a Saviour to mankind. Those who are of thy race have rejected thee, they have attempted thy life. Those who are not of thy race have betrayed thee, they have embittered thy sweetest feelings; thou knowest many err, thou rewardest them with truth." Auerbach thus concludes:—"Spinoza went to Rhynsburg, and from thence to Voosburg and the Hague, and wrote the 'Theologico-Political Tractatus' and the 'Ethics.' There, alone and deserted, he ended his days. He died on February 21st, 1677, in his forty-fourth year. No thinker, arisen since Spinoza, has lived so much in the Eternal as he did."

For us undying interest attaches to Spinoza's name, and we can recommend Berthold Auerbach's book as at once a touching, imaginative biography and an admirable introduction to a system of thought which we are all bound to try and understand.

W. B.

Short Notices.

The Expositor for June opens with a reply by Canon Farrar to Dr. Abbott's somewhat contemptuous verdict on the pseudonymous "Second Epistle of St. Peter," in the course of which the writer concedes that Dr. Abbott has proved, beyond shadow of doubt, that Josephus and the author of this epistle could not have written independently of each other, while he leans to the view that the plagiarist was the Jewish historian not the Christian writer. As regards the charge of copying the Epistle of Jude, Dr. Farrar's singular defence is that it is done with "consummate skill," and that when he spoiled some of Jude's finest passages he was copying from memory. Dr. Salmon in the next article, on "The Witch of Endor," analyses patristic opinion on this supernatural passage. "Almoni Peloni," who is, we suspect, the editor in disguise, has an excellent homily on "The Self-Standard Deceptive," in reference to the passage in 2 Corinthians x. 12. Next to Canon Farrar's article, however, the two most interesting papers in the present number are, "Doctrinal Effects of the Revised Version," by the editor, and "Some Criticisms on the Translation of the Revised Version," by Canon Evans. The latter is a minute criticism, intelligible only to the learned, designed to show the lack, in numerous instances, of fine scholarship in the Revised Version, especially in the treatment of the word wa. In the other article, Dr. Cox acknowledges the great merit of the Revised Version in bringing us, with all its defects, nearer to "the mind of the Spirit." He deprecates the prevailing disposition to minimise the changes that have been made, and to console timid orthodox believers with the delusive idea that they do not affect the doctrines taught in the New Testament. He shows that while they will make no difference to scientific theologians familiar with the Greek Testament, for the large majority who are dependent on the Translation they use, the popular conceptions of the Christian truth will be largely, and in some respects happily, changed. For while it is shown that the New Version gives greater prominence than the Old Version did to the existence and ministry of the devil, it substitutes the words Hades and Gehenna for hell, and gets rid of the words hell, damnation and everlasting. With such changes as these, Dr. Cox naturally asks, is it credible that the intelligent student of the New Version should hold that doctrinal conception of the future fate of the wicked, which, in the popular mind, has been mainly founded on these words? The writer concludes an excellent article, so far as it goes, with the remark that this question is of the first importance, and gives form and colour to our whole system, not of theology alone, but of ruling principles and practical beliefs. It radically affects our conceptions of God, of His character and rule. "We can hardly take up the biography of any great writer of our own time without seeing that the dogma of endless torment and punishment has much of the growing scepticism and unbelief of the age to answer for. And so it has come to pass that we have long made our very God the scourge by which we have driven some of the noblest minds among us from all faith in Him, from all communion with Him, and have then consigned them to an interminable torment for lack of the very faith which we ourselves have made impossible to them." And the same may be said of other dogmas, which will gradually disappear before a better knowledge of the New Testament.

Maori Religion and Mythology. By Edward Shortland, M.A., late Native Secretary, New Zealand. (London: Longmans, 1882.)—The information contained in this little volume was collected some years ago from native Maoris, who were either themselves already in possession of it, or could obtain it from the tohunga, or wise men of their family, and reduce it to manuscript. The author appears to have been very careful to leave the narrative much in the original form as related by the Maoris—an obvious advantage to the reader. He discovers traces of the very primitive condition of the human race at that remote period when a connection is supposed to have existed between the Aryans and Polynesians, and he says that the religion of both may be traced to the natural veneration of the child for the parent joined to an innate belief in the immortality of the soul. As the book has no philosophical pretensions, we are willing to pass by the author's affirmation of "innate beliefs." He is perhaps no more correct when he claims to interpret the old Aryan myths by "the principles he discovers to guide him" as to the signification of Polynesian mythology. The Maori, we are told, has no tradition of the Creation. He personifies the powers of nature and regards them as his own primitive ancestors. After that, he has a religious worship peculiar to each tribe and to each family, in forms of invocation addressed to the spirits of dead ancestors of their own proper line of descent. Ancestral spirits who had lived in the flesh before the migration to New Zealand would be invoked by all the tribes. The matters of fact as related in the volume are of intense interest, and all the more valuable because they appear to be authentic.

Natural Selection Incompatible with Atheism. A Refutation of some of the Errors of Dr. E. B. Aveling. By John Gibbs. (Chelmsford: J. Dutton.)—As a "refutation," this pamphlet ought to have been severely logical, but unfortunately in this very respect the author fails. He can be sarcastic, and even taunt Dr. Aveling about his youth (pp. 4 and 33), but we do not find that he has established his case against the scientist. The particular work so mercilessly dealt with is Dr. Aveling's "Student's Darwin," a work reviewed in these columns nearly twelve months ago. As our reviewer pointed out at the time, the book contained many inaccuracies, and of these Mr. Gibbs has certainly made the most, but the chief demerit lay in the fact of the introduction by Dr. Aveling of much controversial matter, foreign to the proper scope of the work, and of a kind which must have been exceedingly distasteful to Darwin himself, although he (Mr. Darwin) was very far from being the true believer Mr. Gibbs would make him appear to be. We quite agree with Dr. Aveling as to the use Mr. Darwin made of the old theological phraseology. The pamphlet appears to be the work of one who, while possessing a good popular knowledge of one branch of natural history, and familiar, moreover, with the language of natural selection, has yet failed to grasp its meaning, force, and beauty.

Literary Notes.

THE last literary work in which the late Dr. Hanna was engaged was a popular edition of his "Life of Christ." It is to be issued very shortly by the Religious Tract Society.

THE friends and admirers of the late Mr. Longfellow are to be invited to purchase the field in front of Craigie House, which the poet bought in order to secure his view of Charles River. It is proposed to convert it into a memorial garden, and place a statue of the poet in the centre. The cost is estimated at £20,000.

THE death of Garibaldi is calling forth a number of memoirs of the deceased hero. Mr. Bent is bringing out a new edition of his book, in which the text has been modified in several places, and the narrative brought down to Garibaldi's death. M. Barbèra, of Florence, has intimated that he will publish in a few days a biography, by Giuseppe Guerzoni, in two volumes. The work has been about three years in preparation.

WE learn that it is in contemplation by the Folklore Society to issue the Folklore Record in monthly parts, instead of yearly, as at present.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN AND Co. intend to issue early in the winter season a volume on Dante Gabriel Rossetti and his influence and work in art and literature. Its appearance will probably be contemporaneous with the projected exhibition of the artist's works at Burlington House. It will be written by Mr. William Sharp, who has the advantage of having had the intimate friendship of Rossetti.

THE local lectures organised under the superintendence of a syndicate of Cambridge University continue to be successful, although some towns are being withdrawn from their direct influence by the establishment of local colleges. In twenty centres courses of lectures on science, literature, history, political economy, &c., have been delivered during the past winter, to more than two thousand pupils in the first term and fourteen hundred in the second. The value of these lectures lies especially in the fact of their being systematic.

MISS SARAH TYTLER is writing a life of Marie Antoinette for the New Plutarch Series of biographies.

THE bulk of a collection of about three hundred specimens of inscribed tablets just arrived at the British Museum from the neighbourhood of Babylon are of unbaked clay, and principally belong to that now familiar class of monuments known as contract tablets. One considerable tablet, however, of the age of Cyrus, is a treasure, as giving a fragmentary history of Babylon from the fourteenth to the ninth century B.C., and as being a copy of the original document from which the very valuable synchronous history of Assyria and Babylonia was prepared. The collection is the result of a purchase from a Greek firm at Bagdad, who occasionally collect the antiquities of the surrounding district.

THE fifty-second annual meeting of the British Association will open at Southampton on Wednesday, August 23. At the general meeting on the opening day Sir John Lubbock will resign the chair, and Mr. C. W. Siemens, the president elect, will assume the presidency, and deliver an address. On Friday evening, August 25, Sir W. Thomson will deliver a discourse on the tides, and on Monday evening, August 28, Mr. H. N. Moseley will read a paper on pelagic life.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH AND Co. have in the press a new work by Dr. Davidson on Christian Eschatology, or the doctrine of last things, compared with the notions of the Jews and the statements of Church creeds on the same subject.

THE personality of the late Mr. Charles Darwin, who died on the 19th April last, has been sworn under £146,000. The personality of the late Sir Henry Cole, who died on the previous day, has been sworn at £7,000.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.—The Rev. F. Summers, of George's-row, gratefully acknowledges the receipt of five pounds from an anonymous donor, and of one pound from "S. G. O.," for the Convalescent Rooms and School Excursion Funds. We are requested to add that by means of the Convalescent Rooms Fund upwards of 170 adults and children were last year privileged to spend a fortnight each in the country, or at the sea-side, and if this very useful branch of the Mission operations is to be carried on successively, a few additional subscriptions are necessary.

STAMFORD-STREET CHAPEL.—On Friday evening, June 9, a meeting of friends was held at the above place, when it was resolved to form a Unitarian open-air mission. The meetings will be held during the summer months on Sunday evenings, from eight till nine o'clock. Small hymn books will be distributed among the people and then collected again. It is proposed to begin with a hymn and end with a prayer. Mr. Bowie has also formed an active little band of district visitors, and they are already doing a good work among the unchurched masses in the densely populated neighbourhood of Stamford-street. A tract-cover with a brief address and a few particulars about Sunday and week-day meetings has been prepared for the use of the visitors.

Our Contemporaries.

THE LIVERPOOL CONFERENCE.

The English correspondent of the Index of Boston, U.S.—organ of the Free Religionists—gives a somewhat caustic account of “The National Conference of English Unitarians and its Significance,” commenting in a hard and unsympathetic tone on the communion service, the sermon, “in which a manly and helpful spirit appeared struggling with a strange and senseless orthodoxy of language,” the various papers and discussions, and Dr. Martineau’s letter, “a welcome advance upon some other of his recent writings.” We subjoin the closing paragraphs on the significance of the Conference:—

The Conference will be seen to have tended toward a strengthening of the purely denominational bonds and an affirming of the doctrines of orthodox Christianity. I cannot even say of Unitarianism; for I do not see how the expressions used by several of the speakers can be brought within the simple doctrine of “God is our Father and all men are brothers,” which is the favourite exoteric definition of Unitarianism. The editorial article which we have already quoted says, “Those who came, we hope, discovered that our churches are not going to give up Christ.” This with the communion service for a key-note is an admirable summary of the results. And those of us who have been hoping that English Unitarianism would extend its boundaries and become the expression of English freethought will have to confess to a feeling of intense disappointment. On every hand, it is admitted that orthodox Christianity is fast losing, if it has not already lost, its hold over the minds of the leaders of thought, on the one hand, and the great mass of people to be led, on the other hand. This is no private opinion, it is no longer open to discussion: it is a perfectly well-known fact. And here we see the only organised body in England deliberately retracing its steps toward the very positions which every day of the past few years has shown to be more and more untenable and inadequate. I say the only organised body, for the secularists—with a few individual exceptions—are an ignorant and prejudiced body of men who give Sunday concerts and cheap lectures. Mr. Conway stands alone; and, admirable as some of his writings are, they represent himself only. The Broad Church stands on a rotten foundation of unconscious insincerity. Mr. Stopford Brooke, who has recently become aware of the fact and has left the body, is just about where many of the backward Unitarians stand. The so-called “Free Christian” churches are mostly struggling with the problem of how to get a thoroughly educated and liberal man to accept a mere pittance. So far from there being any organised body, we hardly know of a single satisfactory congregation representing reverent and cultivated free thought. Such a society as Dr. Adler’s in New York is unknown here. There is, of course, no such organisation as the Free Religious Association. So we repeat that it is intensely disappointing to find the only body which gave any promise of an attempt to acknowledge the thought and meet the needs of the day withdrawing its outposts an turning its face to the weak side of the past. The Unitarian denomination, though small in its numbers, is composed of wealthy and cultivated people, and has exercised a great influence. Now, we find many of its members gradually sliding into the Church of England. The reason given for this is that they cannot “satisfy their souls” in a Unitarian chapel. This is, I am convinced, a most false and delusive statement. The real reason is that having long been accustomed to hear their ministers dallying on the outskirts of Orthodoxy, appearing to be anxious for its doctrines without its beautiful forms, occasionally stealing some of the forms themselves, as the surplice, baptism, confirmation, and the like, they naturally prefer to “go the complete unicorn,” as Mr. Bouncer would say. If the Church really is a divinely organised institution, they naturally wish to belong to the real Church, and not to this mushroom Unitarianism. If Christ really is the only means of approach to God, they naturally prefer a Church which stakes its existence on this fact, and not to listen constantly to people who say in one breath that he is and that he is not. Let the orthodox leaders make all they can of this. They stand in need of all the comfort and assistance they can secure. But deserters seldom make recruits worth having. The Unitarian body—this opinion must go for what it is worth, as the opinion of one man—strikes its own death-knell by such a step as it has recently taken. Two courses have for some time been open to it: one, to follow its own lead, and its own best impulses in the doctrine that “all men are brothers,” and to seek, through many teachers, one end; the other, to shrink from the logical results of its original idea, and to fall back to rarefied, transcendental Orthodoxy. In the former case, it would have ceased to exist as a Unitarian Church, but just as the chrysalis ceases when it is eaten by the bird. “Our churches are not going to give up Christ.” Who does not recall the bitter words in Lessing’s glorious play?

“You do not know, you will not know the Christians, Christianity, not manhood, is their pride,
E’en that which, from their Founder down, hath spiced
Their superstition with humanity.
‘Tis not for its humanity they love it.
No, but because Christ taught, Christ practised it.
Happy for them he was so good a man!
Happy for them that they can trust his virtue!
His virtue? Not his virtue, but his name,
They say, shall spread abroad, and shall devour
And put to shame the names of all good men.
The name, the name, is all their pride.”

“Call no man master,” said Jesus himself. “Publish my ethics anonymously,” wrote the blessed-Spinoza for his executors; “truth should bear no man’s name.”

Everywhere our fellow men and women are sinning and suffering, are looking up with weary eyes for any saviour, are holding up their hands for any help. To serve them in any way we must first face those causes in our civilisation which have produced this wretchedness. No charity clubs nor soup kitchens, nor prohibitions, nor coffee-houses, can save us from the fight with the gigantic ideas; it is ideas that we have to destroy and replace. The figure of Jesus stands among the noblest figures of men to guide, to inspire us. Why will these people hide him with their opaque cloak of antiquated superstition? We cannot spare a single member of our army of heroes. Men we are, those are men whom we wish to help. When shall we learn to use the reason which from some source or other we have, and which is our glory as men?

In conclusion, compare for a moment this Unitarian Conference at Liverpool with the first meeting of the “Anti-Aggression League,” recently held in London—a handful of men, among them Herbert Spencer, John Morley, Frederic Harrison, coming together to form an alliance for the purpose of bringing a prompt influence to bear, in moments of political excitement, against aggressive measures of foreign policy, when there would be no time to organise meetings or to appeal to the country. How elaborate, how analytic, how self-assertive, and self-congratulatory, the one! How simple, how needful, how modest the other. Yet if we have not failed utterly to understand the need of the time, if we are not wrong altogether in our views of history, of philosophy, of criticism, unless man is something very different from what we think he is, this little meeting of men in the parlour of a London hotel is infinitely more in the direction of human salvation than those crowded Liverpool meetings, with their denominational and sectarian emphasis, their dreadful cant about “rallying round this blessed Son,” and their sacramental key note. Time will show.

CHRISTIANITY AND MIRACLES.

The Christian World, in an article on a tract on miracles, recently published by Dr. Cairns, discusses the whole question in a manner which even among Unitarians a few years ago would have been considered “advanced”:—

A practical change of a very important kind has taken place in current ideas on the subject of miracle. Even within a century or two the change has been enormous. School-boys, nay, intelligent children, would now laugh at claims to supernatural power on behalf of witches and wizards which grave judges debated over in the seventeenth century. It is not that the present generation cares for metaphysical arguments against miracle, but that an innumerable multitude of occurrences, which used to be deemed supernatural, have turned out to be explicable by natural law. Dr. Cairns thinks it glaringly absurd to suppose that there should be such a “growing impossibility of belief in miracle as science advances,” or that it is more difficult for Professor Huxley to believe in a miracle than for Hume or Gibbon. But the fact is that, within the last quarter of a century, a revolution in thought has taken place, a revolution in which Professor Huxley has been a chief actor; and one of its most prominent results has been, not indeed to produce an atom of proof that a miracle is impossible, but so to extend our view of the operation of natural law as to increase very much the persuasion of its improbability. With the great body of scientific men in these days it has become almost an instinct to believe that, if a law of nature seems, or has at any time seemed, to be violated or set aside, the appearance has been illusive, the action of natural law having been, in the particular case, too subtle for human observation.

Not only, however, is the capacity of this generation to believe in violations or suspensions of nature’s laws as on a thousand in comparison with the same capacity in former times, but the idea has diffused itself, and has achieved great influence, that a violation of natural law might be a less impressive manifestation of God’s power and presence than a use of natural means for that purpose. The touch of God’s finger upon the harp of nature—the accentuation of nature’s language by the Divine voice—the subordination, in an emphatic manner, of the natural to the spiritual—such is the theory of miracle which, in our day, is virtually accepted by a great and growing number of minds as that which enables faith and science once more to shake hands. Dr. Cairns remarks that “the defenders of revelation have undertaken too much by speaking as if a line could in all cases be drawn to mark off miracle from nature.” That is a most important admission. It is undeniable also that, though Jesus Christ referred to his works as well as his words as parts of one Gospel mission, he did look with something like contempt on that thirst for signs and wonders which has infected vulgar religionism in all ages, and took it as a higher proof of faith and spirituality to accept him on the evidence of soul than on that of sense. His faithful followers are entitled to treat the record of his miracles as he encouraged his more spiritually-minded hearers to treat them in his own presence. We are convinced, for example, that such reverent yet candid and thorough-going investigation of the miracle of the swine possessed by devils, as has been made by Dr. Abbott, tends to unveil the majesty of Christ as a healer, to deepen the edifying virtue of the narrative, and to relieve Christian apologists of very serious difficulty.

THE DECEASED WIFE’S SISTER BILL.

The Times says:—“A vote was taken on Monday by the peers in a very large House upon the Bill for legalising marriage with a deceased wife’s sister. For the second reading there were 128 votes, and against it 132. The Bill was thus lost by the narrow majority of four. In 1880 the adverse majority, in a much smaller House, was eleven. The advocates of the Bill have much to say for their contention that they are making many proselytes. The example of other countries and the persistent efforts of the friends of the Bill may be ultimately crowned with success. They will, however, find a quiet but powerful body of opinion arrayed against them so long as their arguments are confined to the enumeration of imperfect statistics respecting the number of persons who have broken the law and speculations as to the many more who feel it a hardship. A small minority cannot fairly urge the Legislature to tamper with the gravest of social interests on such inadequate grounds.”

The Standard believes that “it is pretty certain that the vast majority of women are warmly opposed to any change. It seems probable, we admit, that the advocates of the Bill will shortly succeed; and we can only hope that we may be mistaken in our estimate of its effects. That they are not felt in other countries and in our own colonies may reassure us to some extent. But we are sceptical of arguments of this nature. We fear it will make impossible the cultivation of those ties the existence of which is the chief argument for the change; and abridge the happiness of a thousand families to confer a doubtful benefit on one.”

The Daily Telegraph says:—“For the present the deceased wife’s sister must be content with having the argument and the facts of human nature on her side. She is absolutely certain to prevail in the long run, and indications are not wanting that her triumph will come within a period of years that may be counted on the fingers. Therefore she and her supporters must at present rest satisfied with the gradually increasing interest and influence which she is acquiring in the world, and with the steady rising of the tide which will land her at last in a safe social position. Such a defeat as that of Monday afternoon is almost as good as a victory."

The Pall Mall Gazette writes:—"The Bishop of Peterborough is one of the most practically minded men on the bench, or, for that matter, in the House of Lords. Therefore, in opposing the legalisation of marriage with a deceased wife's sister he naturally passed rapidly away from the overstrained Bible arguments on the subject. But he was far from practical in the stress which he laid upon the impossibility of a poor man marrying a second wife within a year of the death of the first. The strain of life among the very poor is a great deal too sharp and pressing to leave room for delicacy of this sort. It is not in the least likely that, if a very poor man thought his sister-in-law would make the best wife for himself and the best mother for his children, he would think it necessary to turn her out of the house for twelve months for the sake of the proprieties. Nor did the bishop face the argument which was the most forcible in Lord Dalhousie's able and well-filled speech—namely, 'the anomaly arising from the fact that in the Australian colonies and Tasmania marriage with a deceased wife's sister was permitted, and within the last few days it had become legal in Canada and in New Zealand.' If these communities felt the necessity for the legality of such marriages, and the United States, too, it is not probable that a change in the law here would instantly destroy what the Bishop of Peterborough justly called one of the most tender and affectionate of human relationships."

THE SALVATION ARMY.

A case of great importance in relation to the Salvation Army and its proceedings was decided on Tuesday by Mr. Justice Field and Mr. Justice Cave. The case arose out of the action of the magistrates of Weston-super-Mare, in arresting some of the leaders of the Army during a parade through the town, on the ground that they had excited a tumult and were holding an unlawful assembly. An appeal was made, and the Judges held that the Salvationists were engaged in a perfectly lawful proceeding, and set aside the order made by the magistrates with costs. The Times in an article on the decision writes:—

The Salvation Army may be neither very judicious nor very conciliatory in its operations. The assumption of the title of "Army," with all its grades and ranks, the copious use of military metaphors in describing the objects of its campaign, its independence, and its pugnacious activity are all calculated to provoke opposition and antagonism. But, notwithstanding this, so long as it abides by the law, it is clearly entitled to the protection of the law. To allow the opposition and enmity of a rabble to turn its lawful acts into unlawful ones, and thereby to frustrate its legitimate purposes, would be unwise, intolerant and unjust. Those who molest it in the pursuit of lawful objects must be taught that they act unlawfully in doing so, and that they are liable to penalties in consequence. They certainly cannot be allowed to transfer those penalties to the innocent objects of their spite. Now that the law on the matter is authoritatively laid down it behoves all men to obey it, and magistrates and constables will do well to bear in mind that lawful proceedings, harmless in spirit and intent, cannot be rendered unlawful by the fact that they tend to provoke unlawful acts in others.

THE REV. P. T. FORSYTH'S LETTER.

The Christian World, in an article on Mr. Forsyth's recent letter to the Inquirer, to which we have referred on another page, writes:—

We will not follow Mr. Forsyth through his remarkably able and thoughtful argument, but express in the simplest way our earnest concurrence and sympathy with him in his objection to the unquestionable Unitarian tendency to make too quick and full a claim upon the adherence of those who treat its ministers and members with honest and liberal Christian courtesy and respect. If it be not possible to attend any of their special meetings and services without running the risk of being set down in a public journal as belonging to their ranks, it may become not more, but far less common than it has been for those who wish to see and hear their eminent leaders to expose themselves to this peril. We know of one instance, that of a highly-respectable, Congregational minister, who earnestly desired to hear Dr. James Freeman Clarke, at Unity Church, Islington, last week, but who was deterred from attending the service owing to the circumstance that such attendance would not alone subject him to a few faint suspicions in his own communion, but to the far more unwise inferences of the Unitarians. Such cases as these are by no means uncommon; and they are to be deplored. It may be urged that they indicate a lamentable want of independence and bravery. We make bold to say that they indicate nothing of the kind. Certain natures, in which there is no lack of courage, are unwilling to give occasion by their actions to the chit-chat of religious parties and the gossip of public journals. It is a decidedly objectionable condition of things when a man cannot attend a religious service in a High Church, or a Unitarian chapel, without being supposed to sympathise with the one or the other. Quiet, but really brave men will more frequently prefer to keep away if such consequences follow. But in Mr. Forsyth's case there is an element of real trouble and grievance which has our cordial sympathy. His words strike us as exquisitely painful:—"Rejected harshly by the official Congregationalism which has killed an Independency that I would gladly, nay fondly, and I think not fruitlessly, serve, I cannot help looking sadly around for some spiritual fellowship and Christian home." The facts of the case are, that Mr. Forsyth is not a member of either the London Congregational Union or of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, and is suffering from what we can call by no milder name than ecclesiastical ostracism. It is time that this should come to an end. There cannot be a doubt that he has a claim to be included in the ranks, at the head of which may be found a religious thinker like Mr. Baldwin Brown. If red tape is to be blamed for keeping him out in the cold, the sooner it be cast into the fire the better. Exclusion and isolation like to that of which this earnest man complains should not be sanctioned for another hour. No amount of princely and powerful organisation, neither chapel debts paid nor hundreds of chapels erected—in short, nothing that we know of would be worth the gain, if one righteous man, and true servant of Jesus Christ, is to be treated as an alien from the commonwealth to satisfy the rigid requirements of a hard-and-fast ecclesiastical system.

Correspondence.

G A R I B A L D I.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—In the interesting article on Garibaldi which appeared in your columns on the 10th inst. there is one sentence which is so singularly inaccurate that I hope you will allow me, as a personal friend of Mazzini, to correct it.

Your contributor says:—"The overwhelming forces of the French under General Oudinot, after the most heroic and exasperating defence, threatened to lay the city in ashes, and the Triumvirs were for capitulating. Even the proud will of Mazzini seemed for the time to be cowed, but Garibaldi was for holding out to the last."

The facts are as follow:—On the 30th June, 1849, the French General being master of all the heights round Rome, formally summoned the city to surrender. The Triumvirs thereupon called a Council of War, at which all the generals, including Garibaldi, agreed that further defence was impossible. Mazzini reported this to the Assembly, and proposed that the Triumvirs, accompanied by the ministers, the Assembly (or if not all of it a numerous delegation), and such of the population as might choose to follow, should issue forth from the city in company with the army, so as to give to its movements authority and prestige in the eyes of the population. His plan was that "leaving Rome behind, they should fling themselves on the Austrian line of operations between Bologna and Ancona, and endeavour by a first victory to raise the Romagna." The French would then occupy Rome, but without having conquered the Republic." The Assembly, instead of accepting this proposal, adopted the following decree:—

"In the name of God and the people, the Roman Constituent Assembly decrees that all defence shall cease, as henceforth impossible, and remains at its post.

"The Triumvirate is charged with the execution of the present decree."

With this decree the Triumvirate received instructions to forward it to the French General, and to treat with him for the maintenance of order, and for personal security in the conquered city.

The Triumvirs all resigned rather than execute this decree, and Mazzini accompanied his resignation with a protest, in which he said he "had been elected Triumvir to defend and not to destroy the Republic." He declared that "the people had not despaired of their country, though the Assembly had done so," and added that "though Monarchies, founded upon the egotism of interest, may yield or capitulate, republics, founded upon faith and duty, neither yield nor capitulate, but die protesting."

The French army entered Rome on the 2nd of July. At noon on the 3rd the Constitution of the Roman Republic was proclaimed from the capital, amid the enthusiastic applause of the people. On the 4th this Assembly was dispersed by a battalion of French infantry, and General Oudinot assumed the supreme government of the city. Mazzini remained in the city for another week organising the Republican Society, which maintained a correspondence between the Romans and the National party in the rest of Italy.

When Garibaldi left Rome he attempted to carry out the plan Mazzini had proposed, but his means were insufficient, and the time was not yet ripe for success.

WM. SHAEN.

THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Having received a considerable number of letters expressing thanks for my communication to the Inquirer published on the 20th ult., I feel I ought to offer a reply to the letter of your venerable correspondent Mr. James Orr, printed in your last issue. It is, however, contrary to human nature for a veteran theologian to relinquish a mental position that has been publicly maintained during a long life. It is to a younger generation the Church must look for the adoption and promulgation of more rational views.

In judging the moral character of Joseph of Arimathea, in the ruse that Mr. Hennell conjectured him to have arranged for the disposal of the body of Jesus, we must bear in mind the circumstances of peril and popular excitement in which he probably found himself after the entombment of the body. Many a man, who may be courteously described as honourable, good, and righteous (especially if holding the public office of "Councillor"), would, in similar circumstances, feel justified in practising some amount of deception. Indeed, in diplomatic negotiations, and in the treatment of excited crowds bent on mischief, lunatics, and would-be murderers, deception for a good object is almost universally recognised as not only excusable, but even praiseworthy. Jesus himself (if his words are accurately reported in John vii. 1-10) merely, as it would seem, to secure much-needed quietude and relief from unsympathetic company, practised a ruse.

Without taking the harsh view held by Porphyry on this matter, it appears that Jesus, in this instance, adopted an amiable diplomatic stratagem. The time of Jesus and the apostles, and some centuries after, was an age of pious frauds. For example, works were frequently given to the public as having been written by some person already famous, and whose name would be a passport to favour.

It would occupy too much of your valuable space to repeat the arguments of Mr. Hennell in support of his view, but any person sufficiently interested in the matter may have from me, for the asking, a copy of a reprint I shall have ready in a few days, containing both Hennell's and Denton's theories.

The strongest argument I know of against the alleged resurrection of the really dead Nazarene prophet (viewing the case merely as one of documentary evidence) is the very great improbability of the series of acts related to have been performed by him after he rose from the dead. We are asked to believe (not to mention all) that a person who had actually died rose up again with the same body of "flesh and bones"; glided unobserved through the streets of Jerusalem, and suddenly appeared in a room, the doors being shut for fear of the Jews; partook of broiled fish and honeycomb, and vanished out of their sight; made himself invisible, and did without food and sleeping accommodation for the longer or shorter periods of time between his occasional appearances, for forty days; walked with his disciples to the Mount of Olives, without being recognised by any person beyond the circle of his familiar associates; and then, greatest marvel of all, that body of flesh and bones rose up (Oh! shade of Newton) until a cloud received him out of the sight of his gazing friends. Did that body of flesh and bones remain in the cloud, or ascend still higher? If the latter, what became of it when it reached the limit of the atmosphere necessary for such a body?—If the former, what became of it?—Will Mr. Orr excuse my saying that the faith of a Unitarian who can receive and assimilate all this must have a large and easy digestion, and a plentiful lack of discrimination respecting the quality of his mental pabulum? To accept this series of marvels, and reject the sagacious conjecture of Mr. Hennell, which attributes to Joseph of Arimathea an act in perfect harmony with the laws of human nature, looks very much like straining out a gnat and swallowing a camel.

It seems remarkable that any person can for a moment suppose that the "lofty idea which even unbelievers have entertained of the character of Jesus" is, in the least, compromised by any of the pious frauds of his followers. To hold a person morally responsible for a ruse practised by his friends in the disposal of his dead body is a new doctrine in ethics. Murdered persons, according to this doctrine, are accomplices with their murderers in hiding, or otherwise disposing of, their own mangled remains!

In the age in which the Christian documents were drawn up myth and marvel were created on the slightest pretext around the name and memory of every great man. The proofs of this are too numerous to cite, even in the briefest way, and are too well known to the scholarly readers of the Inquirer to need citation. If your space permitted, passages may be quoted (to save your readers the trouble of reference) even from Justin Martyr, Tatian, and other early Christian Fathers, presenting a perfect analogy to the resurrection myth of Jesus in the legends respecting Esculapius, the Roman Cæsars, and many others. In the case of Jesus the empty tomb would be quite sufficient to stimulate the imagination of his followers, and furnish the germ of the Resurrection legend, even in the absence of the actual interviews which Jesus may have had with Mary and others during his briefly resuscitated life, as conjectured by Denton.

It would seem that the accumulation of scientific testimony to the absolute reign of law makes it far easier to believe that the disposal of the body of Jesus was contrived by those who had charge of it than that the dead Nazarene rose to life again and went through the series of grotesque performances related in documents produced under the conditions, and subject to the manipulations in vogue during the first three centuries of the Christian era.

To quote a passage from the preface to Mr. Hennell's fine-spirited and noble work, I would express my sincere conviction that "if the progress of inquiry should lead men to carry the pruning-knife nearer to the root than they had at first contemplated, and to consign even the whole of the miraculous relations in the New Testament to the same list as the prodigies of Hindoo or Romish superstition, we may still find enough left in Christianity to maintain its name and power amidst growing knowledge and civilisation. And this will be in that purer moral spirit and those higher views of the nature of man, the progress of which, although naturally coincident with the advancement of the human mind, received so vigorous an impulse from the life of Jesus, that this spirit and these views have come to be indissolubly associated with the idea, and expressed under the name of Christianity. Christianity thus regarded as a system of elevated thought and feeling will not be injured by being freed from those fables, and those views of local or temporary interest which hung about its origin."

Blackpool, June 12. F. HAYDN WILLIAMS.

THE CHURCH AND THE PEOPLE.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I have been much interested in the papers you have published on "The Duty of our Churches in Relation to the Masses of the People," as well as in the perusal of the leading article you devoted to that subject last week; and as I have had some special opportunities for studying the question I shall be glad if you will find room for the following remarks.

In the first place, the writers of the papers in question have scarcely, if at all, recognised the widely different local conditions under which the people are approached by our ministers; in other words, they have taken little or no account of the varying density of the atmosphere of prejudice in the great centres of population. Where there are old and socially influential congregations, as in Birmingham and Leicester, that density is relatively small; where, on the other hand, there are no such congregations, as in Wolverhampton, it is great, and it reaches its maximum in small country towns like that in which my lot was till recently cast. Mr. Hopps, for instance, has succeeded in reaching the masses here, and he is deserving the utmost credit for the self-sacrificing labours by which he accomplished it. But then, as he told us all upwards of a year ago, he had a small army of workers who heralded his approach in the most thorough-going manner. He had also faithful and, so far as the crowd is concerned, very efficient coadjutors in those who took charge of the musical part of the meetings, to say nothing of those who helped in other ways to make the services a success. And what is much more to the point, he had a liberal religious atmosphere in which to perform his work, that atmosphere in which Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Macdonald had previously drawn large numbers together in the same hall. Neither Mr. Hopps nor the archangel Gabriel could bring as many people together for Unitarian worship or under the auspices of the Unitarian name in a town where there are no leading public men connected with the Liberal cause. Let Wolverhampton, which is a much larger place than Leicester, be tried in proof of this, or for the matter of that, some district of the metropolis.

Another of the mistakes which seem to be made on this subject is the assumption that such of the artisan classes as attend no place of worship are free from the prejudices which have to be overcome in what may be spoken of as the worshipping or religious portion of the community. My experience among the working-classes of Birmingham and elsewhere has shown me that orthodox opinions, when imbibed in childhood, remain latent in the uncultured mind even though the public services of religion may have been abandoned for years. No doubt our Unitarian beliefs are very simple when taught or learnt in childhood, but they are by no means simple when they are placed before half-educated people in real or seeming opposition to what such people have theoretically regarded as sacred. On the other hand, the denial of all religion or its rejection is a very simple affair; it is a short cut to philosophy which the disjointed reading of the artisan enables him to readily take. And in not a few cases he takes it, and, instead of becoming a Unitarian or a Liberal Christian, he becomes a Secularist. Of course there are exceptions; but experience has shown me that this is the normal state of things, and if I am right in the above opinions it is no more than we should be prepared to expect.

Apart, however, from the foregoing considerations, which are referable to the chances of success in any crusade we may enter upon to bring in the masses, I am disposed to ask with "C. L. C." in your last, "Is there that pressing need for new methods, merely because they are new, when plenty of old tried methods remain waiting to be used?" We have hitherto contented ourselves with being to a large extent an invisible force in society. If our numbers have been small, our influence has been great. It has flown on silently through the various, and especially the upper strata of religious organisations, working upon and leavening the best minds as the mighty invisible forces of nature transform in their silent progress the husky seed or the shrivelled bulb into the beautiful plant. We have cared more for truth than for making comments, and hence tens of thousands have more or less completely adopted our methods and our opinions, and yet do not and will not join our ranks. We have been faithful, and that fidelity has been recognised in Heaven—will be recognised in history.

Now it seems to me we cannot abandon this high ground without something like a denial of our birthright. Our Domestic Missions are noble institutions. In carrying them on we give our best energies our religious consolation and our money. In trying, however, to found self-supporting congregations, we make a denominational investment, which is quite another matter. Whenever this latter course is adopted it should be done, it seems to me, from active centres, otherwise we run the risk of getting no denominational results. Hitherto in our destructive criticism science has been with us, now we have to proclaim, to some extent, in the teeth of science, that the spiritual in man is neither governed by traditional orthodoxy nor capable of being swept away by any flood-tide of negation. Surely this is our mission; surely our work is not that which the Methodists and other popular Churches have done, but to stand between the serried and hostile ranks of superstition and scepticism, and to speak with all the earnestness we can command in the name of those great truths which the former obstructs and the latter denies.

J. MODEN.

Leicester, June 13.

The Liberal Pulpit.

DR. J. FREEMAN CLARKE'S ASSOCIATION SERMON.

Dr. Freeman Clarke's memorable sermon, delivered at the recent annual meeting of the British and Foreign Association, is now published under the title "Work of Unitarians in the Past and the Future," and a more appropriate and effective discourse has probably never been preached on any of our anniversary occasions. We gave a full outline of the discourse at the time, and it now requires not criticism but thoughtful reading. We transcribe the noble passages relating to the work of Martineau, Emerson, and Carlyle, of which only a brief summary was given in our report:—

Is it not evident that those who stand on the Unitarian platform are much better qualified, other things being equal, to meet the difficulties of honest minds and to come to some satisfactory conclusion, than those who enter the field of battle hampered with the impedimenta of creeds, articles of faith and fixed rituals? In this new field, who has done as much to clear the air and place religion on solid foundations as your and our Martineau? This is a great work which Unitarians can do for the future, as they have done a noble work in the past. To strip religious faith of all its technicalities, to fall back on first principles, to assume nothing but what can be verified by personal experience in the soul, or by the concurrent testimony of the human race—this is the true method of science, for science means knowledge, and knowledge comes from experience. We know the facts and laws of the outward world by sensible experience; we know the facts and laws of the spiritual world by the experiences of consciousness. The vast realm of Spirit, with which the soul communes by an inward sight, is as substantial and real as that which is revealed through the senses. On this rock of solid inward knowledge will the new church be built, and the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it. Nor shall we assume in the beginning the superiority of Christianity to other religions, and then bring arguments to prove our position; but we shall seek for the best things in all other religions, and compare them honestly with the best in our own, and let the result take care of itself. If we find Christ to be more divine and at the same time more human than any other teacher, it will not be by accumulating texts or appealing to miracles, but by seeing what is the length and breadth and depth and height of his teaching, and by observing how profound his actual influence has been and is on the human mind and heart. In establishing the immortal powers of the soul, we shall fall back on those intuitions which are necessary and universal—which are the same in youth and age—the deep voice which speaks to the mind of the peasant and the philosopher with the same solemn and tender tones. We shall appeal to the noble sense of Freedom, which, amid all the stress of circumstances, habit, organisation, testifies for ever that man is not meant to be their slave, but their master. We shall awaken the awful note of Conscience, that divine chord which reaches from earth to the stars, and whose vibrations echo through all the heavens and hells of the universe. And when we reach the greatest question of all, that which concerns the Supreme essence, the Being of beings, the ineffable Wisdom, the infinite Order, the all-pervading Beauty, the basis in which Nature and Spirit both inhere,—least of all then shall we dogmatise. We shall bend low, and put our ear close to the ground, to listen to the murmur of consent which rises from all created beings in aspiration toward the Infinite and the Eternal. If one earnest thinker sees this vast Essence in all the combined and complex forces of nature, we will not deny that this also is a vision of the great Reality. If another finds Him in the waves of intellectual beauty which roll up for ever from the ocean of thought and life, we will endeavour to know what deep truth there is in this statement also. We will not be alarmed by the word Pantheism on the one hand, knowing that the profoundest thinkers, headed by the Apostle Paul, love to think of God as a fulness which fills all in all. Nor will we lose our conviction of the Divine Personality because of the arguments of the sharpest logic. For what are logic and metaphysics worth when opposed to facts? Personality in man is a fact, and the highest fact we know, as well as the most wonderful. The perfect unity of thought and love passing into every act of will, by which all the resources of life, memory, knowledge, imagination, are combined and made effective,—this has given to man the mastery of the world. Man is the lord of all here because he is a spiritual person. All outward things are composed of dissolving atoms, man himself is a unit of permanent force. The Supreme Being cannot be less than this; He must possess some equivalent quality which shall make Him the One in all. Otherwise there can be neither order, nor stability, nor monarchy of law, in the universe. Words and names are nothing; it is no matter with what language you describe that which no language can adequately express. Better perhaps to say it sometimes in one way and sometimes in another, so that we hold fast to those insights, to that knowledge, by means of which old experience may attain some touch of a prophetic strain.

In this direction your Martineau has led the way here, and our Emerson in America. One is the philosopher, the other the seer, of the coming religion. On the soft spring day when Emerson was carried to his rest in the rural cemetery of Concord, a great company of those whom his words had benefited collected, in grateful memory of the help he had given them. If I may apply the words of Goethe at the grave of Schiller, this multitude seemed to thank God for the pure influence of the soul of Emerson, and say:

"He was ours; and may that word of pride
Drown with its lofty tone pain's bitter cry.
With us, youth's struggles over, he could ride
At anchor, in safe harbour, peacefully.
Yet onward did his mighty spirit stride
To Goodness, Beauty, Truth, eternally;
And far behind, in mist dissolved away,
That which confines us all, the Common, lay."

The teaching of Emerson has been of two great truths, self-reliance and God-reliance. "See with your own eyes, think your own thoughts, be yourself"—this was the first main element of his teaching. This made him incapable of compromise, an independent thinker, long standing aloof from party and church, and yet never opposing them. Only a month or two before his death he told Mr. Howard Brown that so far from disliking the Christian name, he thought it a noble designation. He often attended the Unitarian church in his town, and a year or two ago, when the Rev. Rush Shippen, Secretary of the Unitarian Association, preached, on behalf of that body, after the service Mr. Emerson came to him and asked, "To whom shall the faithful offer their contributions?" He described his own state of mind in the poem called "The Problem." He had a taste for the Church and for ministers, but he would not on any account be himself limited to the forms of the clerical profession. Yet he was a great preacher, really one of the greatest of our time—recalling mankind from sense to soul, making nature a symbol of spirit, speaking with the authority of a seer of the reality of things unseen. For as his first main doctrine was "Self-reliance," his second was "God-reliance." To him God was not a Monarch outside of the world, but an ocean of thought and love in which we are all included as the sea includes its waves. This ever-present life is our strength and joy; this renews our hope, and feeds us with the living bread which comes down from heaven. This faith in the Universal Spirit saved his doctrines of self-reliance from ultimating in Individualism; while his emphasis on self-reliance was the counterpoise which kept his doctrine of God-reliance from dissipating itself into a vague Pantheism. His singularly pure and noble character, without a touch of egotism, vanity, greed, hate, was the lofty tower to support this beacon-light, and he stood thus a Pharos to illuminate our darkness. So he kept up, in our day, faith in God, in the soul, in immortality, and the Divinity which shapes human ends.

And to these two leaders, Martineau and Emerson, let us add, gratefully, the name of Carlyle—Carlyle as he was in his earlier days, when he sounded that trumpet note which rang across two hemispheres, the bugle-call which set the wild echoes flying when we were young who now are grey. He also did us the inestimable service of showing us the real world, full of marvels and wonders, which is around us, and unsealing our eyes to behold the miracle of the universe. He was a voice crying in the wilderness, "Prepare the way of the Lord."

This is the work the age needs. Tired of formalism, of worn-out creeds, of empty phraseology, it demands reality. The tendency to materialism is only the first outcome of this overruling appetite. Outward things at least are real, and so the spirit of the time turns first to them. But we, as teachers of heavenly truth, are to show what deeper realities are below temporal phenomena, and so at last to "o'errule the hard divorce which parts things natural and divine." Be confident of this, that man, the child of God, can never long be contented to live without God in the world.

Religious Intelligence.

LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE UNITARIAN CHURCHES.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY.

The annual Provincial Assembly of Presbyterian and Unitarian ministers and congregations of Lancashire and Cheshire was held on Thursday at Chowbent. The proceedings began with a religious service in the Unitarian Chapel, the devotional part being conducted by the Rev. R. Pilcher, and the sermon being preached by the Rev. E. S. Howse. The business meeting was afterwards held in the chapel, the Rev. William Gaskell (president) in the chair. There were sixty-six ministers present, and a large number of delegates. The roll of ministers and delegates was called, and the minutes of the last assembly were read by the secretary (the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, Gee Cross).

The President's address was then delivered, but we are obliged to defer it until next week.

The TREASURER (Mr. Harry Rawson) submitted the financial statement, which had been audited by Messrs. Marshall, Gibbon, and Co., of Manchester. It showed that the year commenced with a balance in hand of £27 14s. 3d., and that there is a balance in hand of £58 7s. 6d.

The Rev. M. C. FRANKLAND moved that the Rev. William Gaskell be re-elected president for the ensuing year.—This was seconded by Mr. W. MARSHALL (Ashton-under-Lyne), and heartily agreed to. On the motion of Mr. F. W. HOLLAND, seconded by the Rev. D. DAVIS (Lancaster), Mr. Harry Rawson was re-elected treasurer. The committee for the ensuing year was also re-appointed, on the motion of the Rev. C. T. POYNTING, the Rev. H. E. Dowson being again appointed to the office of secretary.

The Rev. E. S. HOWSE (Altrincham) invited the Assembly to hold the next annual meeting at Dunham Chapel, Altrincham. The motion was seconded by the Rev. J. E. ODGERS, successor-designate to Mr. Howse, at Altrincham, and agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE REFORMS.

The SECRETARY read the report of the Special Committee on questions of civil and religious liberty. The Committee stated that they had no new questions to bring before the Assembly, and the two petitions they had drafted were similar to those of last year. The Committee felt they were right in the importance they attached to pressing year after year the claims of justice in relation to the two matters of the marriage law and the Parliamentary oath. The battle of religious equality could be won only by slow degrees and constant perseverance. The public agitation or the Parliamentary motion continued and repeated year after year at length gained a hearing, and if the cause were just and true the victory was achieved. The present day was one in which the excitement of an urgent political crisis had taken men's thoughts off less burning topics, yet if the great cause of religious equality slept it would spring ere long into newness of life, if its advocates were steadfast. Now was not a fitting time to raise the wide question of disestablishment, for it was in no sense just yet within the range of practical politics, but it was wise and necessary to keep hammering away at the outworks of the stronghold of religious privilege. The distinction still maintained between the clergy of the Establishment and of the Dissenting churches in the conduct of marriages was entirely unwarrantable, and it must be attacked perseveringly until it was overthrown. The members of the Assembly, at all events, were right in advocating year by year the placing of the Nonconformist on an equality with the Established ministry in this matter, and the Committee were as much convinced as they were last year that the wisest and most expedient course was to procure the desired equality by so reforming the law that the presence of the registrar should be required at any marriage impartially. At one and the same time an existing stigma would be removed from the Dissenting ministry, and a new security would be gained for the strict observance of the marriage law wherever and by whomsoever the religious ceremony might be conducted. The other question, that of the Parliamentary oath, had made no progress during the twelve months. It was the duty of the Assembly to repeat its action of last year, and to claim once again for a duly-elected member of Parliament the right of taking his seat whatever his opinions on religious questions. The Committee, in pressing this matter once more, needed hardly to say that they did it not as the advocates of Mr. Bradlaugh's opinions, or of his way of dealing with the Parliamentary oath, they objected to the one as much as to the other, but they did it for the sake of religious liberty, and they held that the true test of the principle was found when its application had to be made to the most objectionable opinion of the most objectionable individuals. Of one thing the committee were assured, that by no conceivable course could a fictitious influence and importance be won for Mr. Bradlaugh's opinions so effectually as by denying him a seat in the people's House, to which he had again and again been duly elected. The committee had drawn up no petition on the Burials Law, but repeated their declaration of last year in favour of a further amendment of it, by which any orderly service shall be admissible in the churchyards of the land; and the Assembly should raise its voice for religious equality for all—whether within or without the fold of Christ.

The Rev. W. MITCHELL (Ardwick) moved that the report be received and entered on the minutes. With regard to the marriage laws, he thought that the proposal contained in the report was not only a step in the right direction but a stroke of strategy, because it was a step towards disestablishment—(laughter), and, at the same time, a mode of helping to raise the Episcopalian minister to the level of the Nonconformist minister. It seemed to him that at present the Episcopalian minister occupied an inferior position altogether, for whilst he was bound by creeds and by a Parliament which if it chose could impose thirty-nine articles in addition to those which he was now compelled to accept, the Nonconformist minister was free civilly and religiously—(applause). With regard to the oaths question, it was a curious anomaly that Parliament should refuse to Mr. Bradlaugh that justice which outside its walls it compelled others to extend to him.

Mr. S. OGDEN (Oldham) seconded the motion, and the report was unanimously adopted.

The Rev. W. C. SQUIER (Stand) moved the adoption of a petition to Parliament, praying that the registrar should be required to attend all marriages, and that the hours during which the marriage ceremony may be performed should be extended to three o'clock in the afternoon.

The Rev. J. FREESTON (Stalybridge) seconded the motion.

An amendment was moved and seconded to the effect that the limitation of hours mentioned in the petition during which the marriage ceremony may be performed should be omitted.

The amendment was passed, and the petition as amended was adopted.

Mr. HARRY RAWSON moved a petition to Parliament praying that members may be permitted to make an affirmation instead of being called upon to take the oath. He said that by adopting the memorial the Assembly would once more utter a protest against the interposition of any barrier of a theological kind between a man's rights and the untrammelled exercise of them.

The Rev. W. HARRISON (Glossop) seconded the motion, which was carried.

On the motion of Mr. S. ROBINSON (Stockport), seconded by Mr. CALEB WRIGHT, the Special Committee on questions of civil and religious liberty was reappointed.

The remaining business was not of public interest.

In the evening a meeting was held in the same place, Mr. CALEB WRIGHT presiding, at which addresses were given by the Rev. R. L. CARPENTER, the Rev. JAMES HARWOOD, Mr. CUTHBERT GRUNDY (Bury), and others. We shall give a report next week.

M. DE PRESSENSÉ ON THE ORIGIN OF MAN.—On Thursday afternoon M. E. de Pressensé, D.D., of Paris, delivered, at Willis's Rooms, the first of three lectures on this subject. The Duke of Argyll occupied the chair, and among those present were the Bishop of Nelson and the Bishop of Ballarat. His Grace said he thought he did not exaggerate when he declared that the origin of man was an absolute and profound mystery. He believed that the illustrious man who was lately interred in Westminster Abbey, Mr. Darwin, if he had been present on that occasion, would have confessed, as indeed he did confess in his own works, that his theory with respect to the origin of man was entirely and purely speculative. It was right that this speculation should be approached from every point of view, and he thought he might say that so far as physical science was concerned there existed at that moment no clue to the origin of man. Approaching the matter, however, from the point of view of Christian philosophy and Christian speculation, he was sure they would all hear with intense interest what was advanced on that dark and mysterious subject by so eminent a man as M. de Pressensé, who represented the French Protestant Church. M. de Pressensé then proceeded with his introductory lecture, employing his own language, but in such a manner as to be easily understood by persons having only a moderate acquaintance with French speaking. Having begun by intimating that his design in that lecture was to give something like "the bulletin of the battle," which was now being fought on the principles of theism to describe the attack, and also the defence, which he believed would soon prove victorious—he maintained that the progress of the natural sciences did not imperil theism, the sovereignty of science in its proper domain being the establishment of facts. The rapid movement of contemporaneous thought did justice, even to a fault, to error in the systems which succeeded each other. The positivism which interdicted all research into the causes and origin of things was now past; and the question of origin was raised afresh on a more ample field. The question of the origin of man was identical with that of the origin of things in general. Two great schools were face to face—the school of evolution and that of creation—their principal representatives being found especially in France. The lecturer then referred to recent manifestations of materialism and spiritualism, and to the great philosophers attached to no religious body—Virechow, Claude Bernard, and others. There was, he said, a theory of evolution which was not contrary to that of creation, it was that which admitted the intervention in the origin of things of an intelligent and powerful Cause. Darwinism, which was far from being absolutely demonstrated scientifically, was not incompatible with theism, Mr. Wallace being witness. Great services had been rendered by it to science. The laws of evolution laid down by it implied divine intervention. The theory of evolution as formulated by Mr. Herbert Spencer and Herr Haeckel was incompatible with theism. The principal scientific objections to this theory were—1. That it did not explain the progress of beings—their evolution. 2. That it could not cause life, sensation, or mind to proceed from pure mechanism, and demanded of us acts of faith. 3. That it could not furnish an account of the origin of man considered in his physical and his moral life. On the leading features of man's moral nature and his mental constitution the lecturer dwelt with special emphasis. On the motion of the Bishop of Nelson, seconded by Sir Joseph Fayrer, thanks were voted to the Duke of Argyll and Dr. de Pressensé.

KIDDERMINSTER.—On Sunday last, June 11, the anniversary services in connection with the New Meeting Sunday Schools were held. The sermons were preached by the Rev. W. Carey Walters, minister of the congregation, and in the afternoon a Service of Song was given by the teachers and scholars. At each service there was a large congregation. In the afternoon and evening every available space was occupied. The collections amounted to £44, by far the largest amount ever contributed for Sunday-school purposes by the congregation. The scholars themselves contributed liberally towards this amount. The chancel communion table, font, lectern and pulpit were exquisitely decorated with hot-house flowers, ferns and moss.

STROUD.—The Unitarian congregation of this town were favoured on Sunday, June 11, with a visit from the Rev. R. R. Suffield, of Reading, whose presence in his old Roman Catholic locality was of considerable interest. Mr. Suffield was Prior of the Woodchester Monastery, near Stroud, for some years, and was intimately known and beloved by the Catholics of the neighbourhood, and this was the first occasion he had visited the place since his secession from the Romish Church, nearly thirteen years ago. The congregations were the largest which had ever met in the church at Stroud: in the morning the place was quite full, and in the evening there was not sufficient seating accommodation for the visitors, and chairs had to be placed in the aisle. Mr. Suffield in the morning prefaced his sermon with a few remarks on his visit. He said as twelve years had elapsed since his secession from the Roman Catholic Church, and as our beneficent religious cause was now happily established here, he did not feel that his presence could be misconstrued into an act of hostility or unkindness towards his old friends at Woodchester, as might have been had he acceded to their friendly invitation at an earlier period. The subject of his morning discourse was the New Faith. In eloquent and stirring language he pointed to the fact that the ancient ecclesiastical mythologies, Roman Catholic and Protestant, as well as Brahminical, Buddhist, Mahomedan, &c., were decaying, that it was universally admitted by the ecclesiastical authorities of all these systems that the men of thought and culture were gradually falling away from them, and that the belief in the preternatural and miraculous had now ceased to exist among educated and thoughtful men. In this state of things it was the duty of those who desired to prevent men lapsing into Atheism to provide them with a rational and reasonable faith, and this faith, as contained in the Unitarian Church, he proceeded to expound and develop, closing with a powerful antithesis, in which he contrasted the unreality of dying superstitions with the mental and moral satisfaction of the religion which was in accord with reason and with the highest aspirations of the heart of man. In the evening Mr. Suffield preached on "the Ministry of Reconciliation," taking as a text the words of 2 Corinthians v. 18. Answering the question, reconciliation between whom and what: he said the mythological, and still the prevalent mode of thinking, put the antagonism between God and man, the material and the spiritual, the finite and the infinite, the temporal and the eternal; but Unitarians, guided not by one limited revelation, but by the universal revelation through nature and the human soul, through conscience, reason and experience; they reconciled by extending the realm of the natural till it included all phenomena. They reconciled by declaring, and proving, that there was no gulf between matter and mind, but a connection essential, eternal, and divine; they reconciled this world with the next by filling up the gulf and throwing both into one; they reconciled the human and divine by destroying the barriers that would separate them. The true atonement was to reconcile humanity to life, its shortness, its uncertainty, its toils, its failures, its griefs and its disappointments, and this had to be repeated again and again. They had to reconcile sect with sect, church with church, religion to religion, not by drawing people to profess contrary to their convictions but by aiding the best men and women amongst them to realise that humanity was greater than their sect, and that far above all religious forms and doctrines was the universal aspiration of the human heart and the bond of our common human sympathies. The congregation listened with rapt attention to the able and eloquent discourses, and expressions of delight and satisfaction were universal, even from those who habitually worship with orthodox denominations. The collections were the largest ever made in the church.

Our Calendar.

SUNDAY, JUNE 18.

LONDON.

Rev. P. H. WICKSTED, at Little Portland-street Chapel, at 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M.
Rev. CHAS. VOYSEY, at Langham-hall, 43, Great Portland-street, 11.15 A.M.

MONDAY.

Manchester New College Examination.
British and Foreign Unitarian Association Council, at 3 P.M.

TUESDAY.

Manchester New College Examination.

WEDNESDAY.

Manchester New College Examination.
Visitor's Address, 4 P.M.
Old Students' Dinner, 6 P.M.
Annual Meeting of the West-Riding Unitarian Mission Society at York.

THURSDAY.

Manchester New College Trustees' Meeting, 11 A.M.
Valedictory Service 8 P.M.

 Notices of Sunday Services are inserted in this Calendar at 6d. a line, and of other Meetings and Service gratis, provided a detailed Advertisement appears.

SELECTED BOOKS.

Bancroft's (G.) Constitution of the United States of America, 2 vols., 24/
Carlyle's (T.) Reminiscences of my Irish Journey in 1849, 7/6
Dale's (A. W.) The Synod of Elvira and Christian Life in the Fourth Century, 10/6
Dillon's (W.) The Dismal Science, a Criticism on Modern English Political Economy, 5/
Elliot's (Hon. A.) The State and the Church, 3/6
English Philosophers: Shaftesbury and Hutcheson, by T. Fowler, 3/6
Great Musicians: Sebastian Bach, by R. L. Poole, 3/6
Gray, by E. W. Gosse, 2/6 (English Men of Letters).
Gwatkin's (H. M.) Studies in Arianism, 10/6
Haweis's (Mrs.) Beautiful Houses, 4/
Lacordaire (H. D.), a Biographical Sketch, by W. L. S. Lear, 7/6
Symonds's (J. A.) Animi Figura, 5/

MR. WALTER MAWER, Sunday School Association Office, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C., will supply any of the above-named new books and new editions, at the prices named, carriage free, on receipt of Post-office Order, payable at the East Strand Post-office.

DEATHS.

DARBISHIRE—On the 10th inst., Ellen, wife of G. Stanley Darbshire, Riversfield, Eccles, near Manchester, aged 51 years.

HOWORTH—On Monday, the 12th inst., at his residence, Spring-place, Bury, Lancashire, in his 78th year, Franklin Howorth, Minister of the Christian Church, Bury.

LANG—On the 8th inst., at Mancombe, Henbury, aged 74, Sarah Anna, widow of the late Thomas Lang, Esq. Friends will please accept this (the only) intimation.

PHIPSON—On the 14th inst., at 14, Connaught-square, W., Ida, the widow of Thomas Weatherley Phipson, Q. C., aged 72.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS AND OINTMENT.—During excessive variations of temperature every one is more or less liable to internal congestions and inflammations. Throat, chest, liver, bowels, kidneys, and skin all suffer in some degree, and may be relieved by rubbing in this Ointment, aided by proper doses of the Pills, for administering which full directions accompany each box; in truth, any one who thoroughly masters Holloway's "instructions" will, in remedying disease, exchange the labour of an hour for the profit of a lifetime. All bronchial, pulmonary, and throat disorders require that the Ointment should be thoroughly well rubbed upon the skin twice a-day with great regularity, considerable briskness, and much persistence.

WANTED, early in September, a comfortable HOME for a young Gentleman about to enter a Solicitor's Office in Birmingham. The neighbourhood of Edgbaston preferred.—Address, Mr. W. C. JOLLY, Bath.

WANTED, in August, for the New Gravel Pit Hackney Elementary School for Girls, a CERTIFICATED MISTRESS, capable of managing a school of 75 pupils, with pupil teachers' assistance.—Apply, stating references and salary required, to the Secretary, The Elms, Stamford-hill.

MR. PLATT'S PUBLICATIONS.

JUST PUBLISHED,

PROGRESS, by JAMES PLATT, Author of "Business," "Morality," "Money," "Life," and "Economy."

CONTENTS:—Introduction—Causality—Acquisitiveness—Capital—Free Labour—Employed—Technical Education—Production—Distribution—Progress—Concluding Remarks.

ONE SHILLING.

"TRUE progress needs clear perception of things as they are, the power to see and understand what is seen. There can be no progress by people or nations without obedience to the law of healthy development of the best part of our nature; a steady, persistent struggle after 'more light'; the earnest desire for 'truth'; an invincible determination to leave the world better than we found it; an onward and upward progress achieved by a knowledge of the laws that cause success, and faithful observance thereof. The philosophy based upon 'cause and effect' suits all ages, all climes; it satisfies and stimulates. The point which yesterday was invisible is its goal to-day, and will be its starting-point to-morrow. It is a creed that ever urges mankind on, which never rests, which is never attained, which is never perfect. Its aim is 'progress,' for ever and aye progressing. Its belief is, that there is nothing in human affairs that men deem impossible that may not come to pass; nothing that has been done by the élite of men but that all men might do; nothing that has once occurred that may not reproduce itself again. It has become essential for the further progress of mankind that they be taught to perceive the regular action of eternal principles, be trained to perceive that 'all effects are due to causes.'"
—(Page 8.)

"THE cause and effect theory puts aside the conflict between science and religion, and substitutes a creed in harmony with every new discovery of science and surrounding nature; it is upheld by, and satisfies, our reason, morality, righteousness; it tells men they must strive for healthy bodies and healthy minds; their hands must be clean, their minds pure, if they want peace and happiness. You may say that the idea is not practical, while it may be that the world is not yet ready for it; but year by year the people will grow wiser, and the onward progress of the later thought will be marvellous, the people recognising that it is not a myth, but a fact, that the sins of the fathers are visited upon the children, daily, hourly, inevitably; and that, if a man wishes his descendants to escape punishment—if he has a desire to escape it himself—he must walk circumspectly. It is no use for the drunkard, the improvident, or the profligate to ask for mercy, or to say he repents, on his death-bed; it is then too late to mend: he has sinned, he has broken the laws of health or morality; the effect will follow as certain as the night follows the day; 'as we sow, so shall we reap.' Accept as a truth, that no man or woman can lead an immoral or dishonest life without punishment ensuing. They may be sorry, may repent; the anguish and remorse is part of their punishment; the consequences of their wrong-doing cannot be escaped; some one must be—is punished."—(Pages 9 and 10.)

"I AM as anxious for the moral and social amelioration of the condition of mankind as any one, but think the object can only be attained by 'removing the causes that impede and check the development of man's intellectual and moral nature;' and I rely wholly and solely on man's doing for himself what theologians teach men to ask God to do for them. I do not ask men to be 'content,' but to have an abhorrence of the social and moral hideousness that surrounds them. I do not ask men to excuse themselves under the plea of 'being born in sin,' the innate depravity of human nature, man's incapacity to raise himself, the necessity for a 'vicarious sacrifice,' but I unhesitatingly assert that if man be depraved, it is his own fault, that he has the power to rise superior to the temptations that surround him; that he is punished for every sin of commission or omission by the laws of his nature.

"The old belief lowers man and crushes his aspirations, by putting his advancement upwards outside of himself; makes him a mere puppet, a sport for the inscrutable dispensations of Providence. Blind faith is honoured above the sublimest of acts. The new system entirely reverses this; it raises man's self-respect, gives a dignity to his nature, stimulates his desire to observe and think, to progress, by telling him plainly that all advancement rests with himself alone; encourages him, by explaining that, by the inevitable action of God's laws, every effort onwards makes him stronger for still climbing upwards; that obedience to law will slowly but surely remove the ills that have been inherited through the disobedience of his predecessors and his own."—(Pages 10, 11, and 12.)

PROGRESS, ECONOMY, BUSINESS, MORALITY, MONEY, LIFE.

To be had of the Publishers, SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, and Co., Stationers'-hall-court, London, E.C.

PROGRESS, ECONOMY, BUSINESS, MORALITY, MONEY, LIFE.

To be had of any Bookseller in the Kingdom.

PROGRESS, ECONOMY, BUSINESS, MORALITY, MONEY, LIFE.

To be had at the Railway Bookstalls.

MR. PLATT'S BOOKS are to be had of any Bookseller in the Kingdom.

MR. PLATT'S BOOKS are to be had at SMITH AND SONS' Railway Bookstalls.

MR. PLATT'S BOOKS are to be had at WILLING AND Co.'s Railway Bookstalls.

MR. PLATT, 77, St. Martin's-lane, London, W.C., will send a copy of either BUSINESS, MORALITY, MONEY, LIFE, ECONOMY, or PROGRESS, post free for 1s.; or the six books post free for 6s.

"THE appeal to the masses to touch property requires the greatest care; and statesmen should remember this fact, that, up to the present moment, a want of respect for, or equality in property, has meant the same thing as savagery, and that respect for, and inequality in property, has always co-existed with what we mean by civilisation; it has always, that is, co-existed with every kind of progress. Do not be misled by those good-hearted but bad advisers who tell you 'men are to be considered before wealth;' therefore free trade, machinery, letting 'a limited class have possession of the land,' &c., is a crime against humanity. It is not true. Free trade, machinery, rent left to the value land fetches in the open market, support more and not fewer inhabitants; all inventions, the removal of any restrictions or monopoly, the sacredness of life, the security of property, the inviolability of contracts, the more a nation recognises its duty in fulfilling all its obligations as a sacred duty—these are all conducive to peace and prosperity, all rouse man's highest faculties, urge him upward. It is not the spendthrift, but the thrifty, that helps forward progress; to acquire, to possess, to increase the national capital, is essential for progress in the arts, for progress in the sciences, for progress in the conquest by mind of matter. Every heritage of thought, or beauty, or legal wisdom that has come down to us from the past, has come down from societies built up by inequality, and divided into rich and poor, privileged and unprivileged. There is not one of the great civilisations of the past but tells with a solemn plainness this hard truth. Babylon and Egypt, Athens and Rome, and modern Europe through all its changes, are all unanimous and unequivocal in their witness to the truth of this law of nations, 'inequality,' and that the steady progress of civilisation has depended upon, as it can only subsist by, the sacredness of life and property by every member of the community."—(Pages 57, 58.)

"FROM the earliest period man's courage has been daunted by the perception that, though it might conquer an evil thing, that thing was pretty sure to return. Darkness might vanish before the dawn, but it returned; the storm-cloud cleared away, but it came again; the sickly season might pass, but it came back; the cancer was eradicated only to reappear; the tyrant might be slain, tyranny remained; the struggle seemed hopeless. The doctrine of despair led up to that of 'fate.' The greatest obstacle to 'progress,' in every clime and every age, has been 'superstition,' kept alive by that deadly poison, 'ignorance'—the support of 'dogma and priestcraft,' the cause of 'intolerance,' that plague of the past. Yet mankind marched on, nothing doubting, step after step, without knowing whither: the spirit of humanity keeping alive hope of a better future within them, until, after a long and terrible battle, 'truth' has conquered; liberty, peace, justice, reason, conscience, science, have taken root; and the shoots of the upstart, planted by the hands of dogma and priestcraft in every part of the earth, will soon disappear, when mankind learns 'that nature's laws are eternal, and that her small, still voice, speaking from the inmost heart of us, shall not, under terrible penalties, be disregarded.' Believe, if you like, that Divine love came down to take on itself our sins; in 'life' we find there is no Saviour to do the like for us; we shall individually suffer for our mistakes and weaknesses; and the nation must suffer that, by its politics, 'curbs,' rather than fosters, individual efforts onwards and upwards."—(Pages 182, 183.)

BUSINESS takes up the position that if all men cannot succeed in making a fortune, no one need fail if they understand their business thoroughly, work indefatigably at it, and live thriftily.

MORALITY was written to show that "honesty is the only policy," that there can be no permanent or lasting success for individuals or nations unless they are wise enough to see that "morality," or "doing to others as they would be done by," must be the guiding spirit of their actions.

MONEY was intended to get people to think more of the circulating medium and its action by means of gold, paper money, the value of banks and cheques.

LIFE describes the impression made upon my mind in a busy career amongst all classes of men; and as it has always seemed to me that we suffered enough in this world for our manifold sins and wickedness, my object was to get my readers to try and make the most of this world by learning and reverently obeying the Creator's laws, and dismissing the next world from their minds, feeling assured they might safely leave their future in the hands of their Father in heaven.

PROGRESS has been written to indicate in a brief space the giant strides that have been made in every department of industry, commerce, and science since the last century; but its principal intent is to make men more thoughtful, more observant of what is going on around them.

"PROGRESS is written to show that human history is a record of progress. Progress is God's law, which we may hasten or retard, but cannot stop altogether. Every succeeding age starts with a record of accumulated knowledge in the arts of production; of increased wisdom, that enables each generation to get rid of some of the errors of its predecessors. We have, therefore, a continual advancement from a lower to a higher status of intelligence and wellbeing. We do not mark the progress that is going on; the days and years seem to repeat themselves unalterably. In reviewing the past, it seems at first sight as though there were long periods of stagnation, evils quietly endured for generations, to be suddenly and violently overthrown in sudden amelioration. But, like the 'little worms beneath the surface,' nature is steadily pursuing her work in her own quiet but inscrutable way. The stagnation is only apparent; there is being acquired a silent accumulation of forces, whose gathered power will, in Heaven's own time, and by the inevitable operation of nature's laws, remove the barriers to man's progress. For ages it seemed weary work; man seemed helpless against the 'monarch's and the priest's control;' the brain of man was refused the power of thought, except in the 'orthodox' manner. No sooner was 'thought free,' no sooner were the barriers which prevented progress overthrown, than we see in the nineteenth century a progress rapid beyond all precedent; the stream of human development received into its sluggish currents a mighty impulse for the amelioration of the condition of mankind."—(Page 184.)

"THERE is a religion that can be taught in all schools, adapted for all men—the religion of progress, the religion of nature, the religion of duty, of right, of good, of love—which explains and prepares men's minds for seeing where their duty lies, of distinguishing good from evil, and why it is good or evil. It is useless merely to root up error, leaving one's soul as dry and barren and useless as sea shingle; take away the falsehoods of life, but replace them with truths. It must be right to improve things in the world, to make it better for man and beast, to do all we can to increase happiness, and refrain from doing anything that will diminish it."—(Page 192.)

"THE time has come when mankind must face the question boldly and openly, how the 'Creator governs the world we live in;' does 'progress' depend on the observance of God's law? Is man's religion to be known by his acts, or by his professions of belief? Are we to believe in 'cause and effect,' in 'law'—invariable, inevitable, unerring law; or in destiny, fate, predestination, Divine interposition? I put this question to you plainly, because it seems to me that upon it rests our future."—(Page 200.)

N.B.—Every Tradesman should read the chapter on "Distribution," more especially pages 172 to 178, which explains fully the necessities for the "Parcel Post," and the question of carriage of parcels by Railway Companies.

MR. PLATT will send a copy of either BUSINESS, MORALITY, MONEY, LIFE, ECONOMY, or PROGRESS, POST FREE, for 1s., or the six books post free for 6s.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

WORK OF UNITARIANS IN THE PAST AND THE FUTURE. The Sermon Preached at the Annual Meeting, May 31, in Unity Church, Islington, by the Rev. Dr. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE. Price One Penny. Fifty copies will be sent, carriage free, for 3s.; one hundred for 5s. A large edition having been printed with a view to the widest possible circulation.

SERMONS, by ROBERT COLLYER. Cheap Issue. Price 2s.

POSITIVE ASPECTS OF UNITARIAN THOUGHT AND DOCTRINE. Cheap Edition, 1s.

TEXTS AND MARGINS OF THE REVISED NEW TESTAMENT. By Dr. G. VANCE SMITH, 1s.

A Cheap Edition of this work is now issued, price 3d.

Address, Miss C. PHILPOT, Bookroom, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London.

CHILDREN'S MAID and SEWING MAID Wanted. Must be a good dressmaker and experienced with children. Age not under 24. Good wages.—Apply to Mrs. C. G. Beale, 51, Carpenter-road, Edgbaston, Birmingham.

WANTED, a situation as COMPANION or AMANUENSIS to a Lady. Highest references can be given.—Address, C. C. A., 8, Wellington-place, The Downs, Bowdon, Cheshire.

ASSURANCE AGAINST ACCIDENTS OF ALL KINDS.
ASSURANCE AGAINST RAILWAY ACCIDENTS ALONE
ASSURANCE AGAINST FATAL ACCIDENTS AT SEA.
ASSURANCE OF EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

Railway Passengers' Assurance Company,
THE OLDEST AND LARGEST COMPANY, INSURING
AGAINST ACCIDENTS OF ALL KINDS.
 The Right Hon. LORD KINNAIRD, Chairman.

Subscribed Capital, £1,000,000.

PAID-UP CAPITAL AND RESERVE, £240,000.

MODERATE PREMIUMS

Bonus allowed to Insurers after five years,

£1,700,000

HAS BEEN PAID AS COMPENSATION.

Apply to the Clerks at the Railway Stations, the Local Agents, or

64, CORNHILL,
 or 8, GRAND HOTEL BUILDINGS, CHARING-CROSS,
 LONDON.
WILLIAM J. VIAN, Secretary.

DIXON'S IRON CHAPELS, SCHOOLS, &c.

Are tasteful in Design, Economical, Durable, made of the Best Materials, and erected in the most careful manner. Can be taken down, removed, and re-erected at small cost.

Careful comparison of Specifications, Structural and Architectural details, Materials and Workmanship are invited before placing orders.

IRON CHURCHES, &c., usually on hand or in progress at the Works.

IRON BUILDINGS for all purposes and all Climates. Catalogues, Designs, Estimates, and all information on application.

ISAAC DIXON, Windsor Iron Works, Liverpool.

SEASONABLE DELICACY.

BROWN & POLSON'S CORN FLOUR

As Blanc-Mange, Custard, Baked Pudding, &c.

WITH

STEWED FRUIT

OF ANY KIND.

THE XIXTH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY,
 ADELAIDE-PLACE, LONDON-BRIDGE, E.C.
 SHARES £10, Payable in one Sum or by Periodical Payments.

Directors—Henry Waldemar Lawrence, Mark H. Judge, F. H. A. Hardcastle, Eliza Orme, George Palmer, M.P., Mary E. Richardson, and Henry Rutt.

This Society affords the means of investing money in large or small sums with complete safety at good interest. Interest on Shares 5 per cent. per annum, paid half-yearly. Deposits received at 4 per cent. Withdrawals up to £10 at three days' notice. Prospectus free of FREDERICK LONG, Manager and Secretary.

LONDON.—WEST-CENTRAL TEMPERANCE HOTEL, 97, 99, 101, Southampton-row, Russell-square.—Patronised and highly commended by the Rev. D. S. Govett, M.A., English Chaplain, Gibraltar; Rev. H. M. Holden, M.A., St. Bartholomew's, Bradford, Yorkshire; Rev. Canon French, M.A., Killaloe, Ireland, &c. Central, quiet, exceptionally clean, moderate in charges. Visitors' Drawing Room. Breakfast or Tea, 1s. 3d. Beds from 1s. 6d. Printed Tariff Card on application.

FREDERIC SMITH, Proprietor.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Mrs. HOOD will be pleased to receive a few GIRLS to board and educate. Special arrangements made for delicate girls during the winter months.—Address, care of the Rev. ALFRED HOOD, Bournemouth.

HIGH SCHOOL, STOKE GREEN, NEAR COVENTRY, established (1865) by the Rev. G. HEAVISIDE, B.A., of University and Manchester New Colleges, London, promotes a Liberal Education at a moderate cost.

MOUNT VERNON HIGH SCHOOL, NOTTINGHAM.

Boys carefully prepared for the Universities, Public Schools, or for Business. Vacancies.

SCHOOL RE-OPENS, May 8, 1882.

EDWIN SMITH, M.A., Head Master.

BRENTWOOD, WORSLEY, near MANCHESTER.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal ... MRS. F. SHAWCROSS,

late of Brook House, Knutsford.

The NEXT TERM begins MONDAY, May 8.

For prospectus, apply to the Principal.

"THE FORT, MARGATE."—APARTMENTS in a well-furnished house, facing the sea, on moderate terms.

Address, Mrs. Stabback, Lansdowne Lodge, the Fort Margate.

BRIGHTON.—Apartments, with or without Board, at Miss Wood's, 12, Lower Rock Gardens. Three minutes from Madeira-walk and the Chain Pier.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK.—Current Accounts opened according to the usual practice of other Bankers, and Interest allowed on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £25. No commission charged for keeping Accounts.

The Bank also receives money on Deposit at Three per cent. Interest, repayable on demand.

The Bank undertakes, for its Customers, free of charge, the custody of Deeds, Writings, and other Securities and Valuables; the collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the purchase and sale of Stocks and Shares.

Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued.

A Pamphlet, with full particulars, on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane.

THE BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY'S ANNUAL RECEIPTS EXCEED FOUR MILLIONS.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH, with Immediate Possession, and no Rent to pay. Apply at the Office the BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH, with Immediate Possession, either for Building or Gardening purposes. Apply at the Office of the BIRKBECK FREE HOLD LAND SOCIETY.

A Pamphlet, with full particulars, on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane.

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE,
 UNIVERSITY HALL,
 GORDON-SQUARE, LONDON.

"The College adheres to its original principle of freely imparting Theological knowledge, without insisting on the adoption of particular Theological doctrines."

The ANNUAL EXAMINATION will be held in the Hall, on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, the 19th, 20th, and 21st June, 1882.

The Rev. H. W. CROSSKEY, LL.D., will deliver the ADDRESS to the Students on Wednesday, 21st June, at Half-past Four o'clock p.m.

The ANNUAL MEETING of Trustees will be held in the Library, on Thursday, 22nd June, at Eleven o'clock a.m. SPECIAL BUSINESS will be brought forward for Consideration at this Meeting, and the Trustees will receive due notice of this by Circular.

A VALEDICTORY RELIGIOUS SERVICE will be held at Eight p.m., on Thursday, 22nd June, in Little Portland-street Chapel. The FAREWELL, on behalf of the College, will be given by the Principal, the Rev. JAMES MARTINEAU, D.D., LL.D., and the WELCOME into the Ministry by the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL.

R. D. DARBSHIRE, Esq., B.A.,

26, George-street, Manchester;

Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.,

Gee Cross, Manchester.

} Secs.

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE.

The ANNUAL DINNER of the Past and Present Students of the College will be held on WEDNESDAY, 21st June, at the INNS OF COURT HOTEL, Lincoln's-inn-fields, at 6 p.m. Friends and Ladies may be invited; and those intending to be present are requested to leave their names with the Senior Student, Manchester New College, University Hall, Gordon-square, not later than the 20th inst.

BLACKFRIARS MISSION.

Subscriptions towards the CHILDRENS' TRIP gladly received by Miss PHILPOT, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, and by the Minister, the Rev. Geo. WOOLLES, 21, Great Charlotte-street, Blackfriars-road, S.E.

JONES'S FUND.—Applications for GRANTS from this Fund must be sent in IMMEDIATELY to the undersigned, from whom forms of application may be procured.

EDWIN W. MARSHALL, Secretary.

38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

THE COMMITTEE of the UNITARIAN CHURCH, Sunderland, thankfully acknowledge the following contributions towards the improvements which have recently been effected in their Chapel:—

	£	s.	d.
Samuel Sharpe (the late), London	...	10	0 0
James Hopgood, London	...	10	0 0
Mrs. Bateman, London	...	2	0 0
Joseph Lupton, Leeds	...	2	2 0
Arthur Lupton, Leeds	...	2	2 0
Joshua Buckton, Leeds	...	3	0 0
Birmingham Fellowship Fund	...	5	0 0
Nottingham Fellowship Fund	...	5	0 0
Frederick Parker, Birmingham	...	1	0 0
W. J. Watson, Stockton	...	1	0 0
E. E. Clephan, Stockton	...	1	1 0
T. R. Clephan, Stockton	...	1	1 0
F. Brown, Stockton...	...	1	1 0
A. Elliott, Stockton...	...	1	1 0
C. W. El iott, Stockton	...	1	1 0
A Friend, Stockton...	...	1	1 0
A Friend, Stockton...	...	1	1 0
W. Hands, Scarborough	...	0	10 0
Miss Emily Sharpe, London	...	10	0 0
British and Foreign Unitarian Association	...	10	0 0
James Watson, Newcastle	...	1	3 0
Mrs. Clarke, Newcastle	...	2	2 0

W. ELLIOTT, Minister.

T. JOHNSTON, Treasurer.

THE ANNUAL MEETING of the MISSIONARY CONFERENCE will be held in the Memorial Hall, Albert-square, Manchester, on Thursday and Friday, the 29th and 30th inst., to commence each morning at 11 o'clock.

Rev. JOSEPH FREESTON, President.
 Rev. NOAH GREEN, Secretary.

WEST-RIDING UNITARIAN MISSION SOCIETY.

The SIXTY-SEVENTH ANNUAL MEETING of the above Mission will be held at YORK, on WEDNESDAY NEXT, June 21, 1882. Service will be held at St. Saviour-gate Chapel, at 12.30 p.m. Preacher: the Rev. T. W. FAREKELTON, of London. To be followed by a Luncheon, in the Kenrick Hall, Spen-lane, at 1.45 p.m. Tickets 2s. 6d. each.

Afterwards the Annual Meeting will be held, commencing at 3 o'clock p.m., under the Presidency of J. S. MATHERS, Esq., of Leeds.

WILLM. BLAZEY, B.A., Secretary.

Printed by WOODFALL and KINDER, of Milford-lane, Strand W.C.; and Published for the Proprietors by WAITER MAWER, at the Offices of the SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London, W.C.—Saturday, June 17, 1882

The Inquirer.

A Religious, Political, & Literary Newspaper, & Record of Reberent Free Thought.

[REGISTERED AT THE GENERAL POST-OFFICE AS A NEWSPAPER.]

No. 2087.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 24, 1882.

[PRICE 5D.]

CONTENTS.

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:—

Transfer of Un iversity Hall to Manchester
New College	405
Getting up a Crisis	405
Unitarianism and Orthodox Sentiment	406
Our Manchester Letter	407
George Macdonald in the Pulpit	409
The Student and the Minister	409

OCCASIONAL NOTES 412

REVIEWS:—

Old Faiths in New Light	413
The Design Argument Vindicated	414
Literary Notes	414

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE:—

Manchester New College	415
University Hall	415
British and Foreign Unitarian Association	416
Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and
Cheshire	416
Western Unitarian and Free Christian Union	417
Holbeck, near Leeds	418

CORRESPONDENCE:—

The Resurrection of Jesus	419
Convalescent Homes	419

TRANSFER OF UNIVERSITY HALL TO MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE.

ON Thursday two meetings were held at the Hall, which passed off very quietly, but the results of which may be very important. In the morning the Trustees of Manchester New College met to confirm the arrangements which their Committee had made in their name with the Council of University Hall, and to discuss certain changes in the rules of the College which such arrangements render necessary. In the afternoon of the same day the members of University Hall met to confirm certain resolutions which they had passed on Friday, June 2, ratifying the arrangements which the Council had made with the College. The combined result of the two meetings is that University Hall, as a Society, has ceased to exist, that all the property of the Society is transferred to sixteen trustees, eight nominated by the Hall and eight by the College; and the first and chief duty of these sixteen trustees will be to permit Manchester New College to occupy and manage the Hall for as long as ever the College thinks fit, on condition only that the fundamental object of the foundation of the Hall be preserved, and that lay students of University College be permitted to reside therein under the control of the new Principal, so long as all the rooms are not required by our divinity students.

Professor HENRY MORLEY, of University College, has accepted the Principalship for three years at least; and a better appointment could not possibly have been made. His great influence in University College is an earnest of what his influence in the Hall will become, and is also fraught with hope that he may attract University College students in large numbers to the Hall. As the Manchester New College students are to reside in the Hall in future, it will be a great advantage to them not to be shut up by themselves in a Theological Seminary, but to enter into close and friendly relations with lay students of all denominations.

With the view of strengthening the association with University College the Committee propose to expend £100 experimentally for one year upon tuition to be given in the Hall by Professors of University College in their own subjects at stated hours; and it is with the same view that the Committee offer one set of rooms rent free—in case it is vacant—to an Andrew's Scholar of University College. Professor MORLEY is strongly of opinion that the attendance of the Professors at the Hall, and the residence in it of the most distinguished of University College students, will raise the intellectual tone and increase the attractiveness of the Hall.

Residence in the Hall will, in every way, prove far more beneficial to the students of Manchester New College than their present life in scattered and not very commodious lodgings. There is no true college life without collegiate residence; the social ties and the bonds of friendship formed in the common home, between divinity and lay students alike, may be as valuable in after-life as the instruction gained in the class-room. We have again and again been painfully impressed with the enfeebled health and the loss of working power displayed by Manchester New College men both during their college career and for many years after they commenced active pastoral work. No doubt in many cases this is partly, if not principally, due to the sparing manner in which, when students, they allowed themselves to live. From high and self-sacrificing motives they starved themselves to buy books, and they have broken down in consequence. But under the new residential scheme the students will receive board and lodging free. This will remove the chief cause of ill-health, and raise the general physical tone of the students. We wish the scheme every success; we are heartily glad that Manchester New College has thus for a new period taken up its abode in London; and we trust that many parents, whether they design their sons for the ministry or not, will place them under the care of Professor MORLEY at University Hall.

GETTING UP A CRISIS.

READERS of the newspaper placards must by this time have got heartily tired of always seeing one word which is rarely absent from them, and that word is "Crisis." The Eastern Crisis, the Ministerial Crisis, the Irish Crisis, the French Crisis, the Egyptian Crisis, and others in turn make their appearance. To such an extent is its use, and so absurdly inapplicable is the word to what are the real facts of the case, that sensible people have come to distrust it when they see it, and to believe that the crisis, if any, only exists in the imagination of the speculative newspaper manager, or that these continually recurring crises are affairs got up with the view of some ulterior and not altogether innocent object. Certain it is that quiet men may live through one of these crises and be wholly unconscious that they are in the midst of a history-making epoch. Are our readers aware, for instance, that "we are in the very throes of a crisis" at this present time, "with preponderating threatening signs of a rapid extinction?" Would they believe that "we are hardly living as a pronounced Christian denomination;" that we "are maintaining a spectral existence of vanishing faiths and shadowy confidences at which the general Christendom glances askance and shudders;" that as a Christian denomination we are fast dying of inanition and public indifference? And yet this is what "the minister of the venerable Essex-street Chapel," which he somewhat grandiloquently terms "the mother church of Unitarianism," says is the perilous condition of the Unitarian denomination at the present time.

It will probably be remembered that on the death of Dr. BELLOWES the Rev. J. PANTON HAM took occasion to preach a sermon, the greater part of which found its way into the columns of a contemporary, in which he said much the same kind of thing, and strongly advocated a separation between those Unitarians who are prepared to adopt his standard of thought and those who prefer to follow other methods. We have never believed that this party of schism was a very numerous or a very influential one, and whatever doubts we might have had on this subject were completely dispelled by the tone and spirit of the Conference held at Liverpool shortly after Mr. HAM's deliverance had been made public. The criticism to which we subjected Mr. HAM's sermon and the Liverpool Conference itself have inspired him to write and deliver three discourses, which he has now published in pamphlet form, "with an appendix," under the title "The Unitarian Crisis, or the Dilemma of Christian faith and Church Relationship," and which we believe obtained a certain amount of publicity in their free distribution, on the occasion of the recent Conference at Essex-street Chapel. The editor of the Christian World calls it "a grave indictment," and we are not disposed to deny the description, but it is an indictment and nothing more. Naturally one would have supposed that with some very strong statements that are made there would have been some attempt at justifying them, if not in the discourses themselves, at least in the appendix. But this is just what there is not; the indictment stands without a shadow of evidence in support. One of the charges made by Mr. HAM is that "a vacant Agnosticism" has found its way into our denomination, "has its preachers and avowed disciples, and claims the shelter of the Unitarian name as its natural and legitimate home." The same thing is said in different words more than once, and there are three references to the Appendix in connection with this, to which we naturally turn in the expectation of finding some proof. The first relates to a speech of M. JULES SIMON made in the French Senate on the "Primary Instruction Bill," and to an article in the République Française thereon. The second relates to the "perfect consistency," and the "exemplary courage of their convictions," shown by Mr. CONWAY and Mr. VOYSEY in proclaiming "their complete separation from, and their entire independence on, all existing Christian denominations"; and the third refers to what is termed the "impertinent innuendo" made in our previous article, when we supposed that Mr. HAM made personal references to, and implied personal censure on some of his ministerial brethren. It will be seen that none of these at all bears out the statement in the text as to the presence of Agnosticism in the pulpits of our chapels. We admit that this statement has been made before, but it has either been made anonymously or in such vague and general terms as to prevent specific denial.

Again Mr. HAM says:—"Like IAGO, Unitarianism is nothing if not critical. Doubt as a natural consequence has become the atmosphere, denial the prevailing habit, and disintegration the wide-spread effect, in the experience of the Unitarian churches. Unitarian affirmations are moral and philosophical; its theology is characteristically the theology of negation. The suspension of faith has been succeeded by the mockery of faith as irrational, unscientific, senile, and superstitious." But no proof is attempted to be given for these heated assertions. Further, when Mr. HAM talks of "the extensive ruptures everywhere declaring themselves" among us, and asserts that "the crisis of a catastrophe is upon us, and the time for decision and action is come," that "there is a loud call for separation," we look in vain for the evidence of all this, and surely that would not be far to seek, if it were in existence, because there is nothing to prevent separation if any one wants to separate. On the other hand, it is not quite clear what Mr. HAM means by separation, nor what is the "decisive course of action" urged upon us.

The Liverpool Conference has been regarded as a practical answer to the cry for separation uttered by Mr. HAM, and faintly echoed in other quarters. It is instructive to read what he says on this subject. Referring to some remarks that appeared in these columns, as to what course it was anticipated the Conference would take, namely, that it would be a meeting of men "to discuss their duties in the light of a free access to God, and of inspiration direct from Him, apart from any dogmatic basis or merely sectarian activity," Mr. HAM says that anticipation was not fulfilled, and adds that "the Conference was demonstratively Christian, and declaratively Unitarian," that the New Unitarianism, which he identifies with a purely Theistic position, "had only a covert and timid expression," and that as "a designed demonstration" of this position it was "a conspicuous failure." Still the New Unitarianism "is as rampant and rooted as ever in our denominational midst," and "its advocates are too numerous and powerful to submit to these defeats." Yet Mr. HAM tells us that "the theism of our Churches was there in considerable representative strength, for it especially, indeed exclusively

[the italics are ours] had been summoned, but it modestly restrained its utterance after the Christian key-note had been distinctly struck in the celebration of the distinctive Christian rite of the Lord's Supper. . . If the assembly had been polled on the question, whether the Conference should be carried out on the Theistic principle of the programme convening the meeting, or on the specific Christian lines actually adopted, it may be reasonably presumed that the Theistic basis would have been decided on by a considerable majority."

Now, we believe that there is a good deal of truth in this last sentence; but we do not deduce from it quite what Mr. HAM appears to do. Had the Conference been compelled to adopt a test, which while preserving its religious character should yet have been as widely inclusive as possible, that test would no doubt have been a Theistic one pure and simple. There was no need of such a test, and therefore the gathering naturally assumed a Christian tone. That is, we believe, what might have been expected from the Christian Theism which prevails in our churches. Where Christianity in any form is sought to be imposed as a test upon any of our churches, it will be rejected: where no such attempt is made it comes naturally. And the rejection arises, not simply out of a wanton desire for freedom, but because it is felt that to use Christianity as a test is a departure from the spirit of its founder, and that so presented it cannot be a true outcome of the religious spirit. Those who were responsible for calling together the Conference imposed no theological test whatever, and any who felt themselves unable from conscientious considerations to join, either in the Conference or in any of the religious services connected with it, excluded themselves. And with regard to the Communion service, that was a purely voluntary act, unprecedented, so far as extent is concerned, in the history of the denomination. Had it been made a condition of taking part in the proceedings of the Conference, that that service must be attended, we make bold to say that no Conference would have been held. And so long as the profession of faith in Christianity, whether it be called historical or spiritual, or the adoption of some form of ceremony connected with it, is not imposed upon the Free Churches, we believe their character will be essentially Christian. It is the pharisaical assumption that so often accompanies the adoption of the Christian name that repels most of those who are classed as advocates of the New Unitarianism.

Mr. HAM has said that as a Christian denomination we are fast dying of inanition and public indifference. In a passage wherein the confusion of metaphors is as apparent as it is amusing he says:—"And this lamentable state of things has been brought about by what I call a criminal coquetry with the sappers of our Christian foundation, who have coaxed us into a marriage of our Christian liberty with their ultra-rationalistic licentiousness. For years past we have been indulging in a long denominational dalliance with the fascinations of a fastidious and sceptical intellectuality and the meretricious charms of an unbridled liberty." Who the sappers are that have taken the somewhat unusual course of coaxing criminal coquettes into marriages it would be hard to say, and Mr. HAM does not help us to find out. We fear that a desire for fine writing has led him to pick out some sentence from a modern novel,—one of his own perhaps—and adapt it to his theme. There is a Ouidaish look about it which scarcely commends it on the score of taste. As to its being an accurate statement of facts we need say nothing. Our readers are competent to form their opinion without any help from us. Mr. HAM seems to assume that the fate of Cassandra awaits him because he "feels the divine affluat of the old prophetic spirit." His studies of HOMER should remind him of another character in the "Iliad"—

Of all our hosts

The man who acts the least upbraids the most.

We regret that Mr. HAM should return to the attack, which, so far as he is concerned, was utterly unprovoked. As he reminds us, his own personal separation from the Unitarian body has been effected for many years past; why he should now emerge from the solitudes of Essex-street Chapel, where with disinterested fidelity he continues to minister to what remains of a once large congregation, it is difficult to say. No one has called on him to justify his position, and most of us have learned to value at their true worth the attempts he has made of late to work mischief and to manufacture a crisis. We believe that these attempts will prove abortive, and that so far from there being a cry for separation, there never was a time when the spirit of brotherly fellowship and unity was stronger among us.

UNITARIANISM AND ORTHODOX SENTIMENT.

WE return once more to Mr. FORSYTH'S letter, because it is valuable as showing what appear to be the defects of Unitarianism regarded from the point of view of one who belongs to the ranks of Liberal Orthodoxy. Our simple faith is too simple for him; neither his soul nor mind can find satisfaction in it. Unitarian thought, for his needs at least, is "too meagre," and the "refined piety" of Unitarians is "too little of a searching passion or a sweeping power." That is, we presume, it seems to him an inadequate interpretation of the facts of Christianity. It is not essentially wrong, but its great fault is its inadequacy. On this point he has a great deal to say which we need not quote, as our readers have read it for themselves. But this we have to say, it reduces the whole matter to one of individual sentiment and feeling. The interpretation of Christianity, in all ages of the Church, which has been sufficient for some, has not been sufficient for others. These latter have felt the need or fancied they felt the need for something more than what sufficed for the wants of the former. But this does not prove by any means that the system which more fully met their wants was truer than the other. Indeed, it may be just the contrary; the more fully developed system may be the farthest removed from the primitive truth. Its greater fulness and variety may be only additions to and corruptions of the original simple faith. This is the view we take of the popular Christianity. The very doctrines and ideas which Mr. FORSYTH emphasises seem to us corruptions of the true Gospel. How did those corruptions originate? Partly, at least, in the same state of feeling as that which Mr. FORSYTH avows. To the fathers of the third and fourth centuries the primitive Unitarianism of the Apostolic Church seemed meagre, inadequate, insufficient as a representation of the facts and doctrines of Christianity. Accordingly they developed the Apostolic doctrine, they made additions to it, they grafted on it pagan notions, and embellished it with pagan rights and ceremonies. And a complex, rich, full, and varied system, they and their successors in later ages made of the once simple Gospel! No one could say now that it was meagre, or inadequate, or lacking in "dynamic quality." It had mysteries and doctrines and forms enough to satisfy the largest demand for such things. And every one who accepted these novelties might say with Mr. FORSYTH, "I cannot be satisfied with the Unitarian (primitive) idea either of CHRIST or of GOD." They felt the need of more than the Gospel records supplied just as he feels the need of more than Unitarianism supplies. It is the fancied need of a devout imagination, and nothing more.

Mr. FORSYTH says he "cannot understand a revelation which does not rest on Incarnation, and Incarnation apart from that of GOD in CHRIST is to him little more than a religious philosopheme." We cannot agree with him here. We cannot see his difficulty. It seems to us that all that a divine revelation assumes is something kindred in the nature of GOD and man. Unless there be some affinity of nature between the human and the divine—some point of contact—some elements in common, there can be no revelation from one to the other. It would be in vain for GOD to make a revelation of his will if man had no moral and spiritual faculties by which it could be apprehended. But what need there is for GOD himself to become man, in order for such a revelation to be made, we cannot see. As for Incarnation apart from that of GOD in CHRIST we suppose all would admit that if Incarnation be a reality at all, it is so in the case of CHRIST. There is a sense in which the doctrine of the Incarnation can be held by Unitarians. GOD in CHRIST, true, but that is only the highest expression of the truth GOD in man. The divinity in CHRIST is a divinity common to humanity, but especially shared by the purest, noblest souls of every age and land. What Unitarians protest against is the exclusiveness of the popular doctrine—no incarnation but that of GOD in CHRIST. What they reject is the mythology associated with that doctrine, the gross material form in which it has been held by the popular Churches.

Another defect of Unitarianism in the apprehension of Mr. FORSYTH is that "it fails to deal adequately with the problem of sin." Now the term sin as used by the popular churches has been made to cover much that is utterly unreal—much that is nothing more than a fiction of theology. The doctrine of Original Sin, for example, that all mankind sinned in ADAM, and may be justly punished for his transgression—that is a theological fiction. Again, with the sincere Roman Catholic every Protestant is in mortal sin, because he rejects the authority and teaching of the Church. With many Protestants it is a sin to doubt anything contained in the Bible, it is a sin to travel on a Sunday, it is a sin to play a game at cards, it is a sin to visit a theatre, it is a sin to join in a dance or even to witness one. In fact, there is no word which has been associated more with delusive thought, with groundless fears and idle terrors than the word sin. The result has been an exaggerated idea of human sinfulness against which Unitarians have protested as false and mischievous; but moral wrong, actual vice and wickedness Unitarians have not attempted to palliate. We have distinguished between imaginary sin and real sin, and if our writers and preachers have not dwelt so much as others on human sinfulness and the terrors of future punishment it is "because they have tried to win men by appealing to their better nature, their sense of right and duty, their trust, love, and hope. While Orthodoxy has appealed very much to men's fears and conjured up imaginary terrors, Unitarians have preferred to appeal to their inward sense of what is good and true. This has been one characteristic difference between our preaching and writing and that of the Orthodox. With some their method would probably be the most effectual, with others, ours; but we maintain that ours takes the higher ground, and that as civilisation, education and intelligence advanced, as man becomes able to appreciate the higher appeal, ours will meet most the needs of his case.

"I feel," says Mr. FORSYTH, "that there was gained in the Cross of CHRIST a real, universal, and final victory over the principle of sin throughout existence—a victory which is too objective and complete in its nature to be adequately expressed by the mere measure of his influence on human character." Now this is one of those sweeping extravagant assertions which Unitarians are unable to accept; and which seem to them unwarranted by any facts bearing on the case. If in the cross of CHRIST a real, universal, and final victory was gained over the principle of sin throughout existence, how is it that sin has abounded ever since? Where is the evidence that such a complete victory was obtained? Does the history of the Church with its long and terrible record of crime, strife and bloodshed prove it? Does the present state of the world substantiate the extravagant claim? Did the principle of sin become less active, less potent after the death of CHRIST than it was before; did it become less deadly, less destructive? What precise change did it make in this matter? Mr. FORSYTH does not tell us, and until he does, and substantiates it with the evidence which such a stupendous statement requires, we must regard it as another of the many fictions of the popular theology. "I feel," says Mr. FORSYTH. True, what may not a man of devout imagination feel when he allows sentiment to lead him? And this is really an answer to the whole of his letter. It is feeling and sentiment with him throughout. Very real to him no doubt, but no evidence of the actual truth of the doctrines and views he is led by sentiment to adopt. The same objections in principle which he urges against Unitarianism—its insufficiency, inadequacy, meagreness and so forth might be advanced against his own system. The Roman Catholic regards all Protestantism as meagre and insufficient, and if one wants a rich, full, varied and complete system of faith and worship he will find it in Roman Catholicism as he will find it nowhere else. There, too, he will find "the problem of sin" dealt with after a very careful and elaborate fashion. The English Churchman regards all Nonconformist faith and worship as poor, and bald, and meagre. The Ritualist especially looks on it in this light. All these would retort upon Mr. FORSYTH the very charge which he brings against Unitarianism. After all, then, it is a matter of individual preference and feeling; and if the richer and fuller a faith and worship are the better, then the advantage rests with the Roman Catholic at last. In writing this we have no wish to drag Mr. FORSYTH into a controversy, but so much it seemed necessary to say, as his letter has been widely published in Orthodox papers.

At the election on Sunday of six members for the Consistory of the Reformed Church of Paris, the Evangelical party obtained a majority of 820 to 580.

OUR MANCHESTER LETTER.

MANCHESTER, June 19.

Chowbent, where the Provincial Assembly held its meeting this year, is an interesting place in the records of Nonsubscribing Dissent. The old church building is as substantial as sound brick and good workmanship could make; and it is well preserved, not at all showing those signs of age which many edifices built in more smoky places long since it was put up do. It has a time-hallowed graveyard in connection with it, and a large school-room which has only been built a few years. Inside the gallery is of solid oak timber, and the pews below, with the old-fashioned straight backs and rigid seats, told us we were in one of the ancient Presbyterian chapels, where were shaped and trained the minds which did such stout fighting for civil and religious liberty in years gone by. "The communion" and pulpit told the same tale. Of black oak the pulpit is a three-decker, one for the clerk, one for the devotional service, and one, the uppermost, for the preacher. Immediately behind the pulpit is a large tablet, visible to the eyes of the whole congregation, with the following inscription upon it: "This tablet is erected and subscribed to the memory of the Rev. James Woods, by whose active exertions this place of worship was founded. He died Feb. 20, 1759, having served this society as a Christian minister with affection and fidelity for more than sixty years." The person whom this tablet commemorates was a remarkable and noted character in his day. He was usually called "General Woods," because when, in 1745, the Pretender marched into Lancashire, he collected upwards of two hundred young men of his district and made stout fight on behalf of Protestantism, which was threatened with overthrow. He was awarded £100 a year pension by the Government for the part he thus took. Part of this pension he distributed among his followers, and a considerable portion more he devoted to the building which now keeps his memory green in the minds of men. Curious anecdotes are told of him, some of which are preserved in Harwick's "History of the Borough of Preston and its Environs in the County of Lancashire." On page 238 we are told that General Woods was the first Dissenter who was allowed to preach in a gown, and to attach a bell to his place of worship—a very remarkable concession for the time. He is said to have been an excellent "beggar" for public purposes. He was in the habit of going for subscriptions to persons of means after this fashion:—"Well, Thomas, I've set thee down for so much (naming the sum), and if tha thinks it too little tha may give as much as tha will." And what was curious he generally had his way. He rode all through the northern counties, and as far as Scotland, on horseback, collecting subscriptions on behalf of his chapel building, and many are the rich stories told of him and his adventures. He and his father were the ministers of this congregation more than one hundred years between them. The present minister, the Rev. M. C. Frankland, has occupied the same office for nearly thirty years. Evidently the Chowbent people are believers in long pastorates. For the benefit of those who have never heard or seen this venerable man, I may say that if they will procure a photograph of Thomas Carlyle in his later time they will get a pretty good idea of his outward presentation. Mr. Frankland is an able man, and the tones of his voice tell those who listen to him that he speaks from his heart, and the heart being a good one, he does those good to whom he speaks.

The tinkling of the bell "allowed" to the parson-general drew a considerable congregation together in the old chapel as the time for the service approached. The devotional part of the service was conducted by the Rev. Richard Pilcher of Warrington, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. E. S. Howse of Altrincham. It was a sermon by a thinker for thinkers; but solid as was its quality, it had many suggestive thoughts that even a popular audience could appreciate, and had the style of delivery been a little bolder and more free it would have told wonderfully on all present. As it was, many a thought, and perhaps some lines of thought started by it, will flow from our Lancashire and Cheshire pulpits for a few weeks to come, to the edification of various congregations. It was a fine attempt to justify the position of our free churches, Christians among Christians, which so largely influence others in spite of their small numbers. It was suggested to me that our critics are hardly reasonable in their assaults upon us when they point to our small numbers as compared to the vast assemblies of the "orthodox." Pioneers can never be as numerous as a regular army; and it is the work of the few to win positions which they may afterwards occupy. Mr. Howse's justification was a twofold one, the inner one of conscience and conviction, and the outward one of history. If we look back to Christ we are also ever looking forward to new revelations from God through nature and the soul of man; and we need not be anxious as to results; our influence will always be in proportion to our fidelity to our principles.

After an interval for refreshment in the schoolroom close by, the business meeting was held in the chapel. The venerable president, the Rev. William Gaskell, M.A., was as hopeful in his tone in the opening address as ever he had been. Time in vain tries to make a pessimist of him. The youngest member of the assembly could not look forward with a brighter vision, and it did us all good to see him more vigorous in appearance than last year. For the last few years he has sat while giving his address, this year he stood. He spoke with rejoicing of the National Conference held in Liverpool, and referred to the signs of strength and zeal in our free churches present almost everywhere. The speaker touched on many points, and with luminous thought on each. One of the most important, in my estimation, was his appeal to the educated families among us to take part in Sunday-school work. It seems to me that this kind of work would benefit those who did so as much, if not more, than those they taught, as it would tend to develop their sympathy with those of their own flesh and blood, but who have less means at their command, and so raise their spiritual life. This always follows in the case of those who try to do good work on behalf of their fellow-men. But even if Mr. Gaskell's appeal prove successful, and educated ladies and gentlemen flock into our Sunday-school, perhaps even then little good would result unless a more definite teaching was given to the children under their care, said Mr. Gaskell. They were so afraid of indoctrinating them with sectarianism, that they left them without any definite views whatever, and in consequence they were easily drawn away from them by various influences into other religious connections. Yes, and this will become the case more and more as the "orthodox" churches grow more lax in their adherence to the creeds they profess to be bound by. If those churches openly and frankly repudiated those creeds that have bound them in the past, I, for one, should have no objection to this process of drainage from ourselves; nay, I should rejoice not a little over it in fact, for we have no right to separate from the mass of our fellow-men unless at the dictate of conscience. I cannot get rid of a secret liking for the church in which I was brought up, and where so many of my kindred and friends yet remain. But there are far higher considerations than liking to be taken into account, and in spite of the utilitarian, deeper principles than immediate results to be looked to. It is not so much sectarianism that we need to get rid of as uncharitableness and indifference. The appeal to laymen to take a more active part in the work of our churches was a reasonable one; for the church that exercises the deepest influences over its members will, in the long run, be the most successful, and will be the most powerful with the masses outside to win them to spiritual life. The address was a solemn and noble appeal from one who now, after a long life of labour on behalf of a holy cause, stands in the immediate light of eternity, speaking out of the fulness of experience, earnest words that ought to have weight. It is a long time since I felt so touched by an appeal which appeared almost personal to myself.

When the address came to an end the business part of the proceedings began. The Rev. Thomas Carter, of Rochdale, was elected supporter for 1883. Mr. Carter has been doing exceeding good work lately in meeting and answering the objections of Secularists to the faith which cheers and supports himself in the arduous labours of life, and he deserves the compliment paid him for the courage and the resource he has shown. At the invitation of the preacher of the morning it was determined to hold the next meeting in Altrincham. The report of the special committee in relation to legislative measures was then read by the ever genial and humorous secretary, the Rev. Enfield Dowson. It was a most interesting document, and had reference to the marriage laws and the oath question. It asserted that:—

The distinction still maintained between the clergy of the Establishment and of the Dissenting churches in the conduct of marriages was entirely unwarrantable, and it must be attacked perseveringly until it was overthrown. The members of the Assembly, at all events, were right in advocating year by year the placing of the Nonconformist on an equality with the Established ministry in this matter, and the committee were as much convinced as they were last year that the wisest and most expedient course was to procure the desired equality by so reforming the law that the presence of the registrar should be required at any marriage impartially. At one and the same time an existing stigma would be removed from the Dissenting ministry, and a new security would be gained for the strict observance of the marriage law wherever and by whomsoever the religious ceremony might be conducted.

To the writer these positions seem the right ones to maintain until they become law. Several advantages would follow if they were adopted by the Legislature. First, the registration of marriages would devolve into the hands of responsible men, and it would be a step towards that disestablishment which merely awaits the Episcopalian Church. Its clergy would thereby be rendered in one instance less the servants of the State, and more the ministers of their several congregations, and they would, as one of the speakers remarked, be lifted so far up towards a level with their more free and favoured brethren, the clergy of the Dissenting Churches. The other question related to the Parliamentary oath. As it stands at present it seems an ingenious means of making hypocrites, and of enabling bigots to exclude honest men from their rights. To make the oath optional would be to save these bigots from themselves; for where opportunity offers they seem incapable of resisting the temptation of persecuting those who differ from them. It would save men like Mr. Bradlaugh, too, from the unseemly act of swearing by what they are opposed to in principle and policy. Besides, why should Parliament deny that justice to themselves which they accord to the lower courts? So far as our Courts which administer the law goes it is pretty well settled that conscience shall have the decision in the matter of swearing or not swearing, but in the highest of all where law is made an oath must be sworn or there is no admission. If those members who constitute the present House of Commons will not allow justice to be done, it will have to be made one of the test-questions of the next election. And really it is not a question of oath or no oath, even from the swearer's own point of view, but of compelling men who, whatever their point of view obey Christ's behest and "swear not at all," or of becoming disobedient to the moral law in order to obtain any privilege that of right belongs to them. One would think that men who have faith in the solemn presence of God during the taking of an oath would only be too anxious that it should not be desecrated by being taken falsely. Mr. Harry Rawson, whose presence is always the proclamation that the right and sensible thing is going to be done, moved the adoption of a petition to Parliament praying that members may be permitted to make an affirmation instead of being called upon to take the oath. He expressed his cordial approval of the sensible and statesmanlike proposal on this subject about to be made in the House of Lords by the Duke of Argyll, and said that by adopting the memorial the Assembly would once more utter a protest against the interposition of any barrier of a theological kind between a man's rights and the untrammelled exercise of them. Both the report and the petition were unanimously adopted; as was a further petition in relation to the marriage laws, after an amendment extending the time when marriages might be performed. Between the afternoon and evening meetings time was given to the delegates and ministers for refreshment, part of which was spent in the fields breathing the purest of air in the brightest atmosphere. The evening meeting was presided over by Caleb Wright, Esq., a hearty, genial chairman, who seemed to enjoy the meeting as much as the youngest man present. He took the usual high ground that Unitarians generally take, that is, that no one shall suffer disadvantage in any shape for any opinion he may hold, be it what it may, in relation to theology. And for my own part I do not see how men can possibly be free unless it is so. Being a magistrate of some experience his words with regard to legislation and intemperance had special weight. Everywhere those who have the best means of forming a judgment are coming to the same conclusion. For my own part I have great hopes that as education extends and deepens its influence will raise the people above gross appetites. Indeed, if we are to trust the evidence that presents itself to us the heaven is already working, and sincerely do I hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will find that he has over calculated the income from this source in every budget he brings in for the future. I say this not only in the interests of sobriety, but because I believe that a reform in this direction would be the herald of many other reforms.

It is always a pleasure to listen to a Carpenter. The name has a charm for all who have faith in high character and great talent nobly applied. Mr. Russell Carpenter was in his native element when he was recounting the triumphs of reformers for the past fifty years, not for the purpose of persuading to repose, but for stimulating the younger generation of men to exertion. If so much had been gained in unfavourable circumstances what might not be done under better conditions. We are but at the beginning of the greater things yet to be accomplished, and now and then it is well to refresh the will with the noble deeds of the past. As Mr. Carpenter proceeded with his argument, made up of incidents, so quietly that the full force and volume of it required reflection to appreciate, I could not help thinking of a remark that was made to me in a midland town some little time ago. I had been reading the life of the good Dr. Lant Carpenter, and in relation to him and his family I had said what a remarkable family the Carpenters were, showing what a stream of good influences one pious virtuous couple could send down through generations. "O yes! that is true," was the reply, "so much so that you may speak of the Carpenters and the rest of mankind, for they are simply unique."

Mr. Grundy made a useful contribution to the facts and arguments of the evening. Perhaps, if anything, he quoted just a little too much for a speech addressed to a popular gathering. But evidently he was so anxious to do justice to the men he was criticising that he gave their words at such length. He dealt with the relations of the masses of the people to the churches—a subject that was only too tempting to the pen to dwell upon, but recent articles in your columns and space alike forbid my yielding to it.

Mr. Harwood dealt with an important subject. He justly remarked that it was a healthy sign that Unitarians were beginning to extend their efforts beyond their own borders; but he trusted that the new-born zeal would not lead to a neglect of those who were born among them. He asked where were the descendants of many of those who had been representing families among us in the past. They were lost to us, and a constant drain was going on into the State Church. Well, perhaps that is true to some extent, but we only share in this with the rest of the dissenting world. And I should like to ask whether it ever was otherwise since—well, say since 1662? But in spite of it we grow relatively stronger, the Episcopal Church relatively weaker. Other causes were given, but one of the most powerful, at least in these later days, was overlooked. Mr. Carpenter truly remarked that when he was young the cry of Unitarians along with other Protestants was the Bible, and the Bible alone is the religion of Unitarians. But religious free thought has made advance since then, and the revelation of God is looked for in the heavens above, on the earth beneath, in the history of our own country and others, and the mind of man. Yes, and if the saint is the reflection of His holiness, the scientist reveals His thought. The Bible now shares with a multitude of other channels in giving light from the Father of Lights to the mind, heart, and conscience of men, and in some things has to yield up its superiority to them. In the meantime the Orthodox still retain their old creeds, in some instances like heir looms consigned to the lumber chamber, not to be parted with, and not to be used; among some of their preachers the emphasis of doctrine has entirely changed, while in some others they have dropped out of their discourses altogether. Consequently those who would have been at home with us a generation ago find a more congenial one among the Episcopalians, with whom they mingle in social life every day. An advancing body is sure to leave some of its laggard members behind it, but they are caught up by other bodies who are following more slowly behind. The mind edged with eagerness for truth, the conscience cannot yield anything to outward influences, the thought that is free as God intended it should be, still is with us, and stands wondering why it is that so many good and amiable people desert the side of freedom and progress. But such incidents are inevitable in a world like ours; we must be content to slowly win the world by gradually leavening it with the better principles we believe that we hold for its good. But I must stay my pen; Mr. Harwood's suggestive speech set my thoughts at work, and thoughts and facts press thick and fast upon my mind. He closed with an earnest appeal to those present to look after their children, and see to it that their children were trained in right principles, so that they would not be likely to desert them when they grew up.

And so ended another interesting meeting of the Provincial Assembly. W. M.

GEORGE MACDONALD IN THE PULPIT.

On Sunday morning last a very large congregation assembled in Brixton Independent Church (the Rev. Baldwin Brown's) to hear a discourse by Dr. George Macdonald, the well known novelist, poet, critic, and lecturer. Dr. Macdonald is an unprofessional preacher, declining, it is understood, to accept payment or to allow collections. He is, perhaps by virtue of his poetic nature, an enthusiast in religion, and in the pulpit he has the appearance and manner of a rapt seer and saint, seeming to forget himself in the absorbing interest of his work. His one aim in life is to be a true disciple of Jesus and to lead others to the same discipleship. More than any other men who is still admitted into orthodox circles and pulpits, he has contributed to the spread of a nobler and purer religion amongst Evangelicals, having devoted himself in his earlier days to the destruction of Calvinism and its attendant doctrines, teaching Universalism without reserve; at the same time he is a mystic to whom the higher spiritualism is a constant source of joy.

In his general teaching, his rejection of eternal punishment and all its connected doctrines, he approaches very nearly the ordinary tone of devout Theists, but he distinguishes himself from them by the most enthusiastic worship of Christ. The Deity of Christ is to him the great centre of faith and source of consolation, as he summed it up in his prayer on Sunday morning. "If that Man were thy son then all is well!" He uses the word son in the orthodox sense, and in a subsequent prayer addressed all his invocations to Christ. This attitude of mind was further illustrated by the selection of Conder's hymn—

"Worthy, O Lamb of God art Thou
That every knee to Thee should bow!"

The authority for which is given in the quotation from Philippians ii. 10, "That . . . every knee should bow." The Revised Version, however, has abolished the sanction of this text by returning to the Greek and rendering it "in the name of Jesus," instead of "at the name."

Dr. Macdonald showed some independence in reading the lessons, taking the first from the "Wisdom of Solomon," and it was rather amusing to see the earnestness with which the congregation searched their Bibles for this little known book—we need hardly say that in the majority of cases they searched in vain. The second lesson he read from St. John, chapter 5, and startled his audience at the end of the third verse by announcing that he did not believe the next verse at all; but considering its authenticity has long been rejected by critics, and that it is left out of the text in the Revised Version, this did not show any very great boldness; it was more characteristic of the preacher that he remarked, if the benefit were to be conferred upon the man who most successfully struggled to reach the pool first it would be setting a premium upon selfishness. His objection to it therefore was not so much critical as moral.

The sermon was on Hebrews xi. 1, which Dr. Macdonald at once avowed he could make no sense of in the authorised translation. He proceeded to give a good interpretation of it, showing that faith was the foundation of hope, that every hope had some faith at the bottom of it, that hope was a blossom, the root of which was faith; by the second part of the verse he understood that faith was the proving or trying of unseen things, relying upon them and putting them to the test. He went on to say that there had been a great deal of nonsense talked about faith, that it had been represented as antithetical to works, and Paul and James were put in opposition, Paul going too far, and James not far enough. As a matter of fact they were identical, faith itself being the greatest work of which man was capable, being nothing less than turning the whole nature, mind, heart and soul toward God, and in its essence it was obedience and trust. It was worse to believe there is a God and disobey or mistrust Him than to doubt if there were a God at all. He then referred to Atheism, and pointed out that though a man denied the existence of God, he could not prove that he himself was not immortal, and as he was born into this world without his own knowledge or consent, so he might awake to consciousness hereafter in another world, and what a dreadful possibility it was that a man might be doomed to immortality in a universe without a God. These points he urged at length, and with much earnestness, though with no striking eloquence or style; for, poet and author as Dr. Macdonald is, in the pulpit he thinks more of persuading his audience than of arranging his thoughts or adorning his discourse.

In spite of the desponding tone of the recent controversy, such a service as that at Brixton seemed to prove that preaching is still a powerful and popular institution, and that crowds will gather to listen to a man who can win them by his sincerity and charm them with his enthusiasm. At the same time, if George Macdonald were not so distinguished in other spheres, it is possible he might have to preach to smaller congregations.

W. L.

THE STUDENT AND THE MINISTER.

[The following address was delivered at University Hall on Wednesday afternoon by the Rev. H. W. Crosskey, LL.D., Visitor of Manchester New College.]

I have the honour to be charged this afternoon with the duty of addressing words of counsel to students for the Christian ministry on the close of another session of collegiate work.

Those who assemble here for the last time as students, and are about to enter upon the practical duties of their chosen calling, will hear to-morrow evening words of farewell on behalf of the college from the lips of the Principal, Dr. Martineau, to whom we all turn with a reverence that is only equalled by our love, and with a love that never slumbers, because it is compelled to keep pace with an ever deepening reverence—and will be welcomed into their new comradeship by one able to speak with the authority given by the confidence of his brethren; and than whom they will find no more trustworthy friend in the ranks they are joining.

The special task devolving upon me is to speak to those among you who have not yet completed the full term of their appointed years of studious discipline.

In one respect it is possible that I may be regarded as remarkably unfitted for the discharge of this duty. I have an almost boundless patience for the faults of young men. I believe that those young men who are most likely to do good service in the world will not always be found among the most prudent of all possible young men; will not necessarily on every occasion measure their speech with the strictest caution and state their opinions in the most acceptable way; and are not exclusively to be numbered among those pliant conformists to the habits and customs of society who win the most thoroughly respectable reputations.

I was once told by a distinguished naval officer who had command of a gunboat in the Baltic during the Russian War that the admiral summoned him and other young men to his flagship and addressed them to the following effect:—"Now, young men, you will be wanting to run your boats close to those fortifications, and get into danger and distinguish yourselves; if you do, I will cashier every one of you."

Whether or not a naval necessity existed for so prudential a warning it is not for me to decide; but I feel utterly unable to address you in a kindred spirit as I meet you to-day in your voyage among the rocks and shoals and opposing batteries of temptations established in the narrow sea of your college career. I freely admit that the heroic imprudences of young men often prove stepping-stones to mighty achievements. The soul, "by one enthusiast feeling unredeemed," may be betrayed into no mistakes, but it will win no victories.

In making this frank confession without doubt I have an object to serve—an object which it will be better at once to own, since it is too patent to be concealed.

The door of the heart is closed, and the latch pressed down in resistance to the best advice given by a hard, dry, calculating moralist,

One to whose smooth-rubbed soul can cling,
Nor form, nor feeling, great or small;
A reasoning, self-sufficing thing,
An intellectuall All-in-all.

But may I not hope that some heed may be paid to words spoken by an old student, who retains the intensest sympathy with a young student's hopes and prayers; who is emphatically in every fibre of his being, a believer in the fresh young life of the world; yet who stands on the vantage ground of a practical knowledge, given by long experience of the besetting dangers and difficulties of the Ministry which you are preparing yourselves to exercise?

One who is fighting the battle in which you will soon mingle may possibly give some hints, not altogether without value, as to the armour best fitted to protect you against the fiery darts of its fury, and the sword which may prove the most serviceable weapon in cleaving a way through the principalities and powers which will be arrayed against you.

The relation between your present work as students, and your future calling as Christian Ministers, is the subject upon which I wish to speak.

At the very outset, the gravest of difficulties presents itself.

The Christian Ministry is the last of all professions in which scholarship, as scholarship, can reveal the secret of power. You may possess all the learning of the schools; you may honourably distinguish yourselves by taking high degrees; and yet prove unable to awaken a sense of guilt within the sinful, to renew the life of wandering and desolate souls with a Christlike spirit, to give comfort to the broken hearted. Out of the fountains of faith and hope and love alone can living waters flow for the refreshment and redemption of our race. In the great emergencies of your career, mechanical rules of conduct will avail little. You will have to traverse paths along which no mortal man can guide.

If you have any business here at all as students for the Christian ministry, you know what it is to be moved by a spirit, a power, a presence, you cannot resist; and to hear a strange and awful voice, speaking in the innermost chamber of your own sacred manhood, and calling you to the work of the Lord of righteousness.

Upon that Power must be placed your lifelong reliance, and to that voice must be yielded the life-long direction of your toil.

But this, the most solemn of human experiences, may become the source of the most dangerous of temptations.

You may be tempted to feel, if not to think—and our gravest dangers arise from feelings that do not crystallise themselves into definite changes of thought—that severe scholastic studies have no very practical bearing at all upon your future calling.

The curriculum of the college may appear to stand in somewhat violent contrast with apostolic community. Paul directs those who would be strong in the Lord to wear the breastplate of righteousness; to have their feet shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace; to take the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the spirit. The authorities of the college bid you take your degree and concern yourselves with history and criticism; with the Greek and Latin Fathers; with mental, ethical and religious philosophy.

What virtue is there (it may be asked) in history and criticism when hot blood courses through the veins, and the poor victim must know the Gospel of the grace of God, or he is lost? What light do Greek and Latin fathers throw upon the misery, the pauperism, the crime of the nineteenth century? What avails philosophy in dealing with the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life?

I am here to-day, however, to say, speaking from a not inconsiderable experience, that the more intense your conviction that the end and aim of Christianity is to establish the Kingdom of God upon earth, and the more earnest your resolve to devote yourselves to that divine task, the stronger should be your desire for as thoroughly complete an education as you have talent and opportunity to compass.

The meaning of the scheme of studies through which you have to pass is not merely that it imparts knowledge, but that it trains the man.

A technical education fails even in securing a technical purpose. Unless a curriculum of study embrace subjects not likely to be of practical use in the student's future career, it will not succeed in preparing for that career itself. The making of machinery is one thing; the fashioning of capable man is another. "I call therefore (Milton nobly writes) a complete and generous education that which fits a man to perform justly, skilfully and magnaanimously all the offices both private and public of peace and war."

Believe me, the world's work is very serious, and strong men are needed to undertake it.

Moreover, you will find one strange peculiarity in the profession you are adopting—it will offer some opportunity of using almost every fragment of human knowledge.

One of the great intellectual surprises of my life has been the discovery of the usefulness of apparently useless studies. I have never done an honest piece of work on any subject, however far away from my pressing and immediate duties, that has not ultimately proved of advantage to me.

After all, however—it may be pleaded—we have not to become scholars so much as practical men capable of dealing with the world, its interests and its people.

Let me give on this point my emphatic testimony to the absolute necessity of habits of abstract study to meet the practical requirements of the busiest ministerial life.

Professionally I suppose I am as closely engaged as any doctor or lawyer with an average amount of practise. In my day, I have had as much to do with the affairs of men as any ordinary member of society.

I have found abstract study an absolute necessity of life; and, indeed, I have been a harder student since I left college than at college itself.

It is not merely that no preacher can keep producing sermons and lectures without supplying the waste—any more than water can for ever be poured out of a jug without replenishing it—but that the quietness, and peace, and strength given by study are essential for a busy man if he would keep his head clear, and fresh, and healthful for his daily work.

There is another and a deeper reason.

Not only is it true that there is no inevitable antagonism between scholastic culture and religious fervour, but it is equally true that the more spiritual our Christian faith the greater the need for the strictest training of college life, that we may become its fitting ministers.

What is our position as ministers of him who said, "It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing; the words that I speak unto you they are spirit and they are life"?

We have no stock-in-trade of external articles of faith to keep in our Church as in a shop, and dispense through the community.

We appeal very humbly, very reverently, but very directly to the God who made us, and beseech him to pour out His spirit upon us.

As the light falls from the pure ether of His presence upon the dense medium of our minds, it is certain that through our ignorance it will be bent and broken from its direct course; but how necessary is it that we should solemnly prepare ourselves by the completest culture to distort His light as little as it may prove possible for mortal man to do!

Gazing upwards in the search for His truth, how needful is it to be on our guard lest

We do as little children do

Who lean their faces on the window pane

To sigh the glass dim with their own breath stain,

And shut the sky and landscape from the view.

Had we only a statute book to interpret, we might be satisfied with a less amount of scholarship, grammar and dictionary might do our work. Appealing as we do to the Eternal Spirit to visit our souls, the completest possible culture is the only fitting preparation for His presence.

The spiritual Christianity which at first sight seems best able to dispense with the education of the scholar, thus, in sober truth, marks its absence with the greater shame.

It ill becomes those who seek the inspiration of the living God to hang up a harp with broken strings to be swept by the wind of His power.

Turning from these general considerations, the question arises, what special studies are likely to prove of the largest value to a Christian minister labouring among the Free Churches of England?

The critical study of the Bible appears to me to have a supreme importance for the teacher of spiritual Christianity, and yet it is a study which he is not unnaturally disposed to undervalue.

So long as the Bible was received as an infallible text book of ethics and faith, accurate knowledge of the construction of each sentence, and the import of every phrase was a matter of life and death. Heaven and hell hung in the very balance of critical inquiry. A grammatical blunder might plunge the erring soul into the depths of perdition.

The period of attack upon the theory of Biblical infallibility has been an exciting one. There was the charm of intellectual daring in searching the Bible through and through, while the thunder of theologic wrath was rolling in the sky, and angry lightning was flashing through the darkness of popular superstition.

Hot debates touching signs of human passion in the supposed needs of the great Jehovah; myths and legends inserted among narratives, hitherto most surely believed, and colourings and discolourings of historic fact attributable to the brush of priestly prejudice, flung upon familiar pages the fierce interests of a battle field.

For us, at any rate, the raging conflict has now ceased; the principle of Scriptural interpretation is decided, and our controversies affect details of its application alone. More than this, in quietness of thought many of us have come to see that the mere act of denying the truth of an ancient narrative does not necessarily involve a richer, riper, purer Christian spirit than the mere act of accepting it. The critical and exegetical study of the books of the Old and New Testament is not equivalent to the breathing of a prayer from the depths of our sin to a Lord enthroned in righteousness.

Historical questions must be decided on historical evidence, but a series of historical essays cannot touch the heart either of a sinner in his sin or a saint in his sanctity.

The mere knowledge as to whether the histories of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah be or be not correctly recorded, or whether water were or were not turned into wine at the marriage feast in Cana of Galilee, can neither strengthen nor weaken the soul in its struggles against temptation and its love for the holiness of Christ.

It does not follow, however, that a minister "of the New Testament, not of the letter but of the spirit," can afford to dispense with critical investigations.

On the contrary, the spirit of the Bible will become intelligible as the actual development of the religious history it chronicles is accurately studied. The Bible will help us to give a divine interpretation to the history of England in so far as we understand the special condition under which its books were written. We cannot separate transient Judaic methods of thought and action from the everlasting laws of God, save as we carefully follow the actual course of Jewish history.

To wield the power of the prophets effectually against modern iniquities we must know why, and how, in their day and generation kings and priests trembled before their words.

The relationship of Jesus Christ to the political and sectarian parties and the social circumstances of his age will give the key to the life which he might be expected to lead in London at this hour.

A teacher of spiritual Christianity is in constant danger of becoming far too abstract in his methods of thought. His besetting temptation is to weave subtle theories in the dim depths of his own self-consciousness, and to deal with men and women as though they were always ready to be influenced by the most rational arguments that he can present for their consideration.

In the actual world in which we live a fathomless ocean of human passion rolls from pole to pole, and when tempestuous winds blow, all our logical syllogisms, sermonisings, appeals to reason, preachments of moral precepts, are tossed like broken timbers of wrecked ships upon the disturbed waves.

The Bible is the book that tells the secrets of our passion-tossed humanity. Sinners read of a sweet singer of Israel whose heart was stained with their guilt. Sceptics read of a king wise above every other in Jerusalem, who shared their doubt and despair. The tried and tempted read of one who would fain have cursed God and died. The timid and fearful read of a disciple who, with cursing and swearing, denied his master.

All the weakness, the strife, the horror, the cruelty, and the agony of human life are there; and above all stands the cross, the witness of triumphant victory.

Although rational investigation be pushed to the uttermost, it remains the first duty of a religious teacher to understand the Bible; and the surgeon might as well plead that he need pay no attention to anatomy because his duty is to restore life; as a minister, that he need not concern himself with Biblical criticism because he would fain preach the gospel of the spirit.

In your future career it seems to me increasingly certain that you will have to deal with a nation in which science will occupy a throne of supreme authority and in which truth will be sought through scientific methods. The study of science I would therefore strenuously urge upon you as of the largest practical importance for your proper ministerial preparation.

The recognition of science which now characterises so large a class of our most cultivated Englishmen will, I believe, most certainly spread rapidly through the great mass of our population. I have reason for holding this belief. Where scientific demonstrations have already been introduced into public elementary schools their effect has been marvellous. I have had the opportunity of closely watching the results of thorough scientific instruction, systematically given in some elementary schools situated in the poorest districts of a large town. It has been received by even the roughest children as a revelation; and has without a doubt opened to them a new world of unexpected delight. Moreover, it has been proved by the experience already gained that a remarkable scientific faculty exists among the working classes of society. Lads, living in daily contact with hard physical realities, prove themselves peculiarly capable of receiving physical ideas.

As an evidence of this let me quote from a report lately made to the Birmingham School Board by Professor Poynting upon the results of an examination in science of scholars attending public elementary schools:—"Hardly any of the questions in my paper could be answered without independent thought on the part of the candidates; and I had very few answers showing a want of such thought. The boys showed that they had seen and understood the experiments which they described, that they had been taught to reason for themselves upon them, and they were not merely using forms of words which they had learnt without attaching physical ideas to them."

You will not be long in the Ministry, gentlemen, without hearing much discussion on the duties of our churches in relation to the masses of the people; let me remind you that lads such as these will grow into the men whom you will have to address. The season in which Christian Ministers were called upon to administer milk to babes—if it ever existed—is hopelessly gone. If you are to sustain faith in God among the great mass of our people you will have to meet them upon their own intellectual grounds and to follow the paths along which their own native genius guides their thoughts.

If the day of faith is again to dawn—again, as of old, the chariot of its sun must break through the golden portals of the mystic sky. Again as of old must the strange sequence of the changeful seasons, the growth of the seed and the ripening of the harvest, the welling of fountains, the flow of rivers and the rolling of seas, the rushing of the wind, the coming and going of the stars in their courses be recognised as witnesses of the life beyond all life.

We must come back to Nature—from whose bosom our forefathers drew the sweet sustenance of their infant hopes touching things eternal; and in our manhood humbly ask whether her gracious hand will not again lead her children to the solemn temple hidden in the deep woods of her benignant peace; and whether her voice will not again whisper into listening ears the secrets of the Kingdom of God.

The glory of the heaven and the earth may yet avail to win from the proud and scornful and rebellious heart the cry of Job when the Lord had answered him out of the whirlwind. "I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth thee; wherefore I abhor myself and repent in dust and ashes."

Souls outwearied with theological debates may yet yield to the charm of those lilies of the field which Christ so tenderly loved.

Doubts and despairs which defy the logic of the schools may yet vanish before simple confidence in the order of a universe in which not a sparrow falleth to the ground unheeded and unwatched.

In a hard-working world, developing to the utmost the mechanical agencies by which its comforts and luxuries can be increased, science may awaken that sense of the Infinite, that solemn awe, that conviction of the unutterable majesty of all created things which will constitute the very soil in which Christian faith can take root and grow. If we would convince men that no measurable physical force can explain the endurance of martyrs, that no chemical combination is an equivalent of the action of the will, that no variations among species occupying the same plane of being and acting for and by themselves, can bring into existence a living soul dowered with a sense of duty, a capacity for boundless love, and an immortal hope, we must know the range and limits of scientific methods.

Those who attempt to defend faith against science, without having themselves received any training in the methods of scientific research, will easily be smitten to the ground by the rudest flint implement of an argument wielded by the more skilful hands of men accustomed to deal with physical ideas and physical realities.

The history of the religious life of England, and especially the history of that group of Free Churches which this college represents, ought, I think, to receive the especial attention of students for our ministry.

To treat the various sects that divide among themselves the power of England merely as assemblies of men attached to certain doctrines is to misread their meaning, to underrate their influence, and to ignore their piety.

Every English sect represents some element of a divine life which has charmed English hearts and swayed English history.

Each Church existing amongst us as the product of our national history has a Holy of Holies, and whoever has not passed through the outer court and penetrated behind its veil has not seen the secret of its life. Earnest and devout men are not members of the Church of England, Baptists, Independents, Wesleyans, simply because they are logically convinced of the truth of certain systems of theology severally covered by the names they bear, but because of the type of character they esteem as the most

Christ-like; the dreams and visions they cherish of a kingdom of God upon earth; the special temptations besetting them the most keenly; the channels through which they practically feel that tidings of the divine mercy are most quickly and most abundantly poured within their longing and thirsty souls.

If we address the various sects by which we are surrounded as though they were the mushroom growth of a night, merely representing the crop of theological opinions which has sprung up in our own day and generation, we might as well preach to the plants in our gardens so far as any chance of touching the heart of the religious life of England is concerned.

You, gentlemen, have the ideal of a Christian Church, handed down to you from faithful forefathers, and committed to your guardian care. The Church of Christ you will have in charge that the fire upon its altar may be kept burning, is the Church in which a life akin in spirit to that led by the great Master is esteemed the one thing needful in which Reason and Conscience are trusted as the gifts of God to reveal his Righteousness and his Truth, and in which the chiefest sacraments are human services.

You will not be sent forth as dogmatists to enforce a confession of faith, but as quickeners of the spirit to awaken penitence, aspiration, hope, and love.

It is not that you will be charged with the duty of holding no opinions whatever; and professing no particular convictions. God forbid!

Mere vagueness of thought is no virtue. Let each student among you learn to think clearly, and to speak as clearly as he thinks.

Should it so happen that the world christens your individual opinions Unitarian, so be it; let them bear the name by which they are best understood.

Be afraid of no heresy. Stand, if need be, on the loneliest heights of unfriended thoughts.

"There is no danger now of knowing aught Which ought not to be known."

but learn to value infinitely more highly than either heresy or orthodoxy those sanctities of the kingdom of God which are the common profession of all his beloved.

Because, indeed, of the very spirituality of the work required of you, the greater is the necessity that you should be wise with the wisdom of the great company of his saints gathered from the north and the south, and the east and the west; and know well the myriad links that bind the minds and hearts of living men to the dwellers in the unseen land.

Your words will be increased twofold in power if you do not speak as solitary pilgrims journeying through a country of which you barely understand the language, and have neither taken the trouble to trace the history nor grasp the genius, but as men moving among brethren, brought up in the same household, using the one mother tongue, and accompanied by a cloud of witnesses who can testify what the Lord has done in times past for the souls of those who have pleaded against the demands of hierarchies for the rights of reason and of conscience; and have fearlessly trusted their destiny alike in time and in eternity to the tenderness of His mercy and the largeness of His love.

Gentlemen, do not underrate during this period of preparation for active duty the strength of the moral and spiritual forces against which you will have to contend. The work before you will stak your uttermost energies, your profoundest patience, your most glowing enthusiasm.

Many a time in the stress of inevitable struggles you will look back with a sigh upon these quiet college days, and wish that you had more carefully buckled on your armour and more surely tempered your weapons.

In the fervour and gladness of young self-consecration, I know well how readily it is believed that the truth has but to be spoken for all the world to listen; that the blast of God's message has but to be sounded for the towers of superstition to fall in ruins at our feet. I, for one, however, do not believe that all England is thirsting for our simple Christianity. I see on every hand the rallying of hosts we have fondly deemed long ago put to flight. I hear on every side the tramp of armed men, ready to renew the contest we have vainly fancied almost ended, on behalf of ancient ceremonies and creeds.

It is quite as likely as not—to my mind more likely than otherwise—that the vast crowds of our people who are notoriously indifferent to religion, in their first awakening will seize strong hold of fantastic and extravagant forms of superstition.

The easiest part of your work, however, will be this conflict with theological dogmas, troublesome and full of anxiety as it may prove. Your higher and more difficult task will be the reverent cherishing of a type of Christian holiness within the Church, of rational thought as beautiful, as pure, as lovable, and as self-devoted as that which has for centuries been clothed with other intellectual raiments than those which you can honestly employ.

Your fitting preparation for this task does not rest with your professors and advisers. It depends upon the faithfulness with which you keep your hearts "unspotted from the world," the prayerfulness with which you carry on your severest scholastic studies, and the reverence with which you daily seek the protecting and guiding spirit of your God.

SWEDENBORG SOCIETY.—The seventy-second annual meeting of the society was held at 36, Bloomsbury-street, London, W.C., on Tuesday, June 20. The chair was taken at seven o'clock by Dr. J. J. G. Wilkinson. The report of the committee stated that of the English translations of Swedenborg's theological works, 2,389 volumes had been sold and 926 volumes presented. The works had been widely advertised during the year, especially by the distribution of 20,000 annotated catalogues which had been sent to ministers of the various denominations, completing the distribution begun last year, when 10,000 were posted. An anonymous friend had enabled the committee to carry out this far-reaching operation by placing £200 at their disposal. During the evening the Rev. Dr. Bayley, who has lately returned from the East, gave an interesting address on the religious condition of the countries he has visited.

DARWIN'S WILL.—The will (dated September 27, 1881) of Mr. Charles Robert Darwin, late of Down, near Beckenham, who died on April 19 last, was proved on the 6th inst. by William Erasmus Darwin and George Howard Darwin, the sons, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £146,000. The testator leaves to his son William Erasmus the family portraits and papers, all medals, the silver candlesticks presented to him by the Royal Society, his manuscript of the voyage of the Beagle, and his manuscript autobiography; to his son Francis his scientific library; to his wife, Mrs. Emma Darwin, £500, all his furniture, plate, books, effects, horses and carriages, and his residence at Down for life; and to his friends Sir Joseph Dalton Hooker and Thomas Henry Huxley £1,000 each, free of legacy duty. The residue of his real and personal estate is to be held upon trust for his wife for life, and at her death as to twelve seventy-fourth parts for each of his five sons, and as to seven seventy-fourth parts for each of his two daughters; certain advances made to his children are to be brought into account on the division.

The late Mr. Asa Lees, of the Solih Iron Works, Oldham, has left bequests to public institutions amounting to more than £40,000. These include £10,000 each to Owens College, Manchester, to the Royal Albert Asylum, to the Independent College; and to the Oldham Infirmary. Mr. Lees was founder of the great machine establishment of Asa Lees and Co., employing about 2,000 hands.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in packets labelled—"JAMES EPPS & Co. Homoeopathic Chemists, London." Also makers of Epps's Chocolate Essence for afternoon use.

Occasional Notes.

THE Rev. G. W. Cooke, author of the excellent book on "R. W. Emerson: his Life, Writings, and Philosophy," reviewed some time ago in the Inquirer, gives some interesting additional information in an article contributed to the New York Independent. Emerson, he says, continued to preach for some time after quitting his Boston pulpit. After his return from Europe he preached for some months in the Unitarian Church New Bedford, and received a call to settle there. He offered to do so, providing the prayer in the public services could be made optional with himself to omit or to use, according as the spirit moved him to utterance; but this was not agreed to. In 1836 he preached three months in Concord, and two years (1836-1838) he preached in East Lexington. He was, therefore, occupying a Unitarian pulpit at the time of his famous Divinity School address of 1838. The opposition to him, made as the result of that address, caused him to finally abandon the pulpit and give himself entirely to the platform and literature.

In regard to the charge of scepticism, Mr. Cooke writes:—

The whole spirit of Emerson's religious teachings would be missed by ranking him as a sceptic. He was one of those men who are coming in all ages of the world, who believe more, rather than less, and who reject what most hold dear, for the sake of a higher and truer assertion of the inward experiences and realities of religion. Like Tauler, like Fox, he would throw aside all forms, and the very letter of religion, because he believed God speaks within, giving us all knowledge. How he can be called a "pagan," as some have done since his death, I am quite at a loss to understand. Certainly he does not at all resemble even the greatest of the pagans in his religious views; rather is he like the most Christian of all the Christians. There is but little resemblance in his religion to that of Socrates, Seneca, or Marcus Aurelius; but there is very much which is exceedingly like a Kempis, Fevelon, Tauler, and Fox. The central doctrine in his religion, as in his philosophy, was that of grace. In his essay on "Experience," he says, "nothing is of us or our works. All is of God." On the same page he says, "All writing comes by the grace of God, and all doing and having." This is not the Pauline doctrine of grace; not the true form of the Christian view of that doctrine. It is, however, much in accordance with that form of it held by all Antinomians and Mystics. Emerson was not a Christian in this, that he did not believe that grace came through Christ—no Christian was ever a firmer believer in this doctrine than he; but he regarded it as being universal, of no especial religion, and as coming to all moral and godly souls who keep open the inward ear.

Mr. COOKE subjoins an interesting incident which Miss Elizabeth Peabody, the friend and correspondent of Dr. Channing, and for many years one of Emerson's intimate friends, had from her sister, Mrs. Nathaniel Hawthorne. One day, when Emerson and Hawthorne were walking on the hills about Concord, Emerson said to his companion, in a conversation which turned on religious subjects: "We must get rid of Christ," Hawthorne replied: "No, Mr. Emerson; we cannot do without Christ." Mr. Cooke adds:—

Such a declaration as this undoubtedly expressed Emerson's real sentiments, understanding the word "Christ" in its theological sense. He admired the man, Jesus, regarding him as the greatest of all the prophets and one worthy of the deepest reverence. It was Jesus as a Lord, as one commanding men, that he rejected, believing that grace is free to all, that every soul may come to God. He believed in no spiritual masters, finding in intuition the possibility of each soul receiving all revelations. To him grace, or the moral sentiment, takes the place of Christ and becomes the mediating agent of the Divine. He believed that God goes forth, in all the power and attraction of his Being, to uplift and draw to Himself, through grace, every child born into the world. He was one who was much more than sensitive in his distrust of all religious definitions, and shrank, largely because of his modesty of nature, from everything like a declaration of his own beliefs; yet it seems to me clear enough that he believed in a personal God and a personal immortality. He was a great believer, deeply anchored in his faith in spiritual things. The future will not find in him a sceptic; but, overlooking his attitude toward religious forms and names, will accept him as one of the most helpful of the religious teachers of our century.

MR. KRISTOPHER JANSON, the Norse poet, novelist, and preacher, who has settled at Minneapolis, in Minnesota, is engaged on a series of novels illustrating the life and surroundings of his Norwegian fellow countrymen in America. The first of these will be published in the course of the present summer at Copenhagen. Mr. Janson is employed as a Missionary to his Scandinavian fellow countrymen by the American Unitarian Association.

SINCE our note last week the largest sum received in the Hospital Sunday collection was that from Christ Church, Lancaster-gate (Canon Boyd Carpenter's), £627. At Bedford Chapel (the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke's) the collection was £80, and at the Unitarian Chapel, Nottingham, £26. At Mr. Voysey's Church the collection was £35.

A CONFERENCE of clergy and laity, promoted by the National Church Reform Union, was held on Tuesday evening at Sion College, under the presidency of Mr. Albert Grey, M.P., at which a resolution was carried to the effect that no measure for the reform of church patronage would be satisfactory which did not give the parishioners a voice in the selection of the incumbent, to which a rider was added, insisting upon the total abolition of the purchase and sale of livings. It seems a very small measure of church reform, and will hardly stave off the threatened disestablishment.

In connection with the recent offering of prayers in the United States House of Representatives, a correspondent of the Jewish Chronicle reminds us that the Jewish minister who first opened the proceedings of that American legislative body with prayer was the Rev. Dr. Raphall, formerly minister of the Birmingham congregation, and a well-known author.

THE Rede Lecture was delivered last week in the Senate-house, Cambridge, by Mr. Matthew Arnold, the subject being "Literature and Science." There was a large attendance of members of the Senate and their friends, and a number of ladies were present. The undergraduates' galleries were well filled. The lecture attracted more than usual interest, and the reception given to Mr. Arnold was most hearty. The lecture lasted about an hour, and was devoted to a defence of the claims of literature to a prominent position in education, and more particularly was intended as a reply to Professor Huxley's vigorous appeal on behalf of physical science. Mr. Arnold stated that ten years ago an attempt had been made to deprive letters of their proper position in education, and the crusade of physical science commenced. He had then pleaded on behalf of literature with the friends of physical science, but he was afraid the position of men of letters had not mended. The establishment of Sir Josiah Mason's college was a striking proof of the progress made in the attempt to eliminate literature as an important factor in education, and to prefer the exact study of physical science. He agreed with Bishop Thirlwall that a most thorough knowledge of all modern languages would not compensate for a want of knowledge of Latin and Greek, and he endeavoured to show by the arguments adduced in his lecture that as all teaching was scientific, if systematically laid out and followed to its original sources, it was a great mistake on the part of those who set up a knowledge of things as against a knowledge of words to suppose that an extended acquaintance of facts provable by demonstration would compensate us for the neglect of a study which was less monotonous, and, if properly pursued, was as beneficial. All would admit that a habit of dealing with facts was most valuable, but he protested against giving to natural knowledge the chief place in education. The great mediæval universities were not brought into existence for this end. He maintained that literæ humaniores and poetry possessed the power to engage the emotions and exercised it. Their attractions were inevitable. They would be studied more rationally, but they would not be displaced by physical science. If they lost their pre-eminence for a time, they would surely regain it. If the instinct for beauty is served by a study of Greek literature as it is served by no other literature, then the study of Greek will survive, it will be studied more rationally, and he augured from the fair hosts of Amazons engirdling the University that it was studied rationally and for its beauty.

VICTOR HUGO has issued an eloquent manifesto on behalf of the persecuted Russian Jews, in which, repudiating all antiquated creeds and dogmas, he says, "To seek God is philosophy; to see him is religion." One of the journals characterises this as "Victor Hugo's grandiose manner." To us it appears a remarkably simple statement of an elementary principle—viz., that it is the function of philosophy to search after God, if haply it may find Him, while the voice of religion, "the pure in heart, see Him."

WE notice with great interest that Cambridge University on Thursday week presented the honorary degree of Doctor of Law on Josiah Parsons Cooke, Professor of Chemistry, Harvard College, Cambridge, U.S.A. In presenting Mr. Cooke, the Public Orator, Mr. Sandys, welcomed him as a distinguished representative of a seat of learning founded two and a-half centuries ago by a Cambridge man, at a place which, a year after the founding of Harvard College, changed its name of Newtown into that of Cambridge, the university of its founder, John Harvard, of Emmanuel. The Orator also referred to the volume entitled "The New Chemistry," which had been contributed by Professor Cooke to the International Scientific series, as well as to his various chemical and mineralogical researches, and in particular to his proposed classification of the elements of nature and to his determination of the atomic weight of antimony. The Orator concluded by remarking that minute and elaborate researches such as those he had enumerated were enough to prove that while of the laws of man it was proverbially said de minimis non curant, the laws of nature could not be investigated without regard to the minima as well as the maxima, Nature herself being not only in magnis magna, but also in minimis maxima.

A CHARACTERISTIC anecdote of Emerson has been revived in Mr. Ireland's "In Memoriam, Recollections." He had been delivering an address to a literary society, and at its close the president called upon a minister to pray. The prayer delivered from the pulpit which Emerson had just vacated was remarkable throughout, and among other curious utterances was this sentence, "We beseech Thee, O Lord, to deliver us from hearing any more such transcendental nonsense as we have just listened to from this sacred desk." After the benediction Emerson asked his neighbour the name of the officiating minister, and when flatteringly answered, remarked with gentle simplicity, "He seemed a very conscientious plain-spoken man," and went on his peaceful way. The anecdote is delightful, a fine revelation of the character of the man.

THE Swiss "Reformtag" will be held this year on the 3rd and 4th of July in the city of Zürich. The "Reformtag" of the Swiss corresponds to the "Protestantentag" of the Germans. It is the annual conference of the Liberal theologians and their adherents, the Broad Church party in the Established Evangelical Churches of the German cantons. Their party organisation bears the name of "The Swiss Association for Free Christianity." The proceedings begin on the first day with a sermon in St. Peter's Church, Zürich, by Pfarrer Beyring, of Trogen, in Appenzel. The principal theme for discussion, "Our Relation to Christ," will be introduced by Professor Biedermann, of the University of Zürich, and Professor Langhans, of Berne. The circular of invitation speaks somewhat glowingly of the present relation between the two parties—or the two directions, as they are usually called—in the Evangelical Church in Switzerland. The Positive, or strict Evangelical direction, it states, has at last arrived at the perception that the Free or Rationalist direction is not merely to be tolerated, but, in a certain sense, is even to be justified in its claim to a share in the ministry and membership of the common Evangelical Church. In the presence of a common foe, the Orthodox no longer refuse the name of Christian to their brethren in office. This circumstance led to the choice of subject. "We are determined to prove," say the convening clergy, "that we have as full a right as our brethren of the traditional party to call ourselves Christians. We, too, have something positive to assert; we are not of that spirit which continually denies, but never affirms. We wish to be faithful fellow-labourers with all who are striving to build up the temple of God's Kingdom in this earth."

A LOCAL church mission army has been established in two of the thickly-populated districts of Bristol, for the purpose of reaching, on behalf of the Church of England, those to whom the "Salvation Army" now appeals. The "army" consists of communicant members of the Church, and each "soldier" is to wear a scarlet badge of membership. They will use all lawful means to draw people to their services, the work being conducted by the working-classes, under the guidance of the clergy.

FULL choral services, with "surprised boys and scarlet-chabused girls," are amongst the latest Ritualistic novelties reported. It is suggested that among the objects of the "Catholic League" shall be the restoration of the celibacy of the clergy.

MR. LEWIS BEARD, B.A., Cambridge, son of the Rev. Charles Beard, was on Wednesday called to the Bar by the Society of the Inner Temple, and Mr. F. A. Channing, M.A., Oxford, son of the Rev. W. H. Channing, was on the same day called to the Bar by the Society of Lincoln's Inn. Mr. Leves Crosskey, B.A., Cambridge, son of the Rev. H. W. Crosskey, of Birmingham, was called to the Bar not long ago. It is pleasing to find the names of our most respected ministers represented in this honourable profession.

POOLE.—The Sunday-school anniversary and flower services were held here on Sunday last, that in the morning being conducted by the Rev. A. Hood, of Bournemouth, who gave a suitable and most interesting address, containing excellent advice to both teachers and children. In the evening a service of song, "Elijah," was given, the musical portions by the scholars, with some assistance from the choir, and the connective readings by the minister, the Rev. F. T. Reed. The evening congregation was the largest that has assembled here since the opening of the organ by the late Dr. Wesley, and a collection was made on behalf of the school expenses. The church was tastefully decorated by the ladies of the congregation with choice flowers, ferns, &c., a line from one of the hymns being placed conspicuously above the pulpit,

"We thank, thee, Father, for the flowers."

PADIHAM.—Since Sunday, the 11th inst., the Gospel Temperance Mission and Blue Ribbon Union has been conducting a vigorous campaign in Padiham. Small as the town is, over 1,600 persons have signed the pledge for the first time, and nearly 2,000 donned the Blue Ribbon in consequence of the movement. The most interesting feature to us, however, is the exemplary spirit of Christian fellowship manifested in the united action of the various denominations. The meetings have been held in Wesleyan, Unitarian, Church, and Baptist school-rooms. The first service was conducted in a Wesleyan school chapel by our minister, the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., who afterwards presided at the meeting. In the Unitarian schoolroom Wesleyans have presided, in the Wesleyan and Baptist schools Unitarians have presided. Speakers of various denominations have been on all the platforms. Independently of the great temperance work done, this Blue Ribbon movement has brought about a state of Christian charity and brotherly respect unknown in the district before. In Padiham at least the Unitarians cannot complain of being shut out from religious fellowship and co-operation with the other Churches.

THE death is announced of Mr. W. Bodham Donne, for some years librarian to the London Library, and examiner of plays in the Lord Chamberlain's office. Mr. Donne was in his seventy-fifth year.

Reviews.

Old Faiths in New Light. By the Rev. Newman Smyth, D.D. London: Unwin, Holborn Viaduct. 1882.

This book belongs to a class which is rapidly increasing, and the frequent appearance of which constitutes an important sign of the times. It is an attempt to re-state the essential doctrines of the old faith in the light of modern thought and knowledge. It is an American book, reprinted in England, and commended in a brief preface by the Rev. A. B. Bruce, D.D., of Glasgow, whose somewhat similar work on "The Chief End of Revelation" was reviewed a short time since in these columns. Dr. Bruce had met with it when he was in America, and, having found much pleasure in its perusal, took occasion to refer to it and quote it in his own recently published work. He expresses his satisfaction at the publication of an English edition, and says he confidently expects that British readers will find it at once attractive and helpful. Dr. Newman Smyth did not bring an untried hand to his important task. He was already known as the author of "The Religious Feeling" and "The Orthodox Theology of To-day"—works anticipating in some respect the book now before us.

The work consists of eight chapters, which discuss the subject in the following order:—1. The Idea of Development and the New Questions about Old Faiths; 2. The Historical Growth of the Bible; 3. The Course of Moral Education and Progress of Revelation; 4. The Advance of Knowledge and the Scientific Tendency of the Bible; 5. The Culmination in the Christ; The Uniqueness of Jesus; 6. The Naturalness of Christ; 7. The Unfinished World and its Completion; 8. The Process of Resurrection and the End. A very full analytical index, and a list of authors and other persons referred to, are given at the close, and form a valuable appendix to the work. In justification of his attempt the author, in his first chapter, says:—

The history of doctrine shows that one work which is required every generation or two of Christian thought is to rearrange its faiths in new lights; and many signs indicate a growing and present need of some resetting of the so-called Christian evidences. This work also needs to be popularised, as science nowadays is popularised. Our age comes speaking new tongues which our fathers knew not of. We, who have inherited their faiths as our birthright, have tried also to learn these strange tongues, and we find to our joy that we can still prophesy in them; that in some of the very words which at first we feared were without God, and without hope in the world, we begin to discover the best words the human reason has ever found in which to declare the ways of the Spirit.

Accordingly, this is precisely the work which our author has undertaken. He has endeavoured to re-arrange the old faiths in a new light, in order to meet the growing and present need of some re-setting of the so-called Christian evidences. And it must be admitted both by those who agree with him, and by those who dissent from his conclusions, that he has brought to his task considerable abilities, and has acquitted himself in a manner to deserve the attention of all who are interested in the subject he discusses. We think he has said the best that can be said on behalf of the Bible and of Christianity. If his position cannot be maintained, then all special grounds in support of the Bible and its teaching must be abandoned. His fundamental idea is that the Bible is a historical growth illustrating a Divine purpose throughout—a purpose dimly seen in the earlier books, becoming clearer in the later ones, and reaching its perfect manifestation in the life and teaching of Christ. This theory of development in the thought and teaching of the Bible is no new idea. It is one for which Unitarians have contended in their endeavours to establish the merits of the Bible on just grounds. It represents the middle ground between the old theory of Biblical infallibility and the extreme rationalism of the destructive school of criticism. Very fully and ably does the author present this view of Scripture as a historical growth, a progressive divine revelation. Thus, in the chapter on "The Course of Moral Education," he says:—

The Bible is a living book. There is movement and life in it. Ideas grow in it. Truths blossom out and come to their maturity in it. The purpose of love ripens and bears at last its perfect fruit in this sacred history. The Bible is not a mere repository of the words of God, a receptacle of doctrines like an apothecary's shop stored with the essences and abstractions of the products of nature all labelled and ready for use, according to some favourite prescription. The Bible is not an abstract of useful doctrines to be administered by rule; it is rather like nature, full of mystery, full of life. We can follow, as it were, the whole course of the seasons through it—the spring time, the early days of promise, the time of sowing and the times of waiting; the days when the growth seemed checked, when the tares an enemy hath sown multiply; the dark days and the stormy, the hours of hurricane and desolation, as well as the days of blossoming and song; and through all its changes, through the long succession of its ages, are to be discovered the steady advance and working out of one purpose, and the sure coming of the harvest. And, like the growth of nature, this progressive course of revelation, the gradual unfolding of its seed-truths, and the final and glorious fulfilment of its promise, are phenomena which imply the operation of higher laws and greater forces than the acts or the thoughts of the labourers who ploughed in hope and scattered the seed, and looked forward with prophetic expectation to the harvest at the end of time.

In estimating this argument of the orderly development of religious thought in the Bible, the progressive character of its revelation, there are two important points to be borne in mind. First, the order of the Biblical books as they stand in our Bible to-day is not the order in which they were written. The Pentateuch though placed first belongs to the later books of the Old Testament. Other books and portions of books written long before it are placed after it. The book of Psalms consists of a number of poetical effusions thrown together without any attention to date or authorship. They probably cover a long period, and the first might be written last, and the last first for anything we know. Dr. Newman Smyth argues as if the first words of Genesis "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth," were the first words of the Bible ever written—as if it were the starting point in actual date of the whole Biblical record. His argument to be thoroughly sound requires that the order in which the books are placed should be that in which they were written. As this is not the case, there is a strong point against his argument which he has not noticed.

Each book of the Old Testament contains evidence for us about the opinions and the ideas entertained by its author and the men of his day. If, then, we are to become acquainted with the manner in which the religious ideas of the Israelites grew up one after another, we must first find out when each of the books was written, then, by comparing these same books together, we shall be able to show how the Israelites advanced from one way of thinking to another. If we could not do this, we might at once give up the idea of any history at all in the proper sense of the word, and we should wander about at random without discovering any process of development. . . . It is only within the last hundred years that men have devoted themselves earnestly to the investigation of the age of these books. Before that time people did not pay enough attention to it. They simply accepted whatever tradition had handed down about the age of the writers; and if only a book had once had some name attached to it they relied on it without a second thought. The consequence was that people got a totally wrong conception of Israel's religion, and ascribed to ideas of comparatively recent date a much higher antiquity.—Religion of Israel.

Again, it is evident that the Biblical books have been edited and re-edited since they were first written. What alterations or additions have been made to them in this process of revision and reconstruction we do not know. From internal evidence we see that fragments—written when? or by whom?—have been pieced together and made up into one book. Are these fragments even as they were originally written, or have they been adapted to later stages of Hebrew thought? One book—Isaiah—is made up, the critics tell us, of the writings of two authors at least, separated by a wide interval of time.

Some others are so fragmentary or obscure that it is difficult to extract from them a coherent religious lesson. How can we talk of orderly progressive development in connection with books like these? Does not their composite character, the blending together of fragments of uncertain date, weaken the argument as to progressive development? And does not the editing and re-editing of the several books, involving alterations unknown to us, greatly lessen if it does not destroy their value as original witnesses? These considerations, it seems to us, lie at the very threshold of the discussion which Dr. Newman Smyth pursues in this volume. The circumstance that he has omitted to notice them militates, we think, against the value of his book. He would say, no doubt, that he relies on the broad features of the Bible literature, but those very features are made up of details which are open to question. How can we be sure that the older books have not been accommodated to the ideas and sentiments—the Messianic hopes and expectations for example—which grew up in the Hebrew mind in later ages? Take for instance the account of Abraham, of which Dr. Smyth makes a great deal. When was it written? Did the promise that in his seed all the families of the earth should be blest, form part of the original tradition? Was that promise the source of the Messianic expectation, descending direct from Abraham's day to "the fulness of time?" Or did the Messianic expectation, when ages afterwards it had grown up, give birth to the alleged promise? Take the Bible as it is, and the theory of development seems to be borne out by it; but scientific criticism tells us that it is not the way the Bible literature grew up. And of course the true order of its growth is, after all, the only sound basis of a just conclusion regarding it.

Having conducted his argument to "the culmination in the Christ," Dr. Smyth devotes the last two chapters of his work to interesting speculations regarding the future of the world and of mankind:—

The first broad sign upon the very face of things of something still to come is the manifest incompleteness of the present world. We live broken lives in an unfinished world. Our earth, it is true, is in some respects already completed. Nature in some directions seems to have come to an end of her progress. As a world fit for the abode of human life the earth is finished and pronounced good. The ages which consolidated the crust of the earth laid up vast beds of coal; fixed the bounds of the sea; determined an equable temperature; produced fruit-bearing trees; made the earth ready for the grass and the flowers; and cleared the air of heavy vapours for the breath of life and the songs of the birds; those creative ages finished their work of preparation when men at last awoke in an earthly paradise. The world as a stage for the great drama of human life, its comedy and tragedy, is done. The human body likewise seems to mark the end of one long course of nature. The goal of a slow, toil-some physical ascent is reached in its perfection. Nature has made, so far as we can see, the best use of her best materials in the organisation of the human body. In this direction the creative process has come to a pause; the earthly elements in their combinations within the human brain seem to have been brought to their last conceivable refinement of organisation. Another step would be a step beyond existing nature. Some gate, now closed, must be opened before organisation can be carried farther than the present physical life of man.

In discussing this subject our author confines himself to two main questions:—"Are there evidences, growing rather than diminishing with the advance of knowledge, that this present visible system of nature is not the only order, or final form of the creation? and, secondly, are there evidences, gaining or losing in force with the advance of science that our present embodiment is not our final mode of existence, but that it is to be made perfect in some process of resurrection?" A careful discussion of these points through the next eighty pages of the book brings this interesting and able work to a close. We can confidently recommend it as an exceedingly suggestive volume, filled with high and earnest thoughts expressed in a clear and attractive style.

C. F. B.

The Design Argument Vindicated. A Lecture to Atheists. By George St. Clair.

This is an article which appeared in last month's Modern Thought, reprinted for the Birmingham Christian Evidence Society. The successor of George Dawson essays to put Mr. Herbert Spencer right on the subject of teleology, and to demolish the objections of Atheists and Agnostics against the reasoning of Archdeacon Paley. We think it exceedingly unfortunate that well-meaning vindicators of Theism should still rely upon this ground—ground which every "Atheist or Agnostic," worthy of the name, knows very well to have been completely undermined by recent science. We demur altogether to Mr. St. Clair's statement that "the main truths of theology may be arrived at by the use of reason, just as astronomers arrive at the truths of the solar system." If this were so, there would not remain an honest and intelligent Agnostic a day longer, and we think it a great pity that Christian Evidence Societies should persist in perpetuating such confusion of thought upon a matter which is susceptible of more philosophical treatment. Mr. St. Clair displays a lamentable ignorance of the position of modern Agnosticism when he speaks as though its whole fabric could be brought down per saltum by a mere restatement of the exploded arguments of Paley. We confess to considerable respect for his "Natural Theology;" the work served a good purpose in its time, but we should as much think of making some of the older treatises in logic our text books in the science as uphold the argument from "Design" in favour of our belief in a Supreme cause. Some of the passages in the pamphlet are very eloquent and picturesque. Similar strains may have their desired effect upon the author's Sunday hearers, but we fancy they will hardly convert Mr. Herbert Spencer or Mr. Huxley to acceptance of Paley's philosophy. Mr. St. Clair speaks with an assurance of the conclusiveness and plainness of his argument, which seems to imply that if these and others of their way of thinking were disposed to believe, they must do so. This is but too palpable throughout the paper. From the presiding genius of the Church of the Saviour pulpit we looked, too, for more refined language when appealing to Spencer, Huxley, Haeckel, &c., than the passage dealing with the levator muscle, where he says, "the upper lid hangs down over the eye and must be shoved up by the hand." The agnostic band is not composed exclusively of a rabble to whom such language would be adapted; indeed, if it were, it could not hold together so long. We object as strongly to the author saying, "Helmholtz may not like it," but we may feel confident that all attempts to imitate and supersede the living eye will fare as badly as the attempts to accomplish perpetual motion." Sir Charles Bell's remark is quoted that the sensibility of the surface of the eye, resulting in its constant washing by the eyelid, is a fact which at once answers the querist who asks why we suffer pain. But the intelligent agnostic would suggest whether this is not jumping to an unwarranted conclusion. Mr. St. Clair confesses himself a believer in Evolution, and yet he would maintain that cats possess claws because they are "intended" to catch mice, rather than that they catch mice because they have acquired claws! The application of this principle to pain and the eye is obvious. He rejoices that Darwin makes frequent use of such expressions as "contrivance," "arrangements," "purpose," &c., seemingly oblivious of the fact that these words are but the conventional terms for ideas of which the late lamented scientist was the able exponent. A worse piece of sophistry is where he quotes John Stuart Mill as saying that "the design argument is of a really scientific character." When Mill said that, he meant, as the context clearly shows, that the argument "claims to be judged by the established canons of induction." He was not expressing a conviction of its soundness, but only distinguishing it from certain other arguments with which he had been dealing, which did not pretend to be of a scientific character. He adds, moreover, that "it amounts only to the inferior kind of inductive evidence called analogy," and that "its force is very generally overrated." This pamphlet shows how little qualified Mr. St. Clair is to deal with the vital questions which are to-day agitating the thinking world, and we wonder the Christian Evidence Society, for which it has been issued, does not see the danger of confusing the mind of the public as to the real issues.

Literary Notes.

A LITERARY treasure of singular appositeness, says the Athenæum, has just turned up in the form of a preface, written by Thackeray for the second edition of his "Irish Sketch Book," but suppressed by the publishers as being too out-spoken. This preface, which forms a long essay on the political situation in Ireland, will shortly be printed in the Century Magazine. In it Thackeray strongly supports not merely the disestablishment of the Established Church, which, he says, "will no more grow in Ireland than a palm tree in St. Paul's Churchyard," but even the repeal of the Union. He goes so far as to venture on a prophecy that the latter concession will be eventually wrung from Sir Robert Peel. The paper is said to be written in Thackeray's most vivacious and most characteristic style, and will form a curious contrast to those acid comments by Carlyle on Irish affairs which are now also appearing in the Century Magazine.

MESSRS. GEORGE ROUTLEDGE AND SONS are about to publish a posthumous volume of poems by Mr. Longfellow, entitled "In the Harbour."

MESSRS. RICHARD AND GEORGE TANGYE, of Birmingham, propose to fit up a room in the New Free Library of that town, to be called the "John Bright Room," and to stock it with books on history and political economy, and also to provide means of keeping up a supply of works on these subjects. They also propose to vest in the Birmingham Corporation a sum of money for the provision of prizes for students of history and political economy.

THE seventieth birthday of Miss Elizabeth Peabody, of Concord, was celebrated by the Woman's Club of Boston, U.S., May 17. Miss Peabody, a sister of the late Mrs. Hawthorne, was prominent in the old transcendentalist movement, and edited the "Æsthetic Papers," which contained a valuable essay by Emerson on "War" not found in any of his volumes. She also contributed to the Dial. Her latest work is "Reminiscences of William Ellery Channing." Miss Peabody was present at the celebration in Boston, and stated that her grandfather informed her that he had been present at the first meeting held to consider the question of the separation of the American colonies from Great Britain. It assembled in the drawing-room of a private house in Dedham, Massachusetts.

MR. WILKIE COLLINS is engaged in writing a new serial story, the publication of which will begin next month. In this work the question of vivisection is placed in a new point of view by tracing the effect of the habitual practice of cruelty on human character.

MR. ANTHONY TROLLOPE, who has been making a rather lengthy sojourn in Ireland, has just returned to London. We understand that a new work in connection with Ireland may shortly be expected from his pen.

BEFORE very long Captain Burton will publish, in pursuance of his project of translating the whole works of Camoens, his version of the sonnets of the Portuguese poet. It is complete in manuscript.

ACCORDING to the Academy, M. Renan, having completed an elaborate index to the seven volumes of his "Histoire des Origines du Christianisme," has now begun to work upon a new undertaking—a History of Israel before the birth of Jesus. It is hardly necessary to state that his "Marc-Aurèle," the last of the former series, was promptly placed in the Index.

A RARE volume, printed at Boston by B. Green in 1720, entitled "The Indian Primer, and Milk for Babies," was sold at Messrs. Puttick and Simpson's, on Thursday, for £50.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—The Hour of Danger.—Disease commonly comes on with slight symptoms, which, if neglected, increase in severity, and thus become dangerous—a condition which betrays the grossest remissness—when these Pills, taken in accordance with their accompanying directions, would not only have checked, but conquered the incipient disorder. Patients daily forward details of the most remarkable and instructive cases in which timely attention to Holloway's advice has undoubtedly saved them from severe illness. These Pills act primarily on the digestive organs, which they stimulate when slow and imperfect; and, secondly, upon the blood, which is thoroughly purified by them, whence is derived the general tone they impart, and their power of subjugating hypochondriacism, dyspepsia, and nervous complaints.

Religious Intelligence.

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE.

The Annual Examination was held in University Hall on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday. The following is the programme of the proceedings:—

MONDAY.

Junior Hebrew.
History of Doctrines (Junior).
Latin.
Sermon (Mr. Tarrant), John xx. 11-14, "The Risen Lord."
Sermon (Mr. Gow), Luke iv. 4, "Bread of Life."
Junior Mental Philosophy.
Sermon (Mr. Anthony), Is. lvi. 7, "The House of Prayer."
Reading in Philo.
Sermon (Mr. Whitehead), Psalm xvi. 6, "Self Sacrifice."

TUESDAY.

Middle Hebrew.
Introduction to Theology.
Sermon (Mr. Herford), Psalm c. 2, "The Religious Life."
Senior Greek.
Sermon (Mr. Robinson), Psalm xlii. 5 "Rest in God."
Sermon (Mr. Taylor), Rev. ii. 10, "Faithful till death."
Introduction to Comparative Religion.
New Testament (Gospels).
Sermon (Mr. Moore), "The Fatherhood of God."

WEDNESDAY.

Senior Hebrew.
Mental Philosophy.
Ecclesiastical History.
Sermon (Mr. Theophilus), Luke x. "Parable of the Good Samaritan."
History of Doctrines (Senior).
Ethics.
Sermon (Mr. Waid), Psalm xlvii. 10, "Repose in God."

The Rev. H. W. CROSSKEY, LL.D., delivered the Address to the Students on Wednesday, at the conclusion of the Examination, when several ladies were added to the audience.

Among those present during the examination were Joseph Lupton, Esq., President; D. Ainsworth, Esq., M.P., Treasurer; Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., and Mr. R. D. Darbishire, B.A., Secretaries; the Rev. H. W. Crosskey, LL.D., Visitor; and the Rev. Dr. Martineau, Principal; the Revs. Professor Carpenter, M.A., J. Drummond, LL.D., C. B. Upton, B.A., B.Sc.; the Revs. Dr. Sadler, T. L. Marshall, H. Solly, H. S. Solly, R. Shaen, Dr. Freeman Clarke (Boston, U.S.), W. H. Channing, J. E. Odgers, A. W. Worthington, J. Worthington, W. M. Ainsworth, D. Agate, S. A. Steinthal, C. J. Street, P. M. Higginson, C. T. Poynting, R. A. Armstrong, P. H. Wicksteed, J. T. Whitehead, C. C. Coe, E. S. Howse, H. Ierson, C. H. Dall (Calcutta); and Messrs. R. Greg, B. Heape, Professor Poynting (Mason College, Birmingham), Rupert Potter, T. Ashton, J. Wellings, Herbert New, I. M. Wade, H. Jeffery, A. Higginson.

TRUSTEES' MEETING.

The annual meeting of trustees was held in University Hall on Thursday morning. The President, JOSEPH LUPTON, Esq., took the chair, and forty-one trustees were present.

The SECRETARY (Mr. R. D. Darbishire) read an abstract of the minutes of the last annual meeting on the 19th January, and the subsequent minutes of committee, which were confirmed on the motion of Mr. HEAPE, seconded by the Rev. T. L. MARSHALL.

The PRINCIPAL (Dr. Martineau) read the report respecting the students. It referred to the death of Mr. Sydney Oliver, B.A., during the latter part of the session, leaving a young widow. It was also stated that one of the outgoing students, Mr. D. Theophilus, M.A., had given up the intention at present of entering the ministry.

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG moved a resolution expressing the grateful appreciation of the trustees of the labours of the professors, and their thanks to the Rev. H. W. Crosskey, LL.D., for his valuable address, which he was requested to allow to be printed. He spoke of the freshness of the address, and the new point of view it represented, which made it as interesting to the old students as to the new.

Mr. I. M. WADE seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously, and was acknowledged by the President on behalf of Dr. Crosskey, who was unable to be present, on account of pressing engagements at home.

The customary college certificates were granted to Mr. Waid and Mr. Theophilus on the completion of their course.

The Rev. C. T. POYNTING, B.A., read a report on the Local Theological Examinations, the results of which have already been announced in these columns. It was stated that these examinations would be held this year, but that unless there were a greater number of candidates in future, the number having fallen from fifty-nine in 1877 to only twelve this year, they would be discontinued.

The customary certificates were granted to the candidates who had passed this examination.

The Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED moved and Mr. RUSSELL MARTINEAU seconded, that Mr. Poynting's report be received, which was carried.

Professor CARPENTER reported that his prize of £5 offered for the best essay on Comparative Religion was divided between Mr. Tarrant and Mr. Travers Herford.

SPECIAL REPORT.

Mr. R. D. DARBISHIRE then brought up the special report of the Committee, relating, first, to the transfer of University Hall to the College, and, secondly, to the new regulations respecting the admission of students. Mr. Darbishire moved that the draft trust deeds, laid before the Trustees relating to the transfer, be approved.

Mr. W. SHAEN seconded the motion, and entered into detail respecting the proceedings which had been taken so far by the Trustees of the Hall.

The resolution was carried unanimously. The Rev. H. E. Dowson, on behalf of the Committee, next moved "That the new regulations relating to the students be adopted, to come into force from the commencement of the Session 1882-3."

The Rev. C. T. POYNTING seconded the resolution. A discussion followed, on purely academical matters, in which Professor Carpenter, the Rev. J. E. Odgers, Mr. Russell Martineau, and Professor J. H. Poynting took part.

Mr. Dowson then moved a resolution respecting the exhibitions to students in the Hall and residing in London, and for undergraduates who pursue their studies elsewhere than at University College, London. He entered at some length into an explanation of the regulations which have been laid before the trustees in a special report. Reference was especially made to the appointment of Professor Henry Morley as Principal, and the valuable suggestions he had made in framing the new regulations.

Mr. B. HEAPE seconded the resolution.

Mr. WADE raised a question respecting the constitution of the College as an institution for the advancement of theological learning.

Dr. MARTINEAU pointed out that Mr. Wade's proposition was beyond discussion at this meeting, as they had received the College under this constitution, and he wished to know whether Mr. Wade would propose a creed to be imposed on the professors and students, and suggested that he should go to the annual meetings at Manchester and raise this question.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL then moved certain amendments to the general scheme, of which he had given notice, the principal drift of which was to oppose the scheme of compulsory residence in the Hall imposed upon the students.

Mr. R. D. DARBISHIRE seconded the amendments as one of the trustees and not as secretary, differing from the majority of the committee on the point of compulsory residence.

The Rev. J. T. WHITEHEAD supported the amendments, the Rev. J. E. ODGERS gave his general adhesion to the general scheme of the committee, the Rev. J. WRIGHT also generally supported Mr. STEINTHAL's views, but the Rev. Dr. MARTINEAU thought it too late to alter the plan of the Committee as the whole basis of the transfer of the Hall was that the Manchester New College students would reside in the Hall. Under the present circumstances he thought it desirable to make residence compulsory. After some further discussion, and some modifications made in the original resolutions, Mr. Steinthal withdrew his amendments and the resolutions proposed on behalf of the Committee were carried with only one dissentient. The most important points in the resolutions were carried in the following form:—"Every Divinity student will be required to reside in the Hall unless exemption be granted in particular cases by the Committee," and that "Such students as reside in London, but not in the Hall, may attend the Hall as day boarders on the Hall terms."

The students who had not completed their course were readmitted.

Applications were received from J. W. Myers, of Durham, for the first theological year; Mr. Tarrant to be allowed another year's free admission to classes; Mr. Felix Taylor, Mr. Emmanuel Thomas, who have matriculated at London University; Mr. J. D. Strong, of the Home Missionary Board, subject to his matriculating in January next; Mr. Arthur Smith, son of the Rev. E. Smith, of Nottingham, who matriculated with honours at London University; Mr. Murray Blair, of Belfast, who has also matriculated in honours. The Rev. W. Lazenby, of Newchurch, was admitted free to lectures.

A vote of thanks to the President, on the motion of Dr. MARTINEAU, seconded by the Rev. H. IERSON, brought the proceedings to a close.

THE STUDENTS' DINNER.

This annual festive meeting of the past and present students of the College was held on Wednesday evening, at the Inns of Court Hotel. About seventy dined together, under the genial presidency of the Rev. JOHN WRIGHT, B.A., the oldest student present. Several ladies and friends of the College joined the company. Among the sentiments spoken to after the usual loyal toast were, "The House of Commons," responded to by the Vice-Chairman, Mr. D. AINSWORTH, M.P., Treasurer of the College; "Manchester New College," responded to by Professor ESTLIN CARPENTER; "The Old Students," proposed by Mr. LUPTON, President of the College, and responded to by the Rev. T. L. MARSHALL; "The Present Students," to which Mr. WAID, the senior student, responded; "The Chairman," proposed by the Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, and "The Visitors," proposed by Mr. J. S. AINSWORTH, and responded to by Mr. HERBERT NEW.

DEDICATION SERVICE.

On Thursday evening a Dedication Service was held at Little Portland-street Chapel, to welcome into the ministry the senior student, Mr. Waid. Mr. D. Theophilus, the only other student who has completed his course, is not at present about to enter the ministry, but was present on the occasion, as also were all the other students. There were a large and deeply-interested congregation. The Rev. Professor DRUMMOND, LL.D., opened the service by giving out hymn 506, and reading a portion of St. Luke xii., after which he offered up the dedicatory prayer. Hymn 308 was then sung.

Dr. MARTINEAU, the Principal of the College, then delivered an address, dedicating the senior student, Mr. Waid, to the work of the ministry, to which that gentleman made a suitable reply.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL then welcomed Mr. Waid into the ministry, offering the right hand of fellowship.

This very interesting service was brought to a close with Hymn 212, and prayer and benediction.

The hymns were taken from "Hymns for the Christian Church and Home."

UNIVERSITY HALL.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The annual general meeting of proprietors was held on Thursday afternoon. Present: Mr. WILLIAM SHAEN, M.A., in the chair, and the Revs. Dr. Sadler, P. M. Wicksteed, J. Estlin Carpenter, E. S. Howse, T. L. Marshall, Henry Solly, Dendy Agate, W. M. Ainsworth, J. E. Odgers, R. A. Armstrong, J. T. Whitehead, R. Crompton Jones, R. Shaen, P. M. Higginson, H. Enfield Dowson; Messrs. W. L. Carpenter, C. J. Murch, W. A. Sharpe, Russell Scott, T. Smith Osler, H. R. Greg, R. Harrop, P. Lawford, W. Blake Odgers, Talfourd Ely, W. F. Blake, H. W. Gair, J. Thornely, W. Thornely, D. Martineau, David Ainsworth, M.P., W. P. Price and E. A. Wurtzburg, Secretary.

The minutes of the special general meeting held on the 2nd June were read, confirmed, and signed by the chairman. The annual report of the council of the 7th inst. was then read. The audited statement of accounts and the auditors' report were read and adopted.

The CHAIRMAN read the resolution passed that day at a meeting of the Trustees of Manchester New College. The resolutions effecting the transfer of the Hall to the College were then moved by Mr. ROBERT HARROP, seconded by the Rev. PHILIP WICKSTEED and carried unanimously.

A vote of thanks to the Council of the past two years and the Transfer Committee was then carried, as also a vote of thanks to the chairman, moved by Mr. D. MARTINEAU, seconded by Mr. T. S. OSLER.

The Rev. R. C. JONES moved:—"That the cordial thanks of the meeting be given to Professor Beesly for his zealous and generous devotion to the interests of the Hall during the last twenty-five years, and that the meeting regret that the time has now arrived at which their connection with him must cease." The motion was seconded by the Rev. J. E. ODGERS, and supported by the Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, and all these gentlemen as old students of the Hall bore testimony to the high moral and intellectual standard the Principal had maintained, and the great value of his services.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

The first Council Meeting for the current session was held at the offices of the Association on Monday. D. MARTINEAU, Esq., one of the Vice-Presidents, in the chair. There were also present the Revs. R. SPEARS, T. L. MARSHALL, R. SHAEN, W. C. BOWIE, W. J. ODGERS, W. H. CHANNING, J. WORTHINGTON, E. M. GELDART, Dr. CARPENTER, F.R.S., C.B.; Messrs. JEFFERY, J. T. PRESTON, F. COLLIER, B. K. SPENCER (Southampton), W. BARROW, F. NETTLEFOLD, W. SHAEN, T. C. CLARKE, I. M. WADE, and the Secretary (Rev. H. IERSON).

The minutes of the last meeting were read by the Secretary; and also the following report of the Executive Committee to the Council. On the motion of the Chairman, seconded by Mr. JEFFERY, the report was received

REPORT.

The Committee congratulate the Council and the Association upon the many hopeful auspices with which the work of the New Year is begun. They notice especially the sign of increased interest in the marked improvement in the amount of the annual collection, and they enter upon their duties with encouragement in the pleasant recollection of the large attendances and the cordial and united feeling manifested at all the recent meetings.

In accordance with the wish expressed by the members present at the late annual meeting a message of fraternal greeting was sent by telegraph to the meeting of the Protestantverein of Germany, which was being held on the same day at Goslar.

The addition agreed upon to the first resolution, passed at the annual meeting, affirming the principle that the profession of Atheism should not deprive any citizen of his civil rights, including that of representing his fellow-citizens in Parliament if duly elected, and directing the Committee to take every fitting opportunity to petition both Houses of Legislature in that sense, has been duly entered on the minutes and ordered to be published in the record of proceedings to be issued with the annual report. Among the sub-committees which have been appointed for particular objects is one specially concerned with questions of civil rights, whose first duty will be to consider in what manner the resolution of the annual meeting will best be carried out.

The Committee would recommend to the Council to authorise the taking of the necessary steps to amend the rules respecting nominations to the Council and the Executive Committee. They are of opinion that in regard to both, the entire list of nominations ought to be laid before the Council at its last meeting before the Annual Meeting, so that they may be duly considered in the drawing up of the lists to be nominated at the Annual Meeting in the name of the Council. It is obviously desirable that the vice-presidents and home correspondents should be nominated on some principle well understood as recognised by the Council itself, and one that shall at least contribute to render the Council as nearly as possible representative of the entire constituency of the Association.

The Committee fully recognise the importance of the resolution which was adopted at the last Council meeting on the motion of Mr. Edwin Ellis, that they should be asked to consider and report on "the practicability of an organised effort for giving services in some of the centres of trade, especially in London, and as to the desirability of raising a special fund for the support of such effort." They have accordingly taken the matter into consideration, and have invited the co-operation of the London District Society in the inquiry. A delegation from that Society has been appointed to meet them in a special Conference which will shortly be held on this subject.

The Committee are happy to report that three gentlemen, members of the Council, have intimated their intention to visit the United States and to be present at Saratoga in September, at the meetings of the National American Conference. They suggest to the Council the formal appointment of these gentlemen to represent the Association on that occasion.

The Annual Report is usually posted to our subscribers only; it is intended to send it for the present year to the much larger circle of known liberal friends with an appeal for new annual subscriptions in aid of the Association.

The Resolution having been adopted at the Annual Meeting that Dr. James Freeman Clarke should be requested to allow his admirable sermon to be published, the Committee were happily enabled with Dr. Clarke's kind consent to place it at once in the hands of the printers. It was therefore issued without delay and at the singularly low price of one penny, a large edition having been ordered. The Committee trust that it will be generally seen that a discourse so well adapted to enlighten the public mind as to the true aims and spirit of Unitarianism ought to be largely subscribed for by all our congregations for giving away on a wide scale throughout the country, and that advantage will be immediately taken of their liberal offer to forward carriage free fifty copies for three shillings and a hundred for five shillings.

The Committee have ordered the issue of a cheap edition of Dr. Smith's "Texts and Margins of the Revised New Testament bearing upon points of Doctrine." It is now to be obtained post free, in a neat paper cover, at threepence per copy. They have also ordered to be sold in the Rooms and placed in the catalogue a work upon the same subject by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A., entitled "Christian Doctrine in the Light of New Testament Revision," price one shilling.

A grant has been made to the Rev. J. Davies, of Alltplace, in consideration of services conducted by him at Cwmawrdu. A grant of books has been sent to Mr. Winman to assist him in his lay services at Cheadle, and to Mr. Wallace of Keady, co. Armagh, Ireland, for the library of a small society of inquirers which has recently been formed in that place. Tracts have been sent to Rev. W. C. Bowie, of Stamford-street, and to Rev. W. R. Shanks, for use in house to house visitation at Blackfriars and King's Lynn, to Rev. T. Pipe for his services at Lye Waste, and to Mr. J. H. Cliff, of Torquay, and Rev. A. Webster, of Glasgow, for distribution at open air services. Books have been sent also to inquirers at Sierra Leone, and in Canada, to Ontario and to St. John's College, Winnipeg, Manitoba.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. SHAEN proposed the following resolution, which was seconded by Mr. CLARKE and carried unanimously, "That it is desirable to amend Rules 10 and 19 so as to provide that all nominations for membership of the Council shall be made in time to be laid before the Council at its last meeting, and that the Committee be requested to report thereon to the next meeting of the Council."

THE AMERICAN NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

On the motion of Mr. PRESTON, seconded by the Rev. W. H. CHANNING, it was resolved unanimously that the Council is gratified to learn that three of its members, Dr. W. B. CARPENTER, the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS and the Rev. A. CHALMERS, are about to visit the United States, and will be present at the meeting of the American National Conference of the Unitarian and other Christian Churches in Saratoga in September next, and hereby request them to express to the Conference as representatives of the Association its cordial good wishes.

DR. DEWEY'S WORKS.

The Rev. T. L. MARSHALL moved, and the Rev. W. H. CHANNING seconded, "That the Executive Committee be instructed to open communications with the Committee of the American Association respecting a possible cheap reprint of the whole or a portion of the works of the late Orville Dewey, D.D., including unpublished works." After some remarks in support of the motion by Messrs. SPEARS, BOWIE, and WORTHINGTON, the motion was carried unanimously.

The dates of the next three Council meetings for the year were fixed as follows: October 25, January 17, and April 11.

The Secretary read a communication from the Rev. E. TURLAND, of Mossley, respecting the Unitarians or "Truthseekers" of Sweden, whose forthcoming meetings in September he purposed attending. On the motion of the Rev. J. WORTHINGTON, seconded by the Rev. R. SPEARS, it was agreed that a message of sympathy with the Swedish Unitarians be conveyed to them through Mr. TURLAND.

Mr. SPEARS after a brief explanatory statement of the movement initiated by the Committee of the London District Unitarian Society to form an evening congregation and Sunday-school at the General Baptist Chapel, Deptford, suggested that the question of providing a minister be referred to the Executive Committee. This was seconded by Mr. BOWIE, and carried.

The Rev. R. SHAEN drew attention to the large bequest of £5,000 to the Scottish Unitarian Association, and the favourable opportunity created thereby for renewed missionary effort. A discussion took place, in which the Revs. R. SPEARS, W. C. BOWIE, T. L. MARSHALL and Dr. CARPENTER took part, the latter gentleman giving an interesting account of the state of theological parties in Scotland, and stating that he looked with more hope to the progress of liberal views in the Established Church as indicated by "Scotch Sermons" than to the propagation of Unitarian views as such. The Scotch public is drifting away from Calvinism. Even in the Free Church and other communions there was remarkable progress of opinion. They were indisposed to revise the "standards," because they were afraid their congregations would throw them on one side and drift into unbelief. Mr. JEFFERY confirmed Dr. CARPENTER's views from his own personal experience as a lecturer in connection with Owenism in Scotland forty years ago, but was of opinion that the large class, especially of Scottish artisans who had given up all interest in the churches, presented an important field for Unitarian missionary effort. On the motion of the Rev. R. SHAEN, seconded by Mr. BOWIE, it was resolved:—"That the Executive Committee be instructed to consider the present position of Unitarianism in Scotland, with the view of promoting increased missionary action throughout the country."

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

Last week we gave an account of the business meeting of the Assembly, which met at Chelworth on Thursday, the 15th inst. We were obliged to postpone, however, the address delivered by the venerable president, the Rev. William Gaskell, M.A., which we now subjoin.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

The President said that one great object, he took it, of their annual assembly was to exchange brotherly sympathies and strengthen each other's hands for the high and holy work in which they were engaged. And good reason they had, it seemed to him, to bid one another to be of good courage and "bate not a jot of heart or hope," but steer right onward in the course they had been pursuing.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

A short time ago a Dampton lecturer who, treating of Unitarianism, spoke of it in a more candid spirit than was usually done, remarked that he believed it was generally acknowledged to be a fading body; and more recently a writer in one of the religious periodicals declared that as a sect they were evidently dying out. If those onlookers could have been present at the National Conference of Free Church in Liverpool he thought they would have felt constrained to admit that they had arrived at a somewhat false conclusion—(applause). It was undoubtedly the largest and most successful gathering of Liberal Christians ever held in the United Kingdom, and such as only a few years ago could not possibly have been obtained. The tone and spirit of the meeting on all three days was everything that could be desired, and well fitted to make them thank God and take courage. They incontestably showed that, so far from being in a state of decline, their churches were slowly but surely growing in strength, and preparing to exert a much greater influence on behalf of free thought and rational religion than they had ever exerted before. A subject of no little importance was brought under consideration by Mr. Rawson in his able and telling paper, showing the need which existed for a ministers' sustentation fund. A good beginning of this was made by a few generous laymen who were present, and there was every reason to hope that such a sum would be raised by the committee which was appointed as would afford means of lessening the cares and anxieties of a number of excellent men, whose inadequate salaries could not but to some extent interfere with the full and satisfactory discharge of their duties—(applause). Although a large portion of the subjects discussed were—perhaps necessarily so—like the one which he had just alluded to, of a denominational character, one gratifying feature of the conference was that there should have been an orthodox minister such as Mr. Wood, of Leicester, willing to take part in its proceedings. This was one indication among others of the change which was taking place in the feelings entertained towards them as Liberal Christians, and that they were coming to be no longer regarded as such desperate heretics as they had been. Another similar indication they had in the half yearly meetings of the Fraternal Union in Manchester, at which Independent and Baptist ministers, and heterodox ones like himself, who was appointed president, freely interchanged opinions upon subjects of theological and general interest. Such things as these surely might lead them to hope the time was not far distant when the odious assumptions of superiority in which religious professors had too generally indulged, as if they had a monopoly of the truth and the guardianship of the heavens, would cease, and all who called themselves Christ's should treat one another as fellow-labourers in the same vineyard, and rejoice in the success of each other's work—(applause).

DR. ALLON'S ADDRESS.

In October last, at the jubilee meeting of the Congregational Union in Manchester, Dr. Allon delivered an address on "The Church of the Future," in which he gave considerable attention to what he called rational theology; by which he evidently meant their (Unitarian) liberal faith. Several of the representations which Dr. Allon made of this serve to show how necessary it still was, notwithstanding all that they had done in this direction, to make known what their views really were and what was their position in the Christian world. Thus, for instance, in characterising this rationalistic theology, Dr. Allon said: "It wins only the suffrages of the speculative. Men who seek for working power in religious life turn away from it. The multitude, in their practical religious needs, almost instinctively recoil from its barren metaphysics. We never find the records in its history, 'The common people heard it gladly.' Intellectual power and acquirement are with it; oratory is with it. Why cannot it establish itself in permanent form? It has the anomalous and fatal defect of popular powerlessness, popular incongruity." If any refutation of this charge were needed, it would be sufficient to refer to their various working-class congregations, such as those of Miles Platting and Ardwick, which showed signs of true religious life, and which, having outgrown their present habitats, there was every reason to expect would, before next assembly, have been transferred to handsome and spacious churches, where they might carry on their work even more successfully than they had hitherto done—(applause).

SCHOOLS AND A CONFIRMATION SERVICE.

Whilst touching on building, he must not omit to mention, as a subject for congratulation, that since the last assembly excellent schools had been erected at Denton, Dukinfield, and Upper Brook-street, Manchester, and opened, he was happy to say, free from debt—(applause). It was greatly to be desired that their more educated and intellectual young men and women should take an active interest in the work of the Sunday-school, and make it what it ought to be, the porch of the Church. A Manchester clergyman a few days ago observed that "if they wanted to know the primary reason why so many of their scholars fell away in after years they would find it in the vague and indefinite teaching which prevails in too many of their Sunday-schools." The same, he (Mr. Gaskell) was inclined to think, might be said of most of their own schools too. He held that those of every denomination were justified in teaching what seemed to them Christian doctrines and principles. Churchmen were entitled to recommend the views and discipline of the Establishment; Wesleyans were justified in enforcing the tenets and practices of Methodism; and so in like manner he claimed for themselves the right to inculcate what they believed to be Christian truth and duty. From this not being done hundreds passed through their schools who never became in any way whatever attached to their churches. They were so afraid of indoctrinating them with sectarianism, that they left them without any definite views whatever, and in consequence they were easily drawn away from them by various influences into other religious connections. Feeling this nine years ago he ventured to suggest that it might be of advantage if they were to introduce into their churches something in the form of confirmation services for the young. It appeared to him that, without making it at all like a narrow creed, a short catechism might be drawn up, setting forth simply and clearly the leading points of their faith, which might be used in preparing the young for such a service as he had in view. Four years later—they always moved slowly—he had the pleasure of taking part at Park-lane in a service of the kind which he contemplated, to which he thought the sturdiest Nonconformist minister among them could not have objected. Last April he gladly acceded to Mr. Fox's request that he would again join with him in conducting a similar service, and most gratifying was it to learn how satisfactory were the results of that in which he had taken part five years before. At the National Conference a feeling was manifested in favour of such a service as he alluded to, and he could not but think that if it were generally adopted by their churches it would help in binding their young people to them, and bringing them to recognise their obligations as those who had pledged their allegiance to Christ.

CONGREGATIONAL CENSUS.

Five years ago he threw out a suggestion which still seemed to him worth considering; namely, that the societies connected with the Assembly should be induced, if possible, to send to it each year a short report of their position, of the state of their schools and other institutions, and what they were doing for the furtherance of the cause which they were formed to promote. He knew that the return of numbers might not be a just criterion of their spiritual condition, and that there were results which could not be tabulated in figures; but still such reports as he contemplated would afford some means of comparing the state of each society from year to year, and seeing wherein it had succeeded and wherein it had failed, and help in keeping it up to its proper work. It would be a means, too, he thought, of calling out a common interest in the wellbeing and well-doing of their scattered congregations, and giving to them more of that unity which they needed; it would also add, he was persuaded, no little to their support. He asked them, therefore, again to take the subject into their consideration.

THE PRESENT DUTY.

With regard to their position among the churches, he thought there could be no doubt in the mind of anyone who knew what was taking place in the religious world that the views they (the Unitarians) had long held were gaining ground in other bodies, that they exerted an influence quite out of proportion to their numerical strength. But this should not be a reason with them to do less for the promotion of those views, but an encouragement to do more. They had never yet done full justice to them—never yet had the courage of their convictions. Everywhere there were signs of dissatisfaction with the cold, hard, cruel creeds which were framed in days of monkish darkness. Many openly and more secretly were renouncing those creeds and sighing for a faith more simple and rational, more tender and loving, more honourable to God, and more in harmony with the nature which He had given them. Such a faith they (the Unitarians) believed they had to offer—one that deserved to be called Gospel, good news. Where was their Christian love if they were at no pains to make known their faith? There had been too much amongst them of what he once ventured to call a morbid dread of sectarianism—they had been scared by the word. Surely if they loved truth as they ought they must do their best to put error out of the way. If they had a faith which they considered important enough to separate them from other Christian communities, and to lead them to form district churches, there was a clear call upon them to communicate it to others. If they had a gospel which they held to be peculiarly conducive to human liberty, progress, and welfare, they failed in their duty if they did not seek to diffuse it as far and wide as they could. This they might do without any bitter sectarian spirit. They need not to be narrow because they were truthful. They might be jealous in the advocacy of their own faith, and at the same time respectful to that of others. He confessed he often felt at a loss to know in what way it was that members among them justified themselves for the utter want of interest which they displayed in efforts that were made for the promotion of what they held to be Christian truth. They believed that they possessed a purer faith than the majority of those around them, yet they never exerted themselves in any way to extend it. They knew the effect which Orthodoxy often had in burdening the minds of its professors with gloomy fears, and narrowing their sympathies and contracting their hearts; but they never moved one of their fingers to set them free from its influences. They knew that numbers, especially among the more intelligent artisans, were lost to Christianity and its elevating influences, from the unreasonable form in which it had been presented to them; yet they never did anything to set it before them in a form that would be more satisfactory to their minds and more winning to their hearts. It was not for him to judge such, but, he repeated, he wondered in what way they justified to themselves [their indifference. As it seemed to him, if they believed they had a truth of any importance it was at their option to give or to withhold it. If they had a light, they were not perforce to hide it under a bushel; if they had a talent they must not keep it laid up in a napkin. Oh, that all felt as they should the real nobleness of the work which was given them to do! How much more earnestly and zealously would they devote themselves to it! In other bodies, more especially in the Establishment, the laity were beginning to take a more active part in religious matters than they had ever done before; and greatly was it to be desired that the laymen of their own congregations would do the same. It was impossible to think that in these days, with the constant demand of every kind which were made upon him, a minister could do all that ought to be done in connection with them for the promotion of truth and righteousness. If he could it would not be well that he should. It was good for the spiritual life of everyone that he should share in this work—nay, the probability was that if he was not trying to extend his religion to others, it was dying out in himself. The Methodists in the earlier and better periods of their history set a good example in this respect—they acted on the principle, unquestionably a just one, that every member of a Church, be his place or position what it might, had some influence which he was bound to use for the spiritual benefit of others. The result was that their cause rapidly triumphed over the indifference and hostility of society, and they became a great religious power in the world. Why should not those who approved the broad and liberal views which they (Unitarians) held adopt the same course? Their work lay plainly before them, and he hoped the result of their assembling might be to make them gird themselves up for it afresh, and send every one of them, whether ministers or laymen, back to their several spheres of labour filled with a holier zeal to do what they could for the promotion of God's truth and the advancement of man's highest good. "Let our light so shine before men that they, seeing our good works, may be led with us to glorify our Father who is in heaven."

WESTERN UNITARIAN AND FREE CHRISTIAN UNION.

The annual meeting of the above Union was held at Trowbridge, in the Congregational Church, on Thursday, June 15. Among those present were the Revs. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., Bristol; F. W. Stanley, Bath; J. Davies, M.A., Bridport; W. Robinson, Crewkerne; H. Austin, Cirencester; the Treasurer, Mr. W. Butcher, Bristol; the Secretary, Mr. C. Jecks, Clevedon; John Worsley, Esq., Bristol; and others. The business meeting was held in the Congregational Church at 3 P.M., Mr. F. Brown in the chair. After a short prayer by the Rev. W. Robinson the Secretary was requested to read his report, which contained a statement of the position of several of the churches in the Union; after which the Treasurer presented his financial statement, which showed a balance in hand of £103 9s. 2d. It was then moved by John Worsley, Esq., and seconded by the Rev. J. Davies, that the reports as read be adopted, which was carried. The reappointment of the committee and officers of last year, with the addition of the names of the Rev. T. Hincks, B.A., F.R.S., of Clifton, and Mr. W. C. Watkins, of Bristol, was moved by Mr. H. E. Bunn and seconded by Mr. C. Burgess. This being carried, the Secretary moved the adoption of certain resolutions prepared by him under the sanction of the Committee, which was seconded by the Rev. F. W. Stanley, supported by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, and carried.

A general discussion then took place as to the best means of extending the action of the Union and obtaining an increase in the funds. The Rev. W. Robinson was of opinion that they should excite the interest of the young people in the work, urging the importance of small subscriptions. Mr. Jecks followed in a similar strain. The Rev. J. Davies urged the necessity of greater faithfulness on the part of Unitarians to their opinions. The Rev. H. Austin described the work of the Association and the position of Unitarians generally to the church and the world. He said that the Union was a missionary society, and desired to do missionary work.

The doings of the Salvation Army showed that the people needed religion, and it was most desirable for Unitarians to use every effort to bring the masses to a knowledge of their views and principles.

At five o'clock a tea meeting, which was well attended, was held in the school-room, the appearance of which was rendered unusually attractive by the manner in which it was decorated for the occasion. The tables were adorned with a splendid assortment of flowers, kindly provided by Messrs. Graham, Muspratt and others, the work of decoration being most ably and tastefully carried out by Mrs. Richmond, Messrs. Brown, Purnell, Norris, &c. In the evening a religious service, ably introduced by the Rev. F. W. Stanley, of Bath, was held in the Conigre Church, and an admirable and most effective sermon was preached by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford of Bristol. The meeting was altogether fairly well attended and of a most enjoyable character.

HOLBECK, NEAR LEEDS.

NEW UNITARIAN CHAPEL AND SCHOOLS.

On Saturday last the foundation-stones of a Unitarian Chapel, and of schools adjoining, were laid at Holbeck, Leeds. Some thirty-seven years ago a mission on Dr. Tuckerman's principle was commenced in that part of the borough. At first worship was held in a weaving-shed at the top of a high building at Holbeck Bridge, and a Sunday-school and night classes were conducted at the same place. By the aid of friends attending Mill Hill Chapel, Park-row, the congregation were enabled in 1852 to erect a new chapel and schools in Mann's-field, Holbeck. Ten years afterwards it was found necessary to enlarge the chapel. The schools were made a part of it, and a new school was built. At the close of another decade further accommodation for worship was required, and a gallery was then added to the chapel. Three new class-rooms were also provided, and the schoolroom was considerably enlarged. Up to 1878 those who formed the congregation were only occasionally visited by the missionary, but in consequence of the many other missionary agencies which had in the meantime been started in the district, and of the requirements of the congregation, it was then arranged that the management of both chapel and schools should be handed over to the latter, and that the missionary should become their minister. Up to 1862 almost every expense connected with the mission had been borne by the Mill-hill friends; but from then the Holbeck congregation, by degrees, took upon themselves the expenses, which have amounted to about £200 a year, and have for some years contributed £40 towards the minister's salary, in addition to defraying the cost of special efforts. It has for some time past been apparent that further changes were requisite. The chapel was uncomfortable, and had a not very attractive appearance; more school and class-room accommodation was needed; and it was the intention of the congregation to become entirely independent. After due consideration it was decided to convert the chapel, with certain additions, into a school and class-rooms, and to build a new chapel. This work is now in progress, and Saturday was fixed upon as the day for the performance of the ceremonies above mentioned. The cost of the new buildings is estimated at £4,000. The congregation, which is chiefly composed of working people, have promised to raise £2,000 of this amount during the next five years, and the friends at Mill-hill will contribute the remainder.

We understand there is to be a bazaar in November next to assist the Holbeck congregation in raising their moiety of the expense and paying for a piece of land they have been obliged to purchase at a cost somewhat over £300.

The buildings, when finished, will be very complete, comprising every requisite for the social and religious work connected with a modern church and schools. The church will provide accommodation for 500 persons, 400 of whom will be on the ground floor and 100 in the gallery at the end. It will also have spacious vestibule, vestry, and organ chamber. The school premises will include a schoolroom about 90ft. by 42ft., eight class-rooms of various sizes, and conveniences for preparing teas, &c. The design of the church and school is in the early decorated period of Gothic. Externally the principal features will be a double-arched entrance to both the church and schools, a group of two traceried windows in the front gable of the church, and a life-size statue of the famous Dr. Priestley, the discoverer of oxygen, and once minister of Mill-hill Chapel. The school portion of the premises internally will be very plain; but the church will be thoroughly ecclesiastical in its appearance. It will have a wide nave, separated by moulded stone arches from transepts and from a short chancel. The whole will be roofed over by a pitch-pine open-timbered roof. The buildings have been designed by Mr. J. W. Connon, F.R.I.B.A., of Leeds, who is carrying out the work in conjunction with Mr. C. F.

Wilkinson, also of Leeds. The contractors are Mr. Chas. Myers, mason; Mr. J. Hall Thorp, joiner; Mr. J. Lindley, plumber; Mr. James Season, slater; Mr. J. Ripley, plasterer; and Messrs. Jackson and Co., painters, all of Leeds.

The foundation stones were laid in the presence of a large number of spectators, including many of the members of the congregation and friends from Mill Hill. The ceremony in connection with the new chapel was performed by Mr. James Kitson. The proceedings, which were conducted by the minister, the Rev. Iden Payne, were commenced with the singing of a hymn, and by prayer offered by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., of Mill Hill Chapel. Mr. Payne then briefly addressed the Assembly. He expressed his gratification that the work had been begun, and his hope that it would be brought to a successful conclusion. He earnestly prayed that when the chapel was erected they might be enabled to build up within its walls a living church, full of holy aspiration and beneficent deeds, and worthy of the zeal and sacrifices of those who began the work as a domestic mission many years ago. He trusted it would remain a missionary church, and that as years went on it might, through the blessing of God, be more and more conducive to the welfare of His children, and so tend to His glory. He called upon Mr. Joseph Winpenny, one of the deacons, who, on behalf of the Chapel Committee, presented to Mr. Kitson a silver trowel and a beautiful mallet as mementoes of the ceremony about to be performed.

Mr. WINPENNY remarked that there was no doubt about the efficacy of Unitarianism; he had seen it displayed in life, and in the closing scenes of life. With reference to Mr. Kitson, he said he looked forward to a not very distant day when they would see him occupy a much higher position as a public man in the town than he did now. When that time arrived, he hoped Holbeck would be prepared to do its duty.

Mr. KITSON, having duly laid the stone, using for the purpose the trowel and mallet presented to him, said he was surprised when he was asked to perform the ceremony, because he felt that there were those who had been working in the cause from the foundation of the institution, and who were more entitled to the honour. He was proud to be entrusted with the duty, however. In the first place, his friend Mr. Joseph Lupton introduced him to public life when he (the speaker) was comparatively a boy, by making him the treasurer of the Holbeck Domestic Mission. That was the first public duty offered to him, and he took it with great pride. It was a good work, and in undertaking it he followed men like Mr. Lupton, who had laboured assiduously, and to whom some rest was due. He was glad to lay the stone for another reason. The old school there recalled scenes the memory of which was very dear to him; and he knew that those he loved would wish that work to continue and prosper. He would refer to Mr. Cliff, who was an earnest friend of that chapel and congregation, and who undoubtedly would have been there that day if it had pleased God to spare his life. As they were aware, the chapel and schools were the outcome of an anxious desire on the part of the congregation at Mill-hill to do something for their poorer and (at the time the mission was instituted) neglected brethren. Forty years ago, if one desired to see a lost and forlorn district, he was invited to come down to Holbeck. The sanitary condition of Holbeck had been materially improved through their domestic missionaries calling the attention of the authorities to it. As to the change in the condition of the people he need say nothing. One had only to look around in order to see that there were in that district the elements of an intelligent, industrious, self-supporting congregation. The success of the chapel had not been exclusively confined to its religious services. The active workers in connection with it had effected a great social improvement. By the evening classes and schools, and by weekly entertainments, the young people acquired an affection for and interest in the place which they would not have had had it been simply a Sunday meeting-place. The congregation was now putting forth an effort to make their church entirely self-supporting, and if they were successful, he believed they would have solved one of the great questions of the day—how to bring the working classes to public worship. He trusted that all the hopes cherished in regard to the chapel and schools would be abundantly realised.

The foundation-stone of the school was afterwards laid by Mr. Joseph Lupton, to whom a silver trowel and mallet were presented for the purpose by Mr. Joshua Dixon, one of the school superintendents. Mr. LUPTON, in his address to the assembly, pointed to the great utility of the schools in connection with the chapel, and said he anticipated that they would prove in the future, as they had done in the past, a blessing to the district. He believed that Sunday-school work was entering upon quite a new phase. The work formerly done in the way of teaching reading, writing, &c., was now done in the week-day schools, and it now became the duty of the Sunday-school to pay more attention to the distinctively religious education of the young. He urged upon those connected with that school to labour on in the spirit of Jesus Christ; to manifest that spirit in their own lives; so that by their example they might make the school a constant feeder to the church. He had great pleasure in taking part in the proceedings of that day. He had taken a lively interest in the cause at Holbeck from its very commencement. He had great reason to congratulate them on the progress they had already made, and he trusted, not only that the work that day commenced might be brought to a successful conclusion, but that with the new buildings the congregation might enter upon a much larger sphere of success and usefulness.

After the ceremony the company adjourned to Zion School, where about 250 sat down to tea; after which a public meeting was held under the presidency of the Rev. Iden Payne. After singing a hymn and a few introductory remarks by the Chairman, Mr. H. HECKERMAN proposed "That the thanks of this meeting be given to James Kitson, junr., Esq., J.P., and Joseph Lupton, Esq., J.P., for their kindness in laying the foundation stones this afternoon. This was seconded by Mr. SUNDERLAND, and carried with great enthusiasm.

Mr. KITSON and Mr. LUPTON replied with such thoughtful and stirring addresses as will long be remembered by those who had the privilege of listening to them. The Rev. C. HARGROVE, M.A., followed, and in an eloquent speech proposed a resolution congratulating the friends at Holbeck on the commencement of the great work that day, and expressing the hope that it would be brought to a successful termination. Mr. Alderman GARRB, heartily seconded the resolution. He was intimately connected with the mission in its earliest days, and his interest in the cause at Holbeck remained unabated.

Mr. JOSEPH DIXON replied on behalf of the Holbeck Congregation.

Mr. J. A. CONNON proposed, "That this meeting recognises the valuable assistance of the ladies connected with the sewing meeting at Holbeck, and learns with pleasure that the ladies of the Mill Hill Congregation are co-operating with them in preparing for the bazaar to be held in November next, and tenders to them its warmest thanks." In the course of his interesting speech he observed that he had a double interest in the work they had just begun. He had a great interest in the work they had just begun. He had a great interest in it as being the architect, and also as being a Unitarian. Referring to the statue of Dr. Priestley, with which the church is to be adorned, he spoke of the work done by that great and good man, both as a theologian and a philosopher, and he was glad that the new church and school would in a sense be considered a memorial of him. He suggested that the building should be called by some name which would serve to perpetuate his memory for future generations.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. J. SPENCE.

The Revs. E. W. HOPKINSON and M. S. DUNBAR, M.A., Messrs. JOSEPH CRAYEN and P. HALL also addressed the meeting, which, after the usual votes of thanks, was concluded by singing and prayer.

UNIVERSITY HALL.—We have much pleasure in announcing that Mr. Henry Foster Morley, M.A., B.Sc., son of Professor Henry Morley, has been appointed Dean of University Hall. This removes an objection raised at the recent meeting of the Trustees of Manchester New College, arising from the fact that Professor Morley could not pledge himself constantly to reside in the Hall.

THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD at their meeting on Thursday discussed at considerable length the question of the recovery of arrears of school fees. The Bye Laws Committee presented a scheme having reference to the question, which they recommended should be tried as an experiment in lieu of the existing scheme. The principal proposition in connection with the scheme was that no child should under any circumstances be refused admission or be turned out of school for non-payment of fees. By large majorities this and other motions arising out of the scheme were approved.

Correspondence.

THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—If Mr. Hadyn Williams has found help in the curious theories of C. C. Hennell and William Denton there may be others to whom they will bring welcome light, and one can have nothing but respect for Mr. Williams in his eagerness to serve the cause of truth.

But with regard to these two particular theories I must say that they appear to me only worthy to be placed in a museum along with other interesting products of a crude rationalism. I have sufficient interest in Joseph of Arimathea to be glad that it is not necessary to cast the slur on his character which Mr. Hennell's theory implies. It is a relief also not to be obliged to think that the belief of the disciples in their risen Master depended on any such doubtful transaction.

I should be sorry for this correspondence to close without some suggestion that there is another position quite tenable, besides those of Mr. Orr and Mr. Williams, a position which I think is perfectly reasonable, and justified both by the records of that time which have come down to us and the experience of our own life.

Mr. Williams says he felt convinced "that something had happened to account for the empty sepulchre." But is it so certain that the empty sepulchre is an historical fact? I am not aware that Paul, the earliest witness at first hand, mentions it. It is true that he says of Christ "that he was buried; and that he hath been raised on the third day according to the Scriptures, and that he appeared to Cephas," &c., but there is nothing to show that Paul regarded this appearance as in any way different from the later appearance to himself, which took place (if it must be harmonised with the later tradition) after the ascension into heaven. There is nothing to show either that Paul ever cared to ask, or that those about him knew, what became of the body of Jesus when it was taken down from the cross. The only record of the empty sepulchre is in the concluding chapters of the gospels, which by their very minuteness of detail and their contradictions combined are stamped as later legends.

It seems to me perfectly clear that it is not the fact (?) of the empty sepulchre that has to be accounted for, but, as Mr. Orr says in his letter, the fact of the belief in a risen Jesus. The belief in the risen body and all other material details, which must go along with it, would naturally follow among a people of vivid imagination, of unscientific habits of thought, eager to impress the minds of the unspiritual. So I should agree with Mr. Hopps that what became of the body of Jesus is a matter of no consequence, especially as we can know nothing whatever about it.

The real question then is, how the first revolution of feeling was effected in the disciples from despair to an assured confidence and triumphant hope, how they came to believe in the risen Christ.

It would be presumptuous to claim to give a complete answer to this question. And I am the less troubled by this incapacity, because, explained or unexplained, the belief stands as a fact, and our belief not only in the risen Christ, but in the life after death for all the sons of men rests on no single tradition of the past, but, if it is to be made the object of critical thought at all, on the right understanding of the constitution of our human nature, illuminated as it is by our faith in God.

I wish merely to indicate a few thoughts which appear to me to lead to the most satisfactory position in regard to this question.

And in the first place, those who dwell on the miracle of the Resurrection of Jesus as of such vital consequence in establishing our faith in the future life always appear to me to give far too little weight to the fact that Jesus himself believed in immortality, and often spoke to his disciples of the life after death. The belief in the other mansions of the Father's house was very real to him, and are we to suppose that he made no impression on his hearers? When he was no longer with them, would not these words of his come back to them in vivid memory and bring with them irresistible conviction of their truth?

If any of the near disciples stood by the cross and watched that mortal struggle, I cannot but think that in that hour, when the silence came and the agony was passed, their faith awaken in new power. It is the experience of very many that faith in the abiding life of the spirit is never so strong as by the death-bed of a dear friend. Then we understand what the life is, and how this silent form was only its habitation for a time. And so would not the disciples, remembering all their master had suffered, and seeing that now the world had done its worst, turn round with triumph to preach the gospel of the risen Lord. The poor body was broken on the cross, but the truth remained, the kingdom was to come, the master had gone, as he had told them, to the Father.

I cannot see that more is needed to account for the faith of the disciples. We do not know that there was any sudden paroxysm in their mental condition, such as would have to be accounted for by a material fact, like an empty grave where they knew a body had been laid, or the reappearance of the living body, which had expired on the cross. The fresh conviction may very well have come gradually like the dawning of new light, or the reawakening after sleep, and have been none the less strong and effective for that.

What the exact course of their experience was I do not think we shall ever be able to say, but it seems to me most probable that something of what I have indicated was present in their thought.

And then in the triumph of their faith, realising so vividly the fact that Jesus was not dead, it is no wonder that they had visions of Him in that form they had loved to look upon, and that they sometimes thought they heard Him speaking to them once more.

Then how easily would grow up the stories of the re-appearance, with all the minute details of the later legends added by degrees, and be accepted without offence the more readily from the state of thought at that time.

But these things I hold were the product of the initial faith, and not vice versa.

I ought to apologise for sending you so imperfect a representation of this view, but I was anxious that it should find some expression, and could not do better at the time.

D. HOFFMAN.

CONVALESCENT HOMES.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I ask you permission to invite the attention of your readers favourable to the promotion and maintenance of convalescent homes to the needs of those connected with our Spicer-street Domestic Mission. These were about the first of the kind when founded more than twenty-seven years ago, first at Stoke Newington, next at Hampstead; and they have been well maintained until recently, when, no doubt, similar homes have fairly won the sympathy and help of subscribers and donors, and have drawn to their support some portion of the funds previously supplied to maintain our Spicer-street enterprise. In common with the other branch of the Mission we have enjoyed the use of the cottages so kindly provided for our people and their children at Eastbourne. This very use, however, has drawn considerably on our funds, the railway expenses being heavy. It will surely add to the rest of the many who are about to take their long holiday in the country or abroad, if they will remember the many poor to whom a few weeks in the suburbs or at Eastbourne is an almost priceless boon. A few annual donations or subscriptions, in lieu of those lost to us by death or otherwise, would place my friend and successor, Mr. Pope, and myself in a position free from anxiety as to the funds needed efficiently to meet the annual expenditure. May I add that the people at Spicer-street have contributed annually their fair proportion to meet this expenditure, and not a few have borne the larger share of their own expenses.

CHARLES L. CORKRAN, Treasurer, 28,
Colvestone-crescent, E.

In November Mr. T. H. S. Escott will succeed Mr. John Morley as editor of the Fortnightly Review.

ROBERT ADAMS, OF ABERDEEN.—One of the veterans of Scotch Unitarianism has recently passed away, and will be greatly missed in that city, where he had laboured during a long and active life. Robert Adams, after an illness of nine or ten weeks, died on Tuesday, June 13. He had been connected with the Unitarian Church for about half a century, during which time he had been a steady and zealous supporter of our cause. He had frequently conducted the services when no one else could be found for the duty. His gentle and peaceful life has done much to soften religious animosity in the midst of Calvinism. At the time of his death he was chairman of the Church Committee. From his early years he took an active interest in public affairs. He was connected with the Chartist movement, and had some part in the drafting of an education Bill long before the scheme was adopted in Parliament. Recently he has been a steady supporter of the Liberal party, and was a familiar figure upon many a platform. He was also an earnest Temperance Reformer; for ten years being worthy chief of the Bon-Accord Lodge, and more recently a vice-president of the Aberdeen Temperance Society. He was a singularly kind man; always ready to assist others to the full extent of his power. His leisure hours were devoted to the poor and needy, and to those who were enslaved by drink. The funeral took place on Saturday, June 17, in the city churchyard. The Good Templars walked first, in procession, and the coach was followed by a large number of members of the Unitarian Church, and also by many members of the Temperance Society. At the churchyard there were many more assembled to say a last farewell to a good and noble man. On Sunday morning the Rev. George T. Walters delivered a memorial discourse in the Unitarian Church from the words, "Friend, go up higher" (Luke xiv. 10).

THE Prince of Wales on Saturday evening unveiled the bronze statue which has been erected at the south-east corner of the Royal Exchange in memory of Sir Rowland Hill. There were present the Lord Mayor and the Sheriffs, the Postmaster-General, and a numerous gathering of ladies and gentlemen.

Our Calendar.

SUNDAY, JUNE 25.

LONDON.

Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, at Little Portland-street Chapel, at 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M.
Rev. CHAS. VOYSEY, at Langham-hall, 43, Great Portland-street, 11.15 A.M.

TUESDAY.

Annual Public Examination of the Students of the University Home Missionary Board, at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, at 10 A.M.

WEDNESDAY.

Continuation of above.

THURSDAY.

Annual Meeting of the Missionary Conference at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, at 11 A.M.

FRIDAY.

Continuation of above.

* Notices of Sunday Services are inserted in this Calendar at 6d. a line, and of other Meetings and Service gratis, provided a detailed Advertisement appears.

SELECTED BOOKS.

Fawcett's (H.) Art in Everything, 2/6
Healy's (T. M.) Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, 8/6
Kemble's (Frances A.) Records of Later Life, 32/4
Laurie's (S. S.) Training of Teachers, and other Educational Papers, 7/6
Molesworth's (W. N.) History of the Church of England from 1660, 7/6
Newman's (F. W.) Libyan Vocabulary, 10/6
Samuelson's (J.) Roumania, Past and Present, 16/
Shorland's (B.) Maori Religion and Mythology, 3/
Trismegistus's (Hermes) Theological and Philosophical Works, trans., with Notes, by J. D. Chambers, 6/

MR. WALTER MAWER, Sunday School Association Office, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C., will supply any of the above-named new books and new editions, at the prices named, carriage free, on receipt of Post office Order, payable at the East Strand Post-office.

BIRTHS.

GLADSTONE.—On the 17th inst., at 35, Calthorpe-road, Edgbaston, the wife of T. W. Gladstone, of a daughter.

Printed by WOODFALL and KINDER, of Milford-lane, Strand
W.C.; and Published for the Proprietors by WALTER
MAWER, at the Offices of the SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London, W.C.—Saturday,
June 24. 1882

The Inquirer.

A Religious, Political, & Literary Newspaper, & Record of Reberent Free Thought.

[REGISTERED AT THE GENERAL POST-OFFICE AS A NEWSPAPER.]

No. 2088.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 1, 1882.

[PRICE 5D.]

CONTENTS.

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:—

A Visit to the Salvation Army ...	421
The Modern Mission of the Prophet ...	422
The Public Worship Problem ...	423
The Science of Ethics ...	425
American Correspondence ...	426

OCCASIONAL NOTES ...

REVIEWS:—

Christian Doctrine in the Light of New Testament Revision ...	428
Literary Notes ...	428

OUR CONTEMPORARIES ...

CORRESPONDENCE:—

Aggregate Meeting of the London Auxiliary Sunday Schools ...	429
English Unitarianism ...	429
The Design Argument ...	429
The Resurrection of Christ ...	429
Our Iceland Pastor ...	429

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE:—

University Hall ...	430
Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire ...	430
West Riding Unitarian Society ...	432
The Remonstrant Synod of Ulster ...	433
American Unitarian Association ...	434

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Subscribers, who prepay half-yearly, are respectfully reminded that their Subscriptions are now due, and that the same should be remitted to Mr. WALTER MAWER, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C.

A VISIT TO THE SALVATION ARMY.

On a recent Friday evening we found ourselves at Hampstead, not far from the large hall in the Vale of Health, which the Salvation Army now rent for their meetings, and we determined to see what an evening performance was like. The hour for commencing was eight o'clock, and the wintry weather had so far improved that it was a pleasant walking time, although a thin mist was lying like a delicate web on the lowest grassland, and the smoke of burning weeds on the allotment gardens hung about in white masses like cotton wool. Without some strong attraction few would have abandoned the Heath for a big dingy room, and it did not seem surprising that the proceedings began with a small audience. A few persons occupied a large raised platform. In front were a couple of dozen neatly-dressed girls sitting together, and scattered amongst the benches a few grown-up women of respectable appearance, and some boys. At short intervals hymns were sung to lively tunes, and books of the words, called "The Salvation Army's Songs," were on sale at a penny each. The War Cry and the Little Soldier were also purchasable at a halfpenny a piece. The affair did not look successful, but presently a loud tramp was heard, and the sounds of a marching tune. Up the stairs, and down the hall up to the platform, came Captain NEWTON and his troop, and after them a considerable crowd. Several hundreds were soon assembled, comprising steady-looking girls from the Hampstead shops, some working men of the rougher sort, but well behaved, and boys of a similar description. The Captain, who looked and spoke like a working man, gave out hymns, reading a verse at a time in a loud voice and with animated gesticulation. Between the verses he added short exhortations, only occupying a minute or two, and he stimulated the zeal of the leading singers and of the audience by vigorous movements of arms, legs, and body, in keeping with the time. It was quite a "free and easy"—a term which the Salvationists themselves employ—everybody sang as loud as he or she liked; beat time with the foot, or marked it with waving arms, and all vehemently declared they "loved Jesus," and would fight for him all their days. All the tunes were lively, with strongly-marked time, and melody of a catching sort, easy for everybody to sing. The Sultan Polka, played vigorously, will give those who may not know the popular music-hall songs a notion of the kind of thing that gave great delight. The object of the Captain and his lieutenants was to work the people up to rollicking jollity in favour of accepting Jesus's offer to save them from hell and give them crowns in heaven. After a good deal of merry singing, two young men started up and in succession delivered in a platform-speaking tone a couple of prayers of a simple character, everybody being at liberty to shout "amen" or "allelujah" as often as he pleased. At another time a young man read a chapter out of the New Testament, and the Captain gave frequent short addresses, accompanied with dramatic action, urging all to come and be saved. The performance was varied by a big, black-browed, burly workman getting up to declare that "he had been washed in the blood of the Lamb, and was now white as snow." He urged his hearers to undergo a similar cleaning, and, by way of parenthesis, informed them that after his washing he had "prayed the Lord to make him hate bacey, and the Lord did it for him at once."

The Salvation Army plan differs from other attempts to popularise the lower kinds of Evangelicism by its admixture of what seems genuine religious earnestness with great secular jollification. There was no appearance in the Hampstead gathering of anything like cant, and scarcely any moral exhortation, but a firm faith that good would be accomplished by energetic reiteration in prose and rhyme that God loves all men, and that Jesus died to save them from hell fire. Little use was made of the terrors of the orthodox mythology, but great stress was laid upon CHRIST's love, and the duty and pleasure of loving him in return. Allusions to going to heaven were sung with the rude vigour of

We are all going to Epping
To spend a happy day, which school children in vans have made familiar to all Londoners, and when the audience was most excited they can best be described as out on a religious spree. "Such horrid stuff is not religion at all," some of our readers may be in haste to say; but here arises the deep and difficult question of what religion is, what its lowest manifestations are like.

If, instead of visiting a Salvation Army gathering, a Calvinistic chapel, with a minister of fair education, had been entered, the manner would have been different, but the substance of the teaching the same. In such places the schemes of damnation and salvation are set forth with the mechanical precision that would be appropriate in explaining a steam-engine or a knife-cleaner, and even the better forms of Puritanism are destitute of that sense of spiritual mystery which constitutes the charm of a higher faith. MILTON himself failed in the effort to idealise it, and the grandeur of "Paradise Lost" appears only when he ceased to be doctrinal, and prompted Pope's sarcasm that he made "God the Father talk like school divine." When the prosaic treatment of orthodox dogma is carried a little further than what is common amongst the least cultured Evangelicals, all spiritual elements disappear. If the Salvation Army did nothing more than reach this consummation its enterprise would have failed as soon as it started. But it is now in its seventeenth year, and making rapid growth. It is thus worth studying as a by no means unimportant episode in English history.

It is quite clear that the condition of thought and feeling with regard to religion must vary enormously with different characters in different states of culture. The Salvationists say they intend to convert and reclaim "the blackguards" and roughs, and if they can succeed, even to a small extent, they will render a service to society, which would so far justify their means. They try to make what they consider religion as exciting and as amusing as the lower sorts of pothouse recreations are to the neglected classes. No organisation before theirs has attempted to make religion—we must use the phrase—sufficiently jolly to compete with worse kinds of excitation. If they acted chiefly upon the lowest classes they would probably be able to establish their claim to a balance of good as the result of their operations. Sometimes their audiences may be chiefly composed of persons not capable of being lifted up higher than their means permit. At Hampstead, on the occasion of our visit, there seemed few of whom this could be probably affirmed. The majority certainly ought to be trained to something better, and would find any possibility of arriving at a spiritual conception of religion hindered, if not totally destroyed, by frequenting the well-meant but rowdy sort of services. What must, however, be admitted was that the whole audience took the thing as the Captain and his assistants meant it. Although they sang music-hall tunes in a right merry way, they all looked earnest, and without the slightest trace of the frivolity, or fun, which the same tunes would have excited with the music-hall words and surroundings. There was an air of serious purpose combined with the jollification, and what would seem burlesque to the more cultured was quite otherwise to them.

The most obviously objectionable part of the teaching is the prominence given to the doctrines of instantaneous conversion and getting saved. It is disgusting to find little children taught to boast that at a certain hour and minute the Devil left them; CHRIST washed them in his blood, and so forth. Still, the absurdities and defects of the movement are not the whole of it, and as it is in vigorous action all over the country its actual results should be carefully watched.

The War Cry which we purchased contained an announcement of "The Biggest all Night of Prayer," to come off at the National Congress Hall last Thursday. The admission was to be by penny tickets; "no looker on or otherwise disorderly person" was to be present. At 11.30 P.M. the doors were to be closed, and no one permitted to enter or go out until 4.30 on Friday morning. "No report of this meeting to be sent to any newspaper without our permission." So ended the advertisement. Our readers can, perhaps, imagine what this night of "pious orgies" was like.

THE MODERN MISSION OF THE PROPHET.

TIME was when religious people regarded the ancient prophets of Israel as men preternaturally gifted with a knowledge of future events, and their "thus saith the Lord" was supposed to be the seal and stamp of a supernatural communication. The exercise, however, of mature thought and critical inquiry has shown, at least the more reflective portion of the religious world, that the prophet was not a sort of divinely-commissioned soothsayer, but a man who stood forth from amidst the prevailing sins and follies of his age to announce such truths as had forcibly impressed themselves upon his own soul. Now, it follows from this new and more reasonable view of the ancient prophetic office that the seer or prophet is not of one age merely but of all ages; not the special product of one people, but at least the possible teacher of great truths in all nations. His message is not some truth of local and circumscribed application, addressed merely to ancient Israel, but truth of a universal kind—truth that is adapted for the needs of the human heart in all the possible conditions of life. It is not the abnormal but the normal, not the local or the limited, but the illimitable and the universal which constitutes the prophet's message wherever he has spoken in the name of the Lord.

PILATE jestingly asked, What is truth? as BACON remarks, and would not stay for an answer. Many have asked the same question, if not in as frivolous yet in as unphilosophical a manner; and in not a few cases they have framed an answer in accordance with their own theories and opinions. Putting aside any attempt at definition, in an exhaustive sense, truth may certainly be spoken of as the most vital food of humanity. It is for the lack of it that nations have decayed, civilisations perished, and individuals been brought to moral ruin. Truth of the kind the prophet has to communicate is not this, that, or the other relation of one or more of the forces or nature, like the law of gravitation or that of organic evolution. It is not physical nor is it metaphysical; it is neither biological nor chemical; neither mechanical nor mathematical. No; but it is the relation of the soul itself to the principles which condition and nourish spiritual existence; it is neither more nor less than the harmonious adaptation of human life to its pre-ordained divine conditions. Truth of this order is the very breath of moral being, and, just as a physical organism decays when insufficiently nourished, and as life itself departs when a poisonous atmosphere enters into the circulation, so the soul grows feeble when moral truth is ignored, and dies not only to high and holy effort, but to justice and love, when it tries to sustain itself upon sophistry and lies. For man cannot truly live apart from the principles which find an eternal response in the depths of his nature.

Now it need hardly be said that this moral, this human, this universal order of truth is often wholly overlooked. Men speak of physical discoveries, logical inductions, and mathematical relations as if these were not only the highest but also the only truths. That there are certain truths that lie behind all our actions, either as violated or acted upon, and beneath all our systems which endure, and thus serve the place of moral axioms, is entirely forgotten, and in some cases denied. And yet the pages of universal history as well as the experience of every brave and living soul assuredly teach that there are direct, primordial truths which are independent of demonstration and incapable of speculative analysis. It is abundantly evident also that truth of an ethical or spiritual kind does not depend upon the progress of the intellect or upon the nature and extent of the discoveries made by the scientist. Virtue is not a question of theory; it is a question of moral life. The youth, for instance, who toils early and late and subjects himself to personal privation in order to support a sick or aged mother, though it be in a dingy court or a tumble-down hovel, is living a moral truth which the greatest philosopher, with all his knowledge of ethical principles, may be far enough from embodying in his own experience. HOMER sang of the highest domestic and social virtues ages before SOCRATES came to enforce them; and the glory of Roman virtue had departed when CICERO wrote his treatise on individual and civil duties. Nor was it otherwise with ancient Israel. The high moral tone which had inspired the people at the time of the judges and culminated in the glory of SOLOMON had declined when the prophets arose to speak in the name of the Lord for the enforcement of the principles of eternal righteousness.

It is clear, therefore, that the world needs teachers other than those whose work it is to communicate knowledge. It requires those who possess the spiritual insight to see and feel the power of the human and universal truths we have just referred to and those who are brave enough to say what they think and feel. Here, then, is the work of the prophet who is a great factor in the moral progress of the world, and one of the sustaining and purifying forces of the best life of society. His fellows may denounce him for the very light he sheds on their path, and they often do this. For when men require the voice of the prophet they always love darkness rather than light, as they did in Jerusalem eighteen and a half centuries ago. Still, the genuine prophet, either of ancient or of modern days, is possessed of truths which he knows from experience are able to save a multitude of other souls, not in their dogmatic but in their practical acceptance, and he feels he must proclaim them though this may result in persecution or obloquy, though it may lead even to the dungeon or the cross. Such were the prophets of ancient Israel who sought to avert the national ruin which was too surely approaching as the result of national sins and follies; such was the Prophet of Nazareth who in the divine order of the world was sent to proclaim the principle of moral love, the duty of forgiveness, and the true nature of religion, at a time when the best life of his own race was gone, and when the instinctive pride and haughty ambition of Imperial Rome had crushed the life out of many nations; such, too, was LUTHER, whose mission was to proclaim the inherent rights of reason and conscience at a time when a corrupt Catholicism had enslaved the one and was stifling the other. Nor was ROUSSEAU, in spite of much personal vanity and weakness, other than a prophet of the same genuine stamp, whose eloquent voice was required to protest against the abuse of the feudal and aristocratic principle in his age and country, and to bring men back to the simplicity of nature and a sense of equality. No one who has reflected upon the origin and influence of the French Revolution at the close of last century can doubt the truth of this last statement.

But, coming to our own age and race, may we not speak of EMERSON and CARLYLE, and, in a great measure, of RUSKIN, as modern prophets? Their mission has been a divine one; their common purpose has been to bring society back to the great and soul-sustaining principles of life. They have not proclaimed speculative truths like STUART MILL or HERBERT SPENCER, and they have not made great discoveries or pushed forward the car of physical truth like DARWIN, FARADAY, HUXLEY, TYNDALL, or LYELL. No; but they have, each in his own way, sought to enforce those great practical truths upon which men live, both as individuals and as nations. It has not been the establishment of a system of thought but the spread of universal truth and the irradiation of the divine light felt within themselves for which they have lived and laboured among us. The apostle represents a special cause and advocates some particular remedy for the woes and evils of society, and if he is a man of little knowledge, narrow charity, and a blind pertinacity of purpose, he is liable to be despised as a mere fanatic. Mr. MATTHEW ARNOLD, "the apostle of sweetness and light," is one of the best modern representatives of this order of the world's workers. Not of that class, however, either in its higher or its lower manifestations, were the men to whom we have alluded. They have been prophets proclaiming in the wilderness of the modern world the broadest and most universal truths, and not the apostles of a single system, special to each or common to them all. EMERSON, for instance, had no system of philosophy in the proper sense of that word; he was simply a great man, possessed of marvellous spiritual insight and power, who spent his life in giving utterance to the truth that was glowing in his own soul, with the firm and inspiring belief that it would kindle a regenerating flame in other hearts and lives. And though there are those who have lost faith in the life and work of CARLYLE, just of late, his influence for good upon his age cannot be denied. It may be well to recall here the estimate EMERSON formed of that influence as shown by some of the letters in Mr. ALEXANDER IRELAND's recently-published "In Memoriam" of the sage of Concord. "I find as ever in your books," he writes to CARLYLE, "that one man has deserved well of mankind for restoring the scholar's profession to its highest use and dignity. . . . I found joy and pride in it (a volume of the History of Friedrich), and discovered a golden chain of continuity not often seen in the works of men, apprising me that one good head and great heart remained in England immovable—superior to his own eccentricities and perversities—nay, wearing these, I can well believe, as a jaunty coat or a red cockade to defy or mislead idlers, for the better securing his own peace and the very ends which the idlers fancy he resists. England's lease of power is good during his day."

Now, making all allowance for the warm feelings of friendship here, no one can fail to see in it a prophet's recognition of a prophet. It is like revealed to like—the highest if not the only form of revelation. Nor is it less clear that one of the truest characteristics of the prophet is that he should remain immovable, firmly stationed upon the rock of eternal justice and truth, no matter whether he wields the pen or the sword, as did the great Italian who has just passed away, and whose life's work was to a large extent that of the prophet. So far as the modern mission of the prophet is concerned, we live in days when men do not make golden calves and set them up to worship as graven images. To-day they do not trouble to shape their gold into the form of a god; but they worship it none the less fervently on that account, and one of the great functions of the prophet in this our money-making, money-loving England is to show men there is something better than gold or anything it can purchase. Many among us need to be told, too, that though they call themselves Christians their crushing class prejudices are at antipodes to Christianity. Who but the faithful prophet can teach this truth in a way that shall command the attention of the numberless un-CHRIST like Christians of the day? Then, again, in the spread of luxury and in the blind tendency towards a mere material civilisation, which is widely prevalent and which men like the Bishop of Manchester have again and again condemned, there is work for a mightier prophet than has yet appeared in this century. Yes, and there are not a few who in the midst of much intellectual activity, and with the flood-tide of outward prosperity, are, nevertheless, spiritually "sick unto death." The spirit of the world has in their case banished the spirit of God; or a superficial knowledge of modern science and thought has darkened their souls with the shadow of God-less isolation. Such men need the inspiring voice of the prophet to remind them of the abiding reality and power of spiritual things and of the inner glory of being which shines forth so resplendently for those whose eyes are pure enough to behold it.

THE Society for the Promotion of Hellenic Studies has given its support to a proposal to reproduce by photography the celebrated Lauretitan Codex of Sophocles at Florence. It is hoped to obtain one hundred subscribers, among private individuals and public libraries, at £6 each.

THE PUBLIC WORSHIP PROBLEM.

[The following paper was read at the Missionary Conference, Memorial Hall, Manchester, June 30, 1882, by the Rev. Henry Woods Parris, of Norwich.]

When we have gone round and round the walls of our little Zion, and noted, with more or less complacency, the strength of our theological bulwarks, and the beauty of the thought palaces we and our fore-elders have built for reverence to dwell in, we are still apt to fall into a mood of despondency, and half suspect that our denominational life is not worth living, because the count of heads at our ordinary assemblies for worship is so small. The comforting suggestion that we have a clear advantage over other churches in the matter of quality hardly reconciles us to our lot; for, in the first place, that is not always so obvious as easy-going optimists amongst us assume; and, in the second, we are made increasingly aware, by the strenuous drift of cultured thought and sentiment in the direction of our religious philosophy (as set forth by our great thinkers and writers), that we ought to be found worthy to guide the Christian consciousness of our time into quiet resting-places, and to exhibit a model of worshipful association, more really and more widely than we do. It is hardly to be denied that we fail as conspicuously as our orthodox rivals in attaching the more intelligent and independent class to our congregations, and in making provision for their harmonious spiritual development. It is better to face this fact boldly than to hide it up with care, especially as doleful scribes parade it now and then, and it becomes an occasion of stumbling to weak brethren.

Now, what do small congregations imply? Has any strange temptation happened to us? Who shall lay his finger on the weak places in our polity, and say, "Thou ailest here, and here?" Is there any balm in Gilead?

You will not charge me with more than ordinary Unitarian assurance if I venture to reopen this Pandora's box, trusting that hope may still be found nestling there. After all, we are practical men, engaged in a work of practical good. We can only help one another by strong, clear words, it seems; but great is the power of truthful speech. We are here for counsel; I do but indicate a few lines along which we may usefully discuss the situation.

We quite commonly meet with disappointed people—men and women who expected better things when they came amongst us. Then again, some of our leading workers who have been born and bred in the connection keep on telling us that the whole head is sick and the whole heart faint—until, at last, we half believe them to be right. A kind of morbid irritability seems to be spreading, and threatens to sunder those cordial relations upon which successful effort so largely depends. A calm survey of the facts with which we all—ministry and laity alike—have to reckon, would moderate feeling, and clear perception just where it is most apt to be clouded. Recrimination can only increase our difficulties; there is room for a charity as wide as the Master's, and for the wisdom that is "first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, without partiality, and without hypocrisy."

What are the elements of our "Public Worship Problem," then, which specially call for allowance or for emphasis—according as we are engaged in well-timed apology, or in plain speaking amongst ourselves with a view to remedial effort? Can we wisely and kindly touch our common trouble, and so help on in ever so small a degree the day of more life and fuller in our midst?

Unitarianism is not a brand-new product of nineteenth century thought and life. It is an inheritance, and not seldom a mortgaged one. It is a shoot from an old tree which has grown long and slowly like the Oxford elms and limes, in which M. Taine discerns an emblem of "that English good sense which has accomplished revolutions without committing ravages," and "to which it is owing that this alone amongst the nations is in the enjoyment not only of the present but of the past."

The initial circumstance, only too patent to the classes we most wish to reach and comprehend, is that many of our churches are stricken with age, and yet they do not exemplify that mystic charm which age at its best has for the hale and youthful. We are characteristically sharp upon orthodox decrepitude; do we at all adequately realise its depressing effect in our own circle?

Nearly half a century ago the now venerable John Hamilton Thom laid bare this fatal disability. "The reputation of our whole body suffers from a hereditary weakness. . . . Chapels have descended from a remote ancestry, with a constitution exhausted of all its vigour, neither warmed by the old spirit, nor sympathising with the new. . . . These languid societies have been taken for types by outside observers; they have also chilled ardent workers within. We have had to contend with the worst parts of the spirit of antiquity; its prejudices, its feebleness, its effeteness, without its venerableness. Without any living associations (for the historical ones cannot be expected to be popularly efficient) derived from the old faith, we have had the unrelieved burden of its disadvantages, its leanings, or rather bendings, to the past; its aversion to change; its cold-hearted moderation; its inability to find satisfaction anywhere; its grudging and sulky sympathy with the free, bold spirit of the new theology; its want of strong interest in anything; the absence of intensity in the religious life. . . . The nobler and more ardent spirit has often had to moderate itself down to the tameness that awakes no sympathy and stirs no faith, or it has struggled under a sense of opposition and cold discouragement."

That was a veritable diagnosis of the old Presbyterian case in 1838; alas! that it should describe so much of our trouble to-day. There is nothing for it but repeated challenge; so false and unworthy an ideal must not be allowed to pass. It is Laissez-faire in its most questionable shape. No vain thing is this protest; our very life moves us to bear no shrinking testimony against such travesties of our mission. When they descend to the tomb that awaits useless and moribund things, no far-seeing soul can feel surprise or regret. Doles of artificial sustenance cannot save them. Foolish virgins are they that will not go and buy oil for themselves. To discuss "the why and wherefore" of their failure to beget public interest and attract hearers and worshippers were surely a waste of time. The prophet who visits them can only cry in agony, "Can these dry bones live?" and his question returns upon him, for there is only One who knows.

Other communities there are, traditionally known as Unitarian, which have not sunk so low, but yet have no expansive energy left. Enforced isolation has exposed them to serious evils. They have grown self-sufficient. They cultivate separation as one of the fine arts. A hard and narrow provincialism characterises them; their affectation of superior wisdom repels inquirers; a fossilised procedure leaves them a prey to dullness. Should an unwonted tide of interest flow through the ancient portal the spirit of youth rejoices, work in church and school puts on a healthy complexion, a new kind of solemnity overspreads the worship, and the folk forget to slumber in the quaint old pews. A new birth seems to have happened. Now is the accepted time. . . . Will they know the day of their visitation?

After all, we have a considerable proportion of live churches. The average difficulty under which we labour in appealing to the general population is rather germane to our ultra-rational temper, I think, than to anything else. We plan out our services and missionary efforts as though we stood for "reason in religion" in the driest and most restricted sense. We say truly enough that certain dogmas are dead; then why should we hold adjourned inquests so perseveringly on their lifeless remains? The age needs to be won more and more to the positive method of search. The Oneness of Truth is our grand watchword, and if we are straitened it is in ourselves. Never had the disciple of the Spirit such a glorious opportunity to vindicate his faith! History comes freshly laden with contributions towards a satisfying religious philosophy. Science is making the hard material world diaphanous to our gaze; we walk nowadays in a crystal palace which makes wonder the truest wisdom, love and praise the most natural air for men and women to breathe. Our savants now condescend to talk in the vulgar tongue, and teach line upon line. Current literature distributes intellectual wealth very widely. Art is ceasing to be the heritage of a favoured few, and is slowly but surely refining the common taste. Even the successes of fanaticism are shorn of the more repulsive features they once wore, and may teach us that with adequate earnestness, and consecration of means to ends, results of greater magnitude and finer character than we have been wont to chronicle may very surely be ours.

What we have to see to above all else is that we do not repeat the great commonplace about our cause being bound up with progress, till it loses all meaning on our lips—like the parrot-cries of belief we criticise. Even freedom and progress, sacred as they are, may be idolised into pernicious catchwords of conservatism. When the heaven of bright thought and earnest feeling encounters a dead inert mass of habit there is risk of piteous failure, and the sting of disappointment is sharper because better than ordinary success seemed so near. If our churches are to be religious homes for—I will not say “the people,” but even for the inquiring section of the middle class, upper, and lower—Brahminism will have to disappear from amongst us, a true Christian democracy in which best and wisest serve as rulers and teachers will have to prevail, and the equal brotherhood of those who kneel together in the Great Father's presence be embodied in all worthy and useful forms. The bricks and mortar we inherit must be held visibly in trust for the aliens as well as for our own commonwealth of Israel; the religious and charitable funds we have in custody must be administered on the broadest principles,—or else the hardening contempt with which our Pharisaic selfishness will be viewed by the very class to whom our “gospel” makes its most effective abstract appeal will neutralise our congregational influence gradually but surely. “I thought Unitarians were above and beyond priggish exclusiveness,—that they went in for liberal and enlightened ideas,”—said a surprised acolyte to me one day. “Well, they do,” I pleaded, “but the old Adam still clings to them as he does to us all.” “Don't you think they had better moderate their claim to superior enlightenment?” said he; and just then I remembered that silence was golden!

The public worship problem can be most intelligently approached, I conceive, from this side. Not our pet heresies; not our theological sins of omission and commission; not our unadorned naturalness in the matter of creed; not even the seediness of our antique chapels, and our rather stately ways of tendering and accepting social attention; no, nor the unfathomableness of our learning and the consequent profundity of our reasoned thought in matters pertaining to religion,—not all these united constitute the main hindrance to our denominational advance. The spare appreciation of our services which we lament chiefly arises from the want of quick sympathy with needs which have been generated in these days of rapid mental and moral growth. A sentimental regard for whatever is customary gets itself honoured in “The Church” by law established; no effective rivalry is possible to us, if it were ethically defensible, on that line. “Why leave the cathedral or parish church to worship through equally obsolete forms, and in a more hum-drum manner, in old Presbyterian style?” The recent discussion about the duty of Agnostics (and remember how wide the application of this term is just now!) in the matter of church-going has at least shown that the elevating drift of a public service, and the spirit of devotion to the ideal which it fosters, count for more to pure but unsettled minds than studied correctness of definition where these are not to be had. Is it not your experience that the growing number of thinkers in all ranks but the lowest who shrink from giving names and attributes to the Eternal, while anxiously awaiting further light, will gravitate to any centre of high spiritual influence, but turn wearily away from dense atmospheres of association which retard their growth, and commit them to narrow ruts of conventional observance? And is not this just the correlative of that high eclectic spirit which rules in the intellectual sphere,—deep calling to deep in the pages of Carlyle and Ruskin, of Emerson and George Eliot; while the system-mongers, with their cut-and-dried methods of parcelling out the infinite, are discounted everywhere; even Herbert Spencer, the clearest-headed of them all, only sharpening his readers' hunger for real knowledge?

The problem, then, is not simply how to get men and women differently trained to venture into our chapels, but how to naturalise them amongst us. That done, they would attend our services about as often as would be good for them. It seems imperative that our ministry should be specially gifted, and prepared by experience as well as by the finest academical processes, for a thoughtful and sympathetic treatment of the questions that chiefly bear on life and conduct—on the evolution of character in the individual, in the family, and in society. Would God we were all prophets—“bards of the Holy Ghost,” skilled to touch the chords of sacred feeling, and range through the whole scale of aspiration, so that power from on high might rest upon the people and set their life in tune with the everlasting laws! Our mission would then stand in need of no vindication; there would be a shaking in our valley, and the Time-spirit would rejuvenate many out-worn things.

Certainly, we only share the common solicitude in regard to this problem of public worship. It seems that thirty per cent., or thereabouts, of the community, instead of double that proportion, habitually attend church or chapel. The “lapsed masses,” being interrogated, are apt to display amazing shrewdness and versatility in their account of the “reason why.” The Great Supper, so variously spread, served, and commended, still finds many pre-occupied hearts in town and country—still goes a-begging in vain to buyer and seller, bridegroom and politician. “Many men, many minds” (the cynic would add, “Many women, many fancies;” but I don't quote him as an authority). Some want spicier sermons, some more heaven-storming prayers, other some would be satisfied with easier seats and briefer times and more agreeable music. When other articles of the faith have been discredited, men and women hold on nobly to the one which good Dr. Watts formulated in words that have earned him the gratitude of three generations:—

“Religion never was designed
To make our pleasures less.”

Alas! all tastes cannot be simultaneously gratified; and yet there is a residuum of suggestive complaint in the talk about wearisome services, which may well move us all, preachers and professors of the religion of the divine man of Nazareth, to amend our ways, to cut out fresh channels for the spiritual forces, and to face the uttermost need of this striving and crying, slaving and sorrowing, yearning and repenting nineteenth century life of ours.

We can in no wise admit that overwhelming numbers and frequent attendances constitute the only decisive test of success in worship and ministry; for, indeed, in those respects the Figians compare very favourably with the best chapel-going folk in this country, though they only renounced “boiled missionary,” as it were, the other day. And still we must take shame to ourselves that, with so much to say that is worth the hearing, we cannot attract any fair proportion of the people who, if they do not all read the magazines and discuss Darwin, are fairly ready for a higher religious explanation of nature and life.

Let us suppose that generous provision has been made for the physical comfort of parson and hearers (and nowhere does the connection between bountiful sowing and bountiful reaping reveal itself more obviously and surely), and that a bright uplifting service of song occupies its rightful place in the worship; what further conditions are requisite for a true success?

Clearly, and almost by universal consent, we ministers become responsible for the result. And where no inhospitable neglect or jealous exclusiveness bars the approach of a timid public, the blame of failure to grow outwardly as well as inwardly must needs be borne by us with what meekness we can attain to. We have to shepherd the flock all the time, and much depends upon our efficiency; but it is, after all, as public teachers that we exercise our most potent and far-reaching influence. Every part of the service confesses its dependence upon us. The slovenly announcement of a hymn may mar a sensitive hearer's peace. We have to read so that the obsolete formal authority of the Book shall fade out of view, and its spiritual and moral significance come out into relief, like invisible writing when set in the sunlight. We have to make our fellow-worshippers feel that our religion is “the most mutable of all things,” because the most vital. The personal factor is supremely important, however, in prayer. If the hesitancy of self-conscious souls is to be overcome in our assemblies, if the dull and unimaginative are to be surprised into devotion; if communion with the Holiest is to be helped by “imperfect offices” which translate themselves through a more or less flexible and sympathetic voice, we must go very wisely and solemnly, and yet joyously and whole-heartedly, about our work. Inability to pray, I suspect, usually means inability to fall into the track of another's devotional expression; as inability to believe is nearly always discontent with current definitions. Less artifice and more art is a crying need in the churches all round. We curb the intensity of conviction, and assume a pulpit manner which sits more awkwardly on “the average preacher” amongst us than elsewhere. The freedom of our faith ought to be reflected in elastic methods of teaching. A stilted mode of delivery, or even an academical tone, prejudices many excellent sermons and prayers. Let us cultivate a holy horror of Dr. Dimsoul Darkman, and all his works and ways:—

“So learned, he can quite dispense,
With visions and intelligence;
He hath a creed, he hath a tongue,
He had a heart when he was young;
But—very melancholy fact!
'Tis like a bell which time hath crackt,
Which by this certain sign is known,
His speech is clatter without tone.”

Some of the grumblers in the press have evidently smarted under this penance. Pulpit-drill robs services of their spontaneity. Weariness of flesh and spirit are not conducive to grateful piety. The best we can say of some platitudinarian homilies is that they don't poison the spiritual life. They save souls after a negative fashion, like the pins in the little boy's essay. “Pins save many lives,” he wrote. “How?” asked the examiner. “Along o' the folks not swallowin' of 'em,” said he.

Perhaps it is inevitable that we should prefer the “dry-light” to study our modern questions in; yet “the religious sentiment roots itself in the emotional nature of man,” as our Tyndalls and Huxleys avow. “To yield this sentiment reasonable satisfaction is the problem of problems” they and we alike profess. How is it to be done?

If we are to disprove Mr. Gladstone's dictum that Unitarianism is “dry abstract, unattractive, without a way to the general heart,” it must be done by audible aspiration and preaching of a finer and stronger quality than ordinary. Well said Dr. Channing, “Human nature will never be satisfied with a system which does not awaken sentiment and emotion.” And again, “I wish to see among Unitarians a development of imagination and poetical enthusiasm, as well as of the rational and critical power.” This is the very cry of the Great Master, who asked the Father to send his comforting Spirit to vivify all things; and unless we win it, we shall still have to mourn the general neglect of our assemblies, and look with feelings akin to envy on the crowds that surge into certain tabernacles, or the Sunday pilgrims who carry their orisons to nature's shrine, while the lark sings at heaven's gate, and enjoy sermons not made with hands.

But have not some of our ministers solved this public worship problem? Hardly. What they have done is to confess the failure of our chapel machinery to do the larger work the time invites us to. Finding that the masses would not come to us, some of us have, with fair success, gone to the masses.

But I doubt our call to save the people in masses. Our strong point is our individualism, if only we can give as well as take—if we can respect the brother-soul in fustian, and share our privileges right heartily with those whose ears the time has opened. By all means let those of us who have the power address the crowd wherever we can—not alone on Sunday, but in the places of public concourse, from every friendly platform, as lovers of our fellow-men and helpers of every good cause. Those whose hearts we touch will follow us to the sanctuary of our highest love and thought.

What we want is to make these churches of ours centres of inspiration to the weary and heavy-laden, homes for the thoughtfully-religious who are self-exiled, places where the loftiest Christian ideal of family life may be cultivated, where the youth of our towns may learn to dare the climb which we are well assured leads to sun-lit peaks of duty, and life is most noble, and freshest airs combine with fairest prospects to turn being into joy.

Ah! how much depends upon our consecration and preparedness for service both varied and intense. Our churches are awfully dependent upon "a one man ministry." Never mind the causes now—the fact is stark and unavoidable. We think we have toiled anxiously, achieved somewhat, agonised to enter the strait gate of pastoral self-denial. But the future promises no relaxation of effort; rather does it call us to work more arduous and thorough, to aspiration more pure and ecstatic, to enthusiasm less flickering and liable to suffer from the damps of non-appreciation. A strange combination of society and solitude is this life of ours. We are to be students, men of affairs, teachers, writers, good company, and inspiring preachers, all in one. An artist, calling one day on Grisi, found her upon the sofa. She apologised for not rising to greet him. He praised her buoyancy and joyous abandon on the stage. "Ah!" said she, "I save myself for that. I store my strength all day that I may do my work excellently at night." We cannot so store ourselves for pulpit duty. Yet our various calls to action ought to widen our sympathies, to give point and pathos to our appeals, to enrich our experience, and so impart a perennial life and interest to our sermons. Only we must not allow our preternaturally active friends to rob us of our birthright of inward and outward calm; else we shall be shorn of our power. Our most discerning critics, after all, are they who challenge our chronic irritability.

"But we, brought forth and reared in hours
Of change, alarm, surprise—
What shelter to grow ripe is ours?
What leisure to grow wise?"

I weary you with these by no-means novel thoughts, but venture to conclude with two or three practical hints derived from my own experience. Make a real distinction between your morning and evening gatherings on Sunday. I rarely deviate myself from the settled order of enlarged family-worship and spiritual meditation on themes scripturally-suggested, at the former service—following, as that does, the instruction of Sunday-school and vestry-classes. At the later service I adopt a more flexible method (permissu superiorum), and embrace a wide range of topics. I read briefly from the Bible, but also introduce my hearers to great religious authors, whose words may fitly elucidate or illustrate the subject of discourse. It is worth the extra labour and preparation to fling spiritual force into a reading from some old mystic or church father, some puritan lecturer or modern transcendentalist—into Wordsworth's "Ode to Duty," Arnold's "Saint Brandan," Dinah Morris's sermon in "Adam Bede," Ruskin's "Mirror of the Soul," Tennyson's "Two Voices," or Whittier's "My Soul and I." Of course there are difficulties, but they are, it may be, chiefly in ourselves. To be profitable, this kind of ministry must be tenderly and truly undertaken.

Sunday-evening topics? They abound yet more and more. Skill in selection and treatment finds ample scope. I have more faith in orderly courses of studies than in fragmentary appeals to the public curiosity. The line between decorous dulness and sensationalism is hard to hit, but we are bound to hit it if the wanderers are to be attracted. Chiefly, the great moral and social questions of our time want to be touched with discernment and true sympathy. Unless we have a gospel of reconciliation to preach to high and low, wise and simple; one, too, with which our whole life and activity are in accord, we shall seem but as sounding brass and tinkling cymbal to our hearers. Our appeals must chime

"With the pulse of manly hearts,
With the voice of orators,
With the din of city arts,
With the cannonade of wars,
With the marches of the brave,
And prayers of might from martyrs' cave."

Some of us have found grand biographies the finest vehicle for moral appeal. Also, the great epochs of Christian history need to be freshly brought to view. The non-Christian faiths are getting their full share of attention among us now.

As to the mode of sermonising—we may, if specially gifted and trained, find extempore delivery a source of influence with the people—not otherwise. But it imposes extra labour in preparation; a mere flux of talk will not do. Our Brights and Gladstones have toiled long and terribly before they—even they—learned "to speak with authority, and not as the scribes."

I heard Cardinal Manning the other day. The mass moved me little—hardly did it seem to move him. But when he preached from the altar-steps—the thin voice and worn figure recalling W. H. Channing somewhat—I felt that power was abroad. As he pleaded the catholicity of his Church, and vindicated her perpetual functions for the guidance of states and families; while admitting sadly that other channels were filling, that secular forms of service were supplanting those which he deemed exclusively sacred; as he dilated (not, indeed, with Newman's genius, but with much lightly-worn knowledge and in chaste and yet forcible English) on the taking up of humanity into deity, and the development of heavenly graces through the discipline of common life, I felt newly-pledged to my high vocation as a preacher of the Liberal Faith. A new longing to doubt men's doubts away, and help them by pure and passionate speech, as well as by living the new life, to feel at home in God's great world like the children of His eternal love and care, stole over me; and I came away thanking heaven that I was as other men, that my heart was fashioned in the general mould, that it was not dead or callous to their claims; that a more virile faith than the Cardinal's was mine—a nobler catholicity, a more opulent life, a moral salubrity that Rome could not boast—that the dear child of God, long since outgrown his mediæval swaddling-clothes, stood in the midst of an innumerable host, beckoning me—even me—to co-operate with the Eternal Providence in the banishment of sin and sorrow, and the uprearing of the City of God.

For still the living loving word is mighty, and unclean lips may be touched to high issues with the purifying fire. What need we, indeed, save the faith, the zeal, the pure devotion that works the greater marvels of the world? Our ideals must be lifted higher yet. I know, you know, that Thoreau was right when he said, "If one advances confidently in the direction of his dreams, and endeavours to live the life he has imagined, he will meet with a success unexpected in common hours. . . . If you have built castles in the air, your work need not be lost; that is where they should be. Now put foundations under them." No! we are not straitened in God, nor in truth, nor in our history, nor in a present providence that rules us out of the victorious advance,—we are only straitened in ourselves.

"Day by day the labouring earth
Whirls on—glad mysteries of birth,
Sad death-throes, sorrow, mirth.

Youth's flower just bursting into bloom,
Wan age, a sun which sets in gloom,
The cradle, and the tomb;

These are around us—hope and fear,
Not fables, but alive and near,
Fresh smile and scarce-dried tear.

God is, Truth lives, and overhead!
Behold a visible glory spread;
Only the past is dead.

Awake, arise, for to the bold
The seeming desert comes to hold Blossoms of white and gold."

THE Council of the Royal Historical Society have elected the Rev. David Maginnis, of Stourbridge, as a Fellow of their society.

THE SCIENCE OF ETHICS.

In an early volume of the Nineteenth Century appeared a symposium on "Religion and Morality." That symposium, in which Dr. Martineau took part, abundantly confirmed our opinion that a perfect morality can exist side by side with a complete absence of that which commonly goes by the name of religion. Indeed, we have before expressed the conviction that the popular notions respecting the basis of morals belong to a class of beliefs which, as a class, are quickly becoming extinct. Yet ever and anon, as if to show the need of deeply-thought-out works like Mr. Leslie Stephen's new book, "The Science of Ethics," we read in religious and other newspapers that truth and straightforwardness do not mean the same to Christians as to other honest people; that it is not possible to live a good life without believing certain things which the writers themselves believe; and, in short, that absence of faith in what we know to be false, must inevitably result in immoral conduct. We can only deplore this benighted state of mind. We cannot hope to change it by reasoning with it. Like other phases of human thought, which, not yielding to controversy, waited for their quiet end in the slow educational advance of mankind, this one of which we speak must sooner or later obey the inevitable law, and the leaders of the van have already almost forgotten it.

It is interesting to watch these matters and to observe how things turn round. A while ago, and it was immoral in men not to regard moral obligations as imposed directly from an authority outside their own body social; now we look upon it as immoral, or at least not the highest morality, to frame our conduct with regard to the supposed consequences hereafter of obeying or disobeying somewhat, rather than with regard to what the best that is in us prompts us to do as right. From believing in moral law as imposed from without, rather than as arising from necessity from within the body social, to that higher and, as we think, worthier system of ethics which Mr. Leslie Stephen has elaborated, there are, of course, amongst men all gradations. We are sometimes told that such as continually listen to the voice of conscience and habitually act up to its dictates cannot go astray from a virtuous course. But this is only relatively true. To pretend to say that it is absolute is as much as to affirm that those people who honestly seek the proper solution of an intellectual problem—people whose sole desire is truth, invariably arrive at the right conclusion. As there are many stages of intellectual development, so there are of moral development. We ought no more to stigmatise a person as immoral whose moral perception does not prove to be quite as keen as our own, but whose conduct, nevertheless, is in agreement with such sense of right as he possesses, than we should be justified in regarding one as a lunatic because he does not agree with ourselves in some matter of mere intellectual opinion. Thus while some who unreservedly condemn the gambling transactions of the racecourse can follow the business of the Stock Exchange, perhaps from long habit, without the least compunction, some who would feel degraded by the speculation of the Exchange, unconsciously commit acts, say of literary unfairness, which startle others.

To return, however, to the assumption that without certain religious beliefs an upright life is difficult or impossible, we cannot but perceive in this position a deplorable Pharisaism. Not that we censure those who depend upon creed for so doing; we rather commiserate them for that. What we do find fault with is the sweeping condemnation these people do not hesitate to pass upon such as think they see a higher and better meaning in morality. We have often heard it said that the religion of these detractors is immoral. While not going quite so far as to say this ourselves, we certainly think it is not the highest morality.

The old ideas of right and wrong in human conduct, still so persistently held to by the uneducated masses of orthodox religions, and even urged spasmodically in quarters where they are curiously out of place with associated teachings, have no grounds to dignify them as hypotheses; they rest on bare statement. Further examination of the work before us will prove how strong an obligation we are under to give to the new teachings upon Ethical science a very careful consideration, for it may appear that we have here not simply the only explanation of the grounds and principles of human conduct which is worthy of being treated as a hypothesis, but on the whole a very satisfying and complete treatment of the subject, in every way consistent with the facts of evolution. M.

AMERICAN CORRESPONDENCE.

Boston, June 2, 1882.

Our anniversaries closed last evening with the Festival at Music Hall, but meetings of a devotional character were continued an hour every morning during the week. Death during the past year has made serious gaps in our ranks, both among distinguished laymen and ministers. This of course gave a more serious tone to our meetings. We also missed Messrs. Hale and Freeman Clarke, but in this case our loss was your gain. More of the younger men in consequence came to the front, and brought with them a fresh outlook. On Monday, by way of introduction, we had an elaborate paper from the Rev. M. J. Savage, on the "Scientific Method in Religion." Mr. Savage was at his best. By such contributions as this and others he is doing a very important work, and has a marked influence on a certain class of persons whom the ordinary preacher fails to reach. He believes that religious truth is capable of demonstration, and rests his faith on this scientific basis; thus his faith becomes to his mind knowledge.

As the younger men have come forward more this year, it may interest your readers to know of them. Professor Francis G. Peabody is one of our most promising. He is the son of the Rev. Dr. Ephraim Peabody, and, for his years, is one of the best prepared and ripest scholars we have. For a short time he was settled over our parish at Cambridge, but his health gave out, and, to the grief of his parishioners, he was obliged to resign; but, recruited by rest and travel, he now fills one of the professorships at Divinity School, Cambridge, and is eminently fitted for his place. His influence over the young men is of the very highest character. In him faith and reason so combine that we have a teacher who both knows and believes much. With the fullest appreciation of the importance of intellectual culture he joins that apprehension of spiritual truth which makes religion a living experience. He has that rare quality which enables him both to instruct and inspire young men.

A newer voice even than Mr. Peabody was that of the author of "Ecce Spiritus," a book which has made its place on its own merits. It first appeared as anonymous, but soon arrested attention. It has been reviewed in your columns. "Who is the author?" was the oft repeated question. Almost every young and promising man among our ministers had the credit of its authorship until the reporter of a Providence newspaper went mousing at Fall River and caught the secret, and thus the pastor of our Unitarian Church of that large factory town soon found his name in all the papers.

The Rev. Mr. Hornbrook is another of our rising young men. He was formerly a Methodist, but, seized by the modern spirit, he was borne on the current of progress and drifted into our fold. He is now minister over one of our most flourishing suburban parishes at Newton. A few weeks since the society dedicated a new church edifice, and has a very promising future under the ministrations of their young pastor.

Then there were those in the prime of life well known among our churches, but many of whose names are not so familiar in England. Mr. Batchelor needs no introduction to our English friends, because his sermons and speeches, especially his bright and exhaustive sketch of the origin and history of our National Conference, which he gave during his last year's visit, will be remembered by most of you. He made a good speech at the annual meeting of the American Unitarian Association. The Rev. George Thayer, who is now Secretary of the National Conference, was also among the speakers. He has just accepted a call to settle over the Unitarian Society at Cincinnati, much to the regret of his old parishioners at South Boston, where he has done a good work. He is a man of personal force and organising power, and will have a marked influence in the great Ohio valley. The Rev. Charles G. Ames is known in England as the late editor of the Christian Register. He is one of our most promising men, and in the best sense is growing. His name is fresh, and teems with suggestive thoughts. He is a man of the people, self-made, and every fibre of his being pulsates with human sympathies. He holds a first rank as a preacher, and is now engaged in the work of establishing a new church in Philadelphia, which promises to be a success.

Still many well-known voices were heard. The author of the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table" was greeted, when he rose to speak at the festival, by a storm of applause, such as must have been gratifying. It proved how deep a hold Dr. Holmes has on the hearts of the people. His portraiture of Emerson is one of the finest and best sketches among the long list of addresses called forth by the death of the "Concord Seer." But perhaps the best thing of the week was the address of the Rev. Dr. Hedge on Dr. Bellows. It had all the high intellectual merits which belong to his gifted mind. I hope it will be printed in full in your columns; so also the address of the Rev. Dr. Briggs on Dr. Dewey, as well as the one by the Rev. Dr. Morison. Both of these spoke from personal experience of the power of Dr. Dewey as a preacher. The Rev. Mr. Wilson, of Salem, read a charming paper before the Berry-street Conference. This, as most of your readers know, is associated with the history of Unitarianism. This year Mr. Wilson's address was in the nature of a reminiscence, in which we had a sketch of the various phases which have marked the struggles of the last forty years.

Among the novelties of popular interest was the appearance of a new man, Kristofer Jansen, the well-known Norwegian, who is now engaged in missionary work among his countrymen settled in the new states of the North-West. He has a fine spirit, and his noble consecration to the work in which he is engaged gives him the halo of moral heroism.

There are a few general thoughts suggested by the meetings. Though they lacked that fierce intensity which marked the period of the anti-slavery struggle and the great debate during the controversy as to the authority and inspiration of the Bible and the Miracles, it is still very clear that there is no danger from stagnation. Every cause has its champion, and every phase of opinion its advocate. The conviction was often expressed that we have conquered our position. When Mr. Emerson gave his address before the Divinity School in Cambridge, and Theodore Parker his famous South Boston ordination sermon, they were regarded as heretics even by conservative Unitarians. Now both are classed as members of the fold in full fellowship. Then, too, Unitarians were not recognised by others. Now even Emerson is spoken of in Evangelical pulpits as a Christian. The broader and deeper questions involving the very foundations of religion put into the shade the doctrines about the Trinity and Atonement. Whether God exists in a three-fold form is of little importance compared to the question whether there is any God. Hence the old theological doctrines fall away in the presence of deeper issues.

Moreover, the growth of the free spirit among the Orthodox is modifying opinions among them. The recent controversy about the choice of Professor Smythe at Andover is only one symptom of the prevailing disease. At the banquet of the Orthodox Congregationalists during anniversary week—a Baptist, Methodist, Episcopalian and Unitarian were the prominent speakers, and the drift of their thought was towards a deeper unity of the spirit. While they recognised the need and uses of denominations they all emphasised the worth of a more comprehensive fellowship. Governor Long, the President of the Unitarian Club, recently organised in Boston, was our representative at the Orthodox banquet. All this shows that sectarian lines are getting very elastic and now easily stretch.

Another fact which shows the strong droift of Liberalism is this. All the speakers at the evening meeting of the American Unitarian Association with a single exception were men who had been trained under other than Unitarian influences. Most of them had been ministers of other denominations. In fact, our Year-book shows that a very large proportion of the ministers of our Established Churches came to us from other pulpits; Savage, Carpenter, Dole, Robert Collyer, and a long list of our most prominent preachers are recruits from other folds.

The general tone of the meetings was in the same direction as your National Conference at Liverpool. The conviction was often expressed that while we could see the results of the past and could note progress our work was not done. New growth comes from the rising not the setting sun, therefore we must set our faces to the future and enter upon a broader and still nobler work. We must let the dead bury the dead, and go forth to establish on earth the kingdom of God—the reign of truth, righteousness and love as the basis of human society and personal life. S. W. B.

DR. DE PRESSENSÉ'S LECTURES.—On June 17, Dr. de Pressensé delivered, under the auspices of the Christian Evidence Society, his second lecture on "The Origin of Man," at Willis's Rooms, the Archbishop of Canterbury presiding.—The special division of the subject treated being "Man and the Animals," the lecturer began by saying that it was a tendency of the evolution schools to identify man and the animals. There were, he went on to remark, great resemblances between them, and we could not admit the absolute opposition contended for by Descartes; but the resemblances did not prevent essential differences. In the first place, the physiological resemblances between man and the animals left a great interval between them. Everything in the human body was so disposed as to render it the expression and the instrument of the mental life. Here the lecturer alluded to the sphere of beauty in connection with his theme. Secondly, he said, the indisputable correlation between physical life and spiritual life was not an equation. Thought was not measured by the weight of the brain; liberty of action was not summed up in motion. Thirdly, from the point of view of spiritual life the animals and man had in common that instinct which was not even admitted by the schools of materialism. Irrefragable proofs of the existence of instinct were supplied by zoology. The animal never went beyond instinctive life, although it could not be denied that there was combined with this a certain amount of intelligence, which was always dominated by sensation, and did not rise to conscious life. Conscious life was found in man through the will, which played a considerable part in his intellectual and his moral life. Animals did not rise above signs; man alone possessed language. In speaking on this point, the lecturer alluded to the origin of language and to its importance in connection with the intellectual and the moral life of man. Societies of animals were, he said, ruled and dominated by a life of pure sensation; man alone gave a free and moral character to society, as seen in the family, in the State, in humanity. The animal only required the satisfaction of the senses. Man was never satisfied; he wanted to get beyond the world—he was tormented with the ideal. The Archbishop of Canterbury said he thought the Christian Evidence Society deserved the gratitude of all present for having introduced M. de Pressensé to English audiences as the representative of French Protestantism, and at the same time the exponent of Christian views of modern science held by a man who had a thorough acquaintance with his subject, and who was determined not to give way to any false fears lest physical science should prove antagonistic to religion.

On Sunday a statue of Savonarola was unveiled before a large audience in the hall of the Five Hundred at Florence.

THROAT IRRITATION.—Soreness and dryness, tickling and irritation, inducing cough and affecting the voice. For these symptoms use Epps's Glycerine Jububes. Glycerine, in these agreeable confections, being in proximity to the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of sucking, becomes actively healing. Sold only in boxes, 7½d. and 1s. 1½d., labelled, "JAMES EPPS & CO., HOMOEOPATHIC CHEMISTS, LONDON." A letter received:—"Gentlemen.—It may, perhaps, interest you to know that, after an extended trial, I have found your Glycerine Jububes of considerable benefit (with or without medical treatment) in almost all forms of throat disease. They soften and clear the voice.—Yours faithfully, GORDON HOLMES, L.R.C.P.E., Senior Physician to the Municipal Throat and Ear Infirmary."

Our Contemporaries.

THE DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.

The Jewish Chronicle writes:—

The Bill for allowing Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister has come within sight of the goal of being passed by the obdurate House of Lords. It was defeated this time by only four votes, and it is tolerably certain that such a majority cannot last. We are glad to observe that less and less stress is being laid on the Biblical argument, which was once the main support of the opponents of the Bill. The Biblical argument, if it deserves that name, is founded on an utter misconception, and even this can only be reached by wresting the passage from the context. The Bible, in fact, implicitly allows such marriages, by declaring that a man shall not take his wife's sister in marriage during his wife's lifetime. The command would have been unconditional unless Holy Writ had intended to grant permission after the wife's death. The question is of some importance for Jews and Jewesses, since such marriages are distinctly legal according to Jewish law, and the offspring of any such alliances would be legitimate from a religious, and illegitimate from a legal point of view.

THE BISHOP OF MANCHESTER.

The Figaro, in a sketch of the Bishop, writes:—

What is the general verdict as to this bishop who dislikes a palace, who rarely enters the House of Lords, who is seldom a guest at a London dinner table, who works as hard as if his income had not been secured to him for life? Even among those whom he is least known there prevails the belief that Mr. Gladstone never did a better day's work than when he offered Dr. Fraser a seat on the episcopal bench. Whatever mistakes may have been attributed to the bishop, no one has called in question his energy, his ability, his sincerity. Those who are acquainted with the manner in which he discharges his duties can speak more positively. It has been intimated that his presence in a London pulpit is invariably hailed with pleasure, but his measure can only be accurately taken by the men and women among whom he lives, and for whom he labours. There are bigots who censure him because he will not allow Canon Knox Little to be prosecuted, and he has been calumniated because he perpetrated, as we think, the blunder of permitting the proceedings which led to the imprisonment of Mr. Green. But we venture to assert that the feeling in Manchester and in Lancashire is altogether one of pride in the Bishop of Cottonopolis. An eminent and distinguished scholar, a vigorous and original preacher, a steadfast champion of toleration and charity, a man of indomitable courage and independence, Dr. Fraser is yet more beloved by the poor and illiterate than by the wealthy and the learned of his diocese, and this not because he preaches politics. When he besought the residents of Belgravia to make themselves practically acquainted with the actual condition of the poor, he only asked them to emulate his own example. Whatever honours may, or may not, await him while he lives, his name will go down to posterity as that of a prelate who was never weary of seeking to advance the welfare of mankind.

WEST OF ENGLAND PRESBYTERIAN DIVINES.—The 227th annual assembly of this body took place at George's Meeting, Exeter, on Wednesday last. The religious service was conducted by the Revs. W. E. Mallone, of Devonport, and W. Sharman, of Plymouth, the latter preaching the sermon from Psalm xxxiii. 5. The usual business was then transacted, and the funds distributed; it was also resolved to petition Parliament in favour of the Oaths Bill. Mr. W. S. Mortimer was elected Treasurer in the room of his late father, and the following resolution was with much feeling passed unanimously:—"That this assembly desire to record their deep sense of their loss through the death of their esteemed and highly-honoured Treasurer, Mr. W. Mortimer, and their vivid and affectionate remembrance of his bright talents, his keen and noble enthusiasm, his warmth and generosity of heart, his devotion to their interests as an assembly, and his devotion to reason and freedom in religion, his refusal by word or deed to contradict the clear convictions of his mind." Some conversation arose as to the means to be used for rendering the assembly more useful in the future.

Correspondence.

THE AGGREGATE MEETING OF THE LONDON AUXILIARY SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—As many of our friends are making inquiries as to when these schools are to meet, and others are expressing much disappointment that, instead of gathering in one place as heretofore, the schools are this year to muster in three divisions, will you kindly permit me to say that the reasons which weighed with the committee in making this arrangement are, first, that none of our London chapels are large enough to hold event half the children that now attend the schools; and, second, that as there is still a possibility that summer may begin to set in and the sun commenced shining about the middle of July, the schools might in that case be glad to have a shorter march to the rendezvous.

The committee, after due consideration, have therefore fixed Sunday, July 16, at three o'clock in the afternoon, for a simultaneous gathering of the schools in three groups or centres. The northern schools will meet at Roslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead; the southern at Essex-street; and the eastern either at, or some hall near, College Chapel, Stepney-green.

Until sufficient accommodation for these and other large gatherings in connection with our Church life can be obtained, I fear we must forego the pleasure of witnessing another aggregate gathering of all our London schools, or even a respectable contingent of them, inspiring and successful as they have hitherto always been.

I. M. WADE.

ENGLISH UNITARIANISM.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—In the article on the Liverpool Conference, copied from the Index into the Inquirer of 17th inst., with which in the main I agree, there is one statement that seems to me to need some qualification. The writer, lamenting some supposed reactionary tendencies in English Unitarianism, says—"Mr. Conway stands alone, and, admirable as some of his writings are, they represent himself only." This is, I rejoice to know, far from being strictly correct. There are many of our ministers, and many more of our laity, who are in hearty sympathy with some of Mr. Conway's opinions, and are admirers of his writings, and of the free, reverent, and earnest spirit in which he carries on his isolated ministerial work. Many of these do not share his objection to the Christian name, and regret that this conscientious objection on his part prevents his being more closely identified with the Unitarian body; but, notwithstanding this nominal obstacle, Mr. Conway has on several occasions occupied our pulpits, and within the last few months has conducted the services in at least two Unitarian chapels, and would, as I happen to know, be warmly welcomed in others did his engagements permit him more frequently to accept the invitations of our ministers and congregations. On several occasions also eminent Unitarian and other Dissenting ministers have supplied for Mr. Conway at South-place; and these facts combine to show that he does not "stand alone," as the writer in the Index supposes, but is regarded with respect and esteem, and desired as a friend and fellow-worker, by many Unitarians, as well as by other liberal thinkers in all parts of the country, who, in common with us, recognise in South-place Chapel a congenial home of rational and reverent religion, and in its minister a worthy successor of that distinguished and eloquent Unitarian—William Johnson Fox.

Preston, June 25.

G. B. DALBY.

THE DESIGN ARGUMENT.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Your review of my lecture on "The Design Argument Vindicated" will give great satisfaction to the Atheists of Birmingham, to whom the lecture was originally delivered. It might have been written by their own chief. It is, however, on the face of it, written by an Agnostic who, of course, could not think any theistic argument sound. May I suggest that if it is impossible to find a reviewer whose mind is unbiassed on these questions, the fair method would be to insert two notices, from reviewers who take opposite sides; either that, or else allow me to reply to my critic. If the Inquirer is henceforth to be the organ of Agnosticism, this suggestion will not commend itself to you; but in that case we shall know that the Inquirer condemns all Theistic arguments beforehand, just as the National Reformer does.

Birmingham.

GEORGE ST. CLAIR.

[Mr. St. Clair is entirely mistaken. The Inquirer does not accept the Agnostic position. Our reviewer simply showed the weakness of Mr. St. Clair's particular presentation of the Design argument.—Ed. of Inq.]

THE RESURRECTION OF CHRIST.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—In reply to numerous inquiries, will you be so obliging as to allow me to state in your columns that the tract I have had printed, containing the rational views of Hennell and of Denton on the disappearance of the body of Jesus and the origin of the dogma of his resurrection, I can supply at the cost price of sevenpence per dozen, including postage? Single copies I send free to any address.

The view advocated in the letter signed "D. Hoffman," in your last issue, is burdened with the necessity of attributing a fraudulent conspiracy to a considerable number of men and women, who repeatedly asseverated that they had seen the empty tomb, and that some of their number had touched and felt the risen Jesus; whereas the views of Hennell and of Denton merely suppose a stratagem, executed by two or three persons only, the manager of the business being the man who obtained the body of Jesus for interment, and who, with his assistants, appears to have maintained the most perfect reticence on the matter. I will not undertake to say which of these views may be most appropriately described as "crude rationalism," nor can I see the necessity of shielding the character of Joseph of Arimathea (who, so far as we know, said nothing on the subject) at the expense of stigmatising a large number of persons who said a good deal about it, and acted as perfectly honest men and women would.

As the result of my first letter to you on this matter I have had some very interesting private correspondence, and have formed one very valuable friendship; but, on the other hand, I have had to bear the consequences of "wearing my heart upon my sleeve for daws to peck at." My experience of many very "evangelical" people, during the fifteen years of my ministerial labours, has been that, in their zeal for their favourite dogmas, they can be very disingenuous, can easily forget the common amenities of friendly controversy, and can jibe and scold when they cannot reason. This is very much to be regretted.

F. HAYDN WILLIAMS.

33, Park-road, Blackpool, June 26.

[This correspondence is now closed. Ed. of Inq.]

OUR ICELAND PASTOR.

TO THE EDITOR.

Annexed is an extract of a letter to hand yesterday from the faithful pastor in far-off Iceland, Matthew Jochumsson. It cannot fail to be of interest to our many readers, who will, I am sure, be glad to extend a hearty welcome to him on his arrival in England.

Liverpool, June 19.

GEO. EYRE EVANS.

Oddi, near Mount Hecla, Iceland,
May 24, 1882.

My hearty congratulations regarding the noble Sunday-school works, the most beneficial and Christ-like work next after preaching of the pure Gospel executed by the modern world. As I hope to visit your great country in the next coming July, I postpone now to give you here any description of my poor endeavours in spreading the views and principles of Dr. Channing and other great men of your noble denomination. I am, however, sorry to say that here with us there neither are nor can be established any Sunday-schools, with exception in a few places, owing simply to the long distances between the farms, and also to our rough climate.

But we are labouring with all all might in erecting such schools and institutions that are practicable to our people, schools giving information in writing, calculating, geography, history, and little physics, &c.; these rising miniature institutions are all from the latest years (since we got our Home Rule in 1874), and most of them are very poor as yet, although some ten, or about the half of them, get some grant from our Government; besides, most of them are as yet to be termed as children schools. Two schools for girls are also recently established. Of colleges or latin schools Iceland has but one, with seven or eight professors and about one hundred scholars. As to Church matters we vegetate by an old exhausted Orthodoxy, and as to morals traditional and very imperfect Christian conventionalism is the chief rule and guide to our people in general. We hope, however, much good, much progress from the political, and even industrial and social change caused by the Home Rule.

You will, perhaps, notice in the chief papers of London and Liverpool a descriptive letter I send for publication, giving news of the great storm which has recently destroyed a great portion of the Hecla district. And that misery is the motive of my intended going to England. I have written of the disaster to my best friends abroad and hope for some subscription, especially if I succeed in making my personal appearance.

MATTHEW JOCHUMSSON.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY BOARD.—The public examination in connection with the Unitarian Home Missionary Board was completed on Wednesday at the Memorial Hall. The subjects of examination were senior Greek, ethics, rhetoric, and grammar, the work of the ministry, lessons on health, Roman history, and theology. At five o'clock the Rev. W. Gaskell, the principal, took the chair, and stated that Mr. W. G. Tarrant, Tate scholar, and Mr. W. J. Davies, Gaskell scholar, matriculated at the London University, June, 1881; and Mr. Felix Taylor and Mr. E. H. L. Thomas matriculated January, 1882, all in the first division. In December, 1881, Mr. J. E. Stronge matriculated at the Royal University of Ireland. The Gaskell Scholarship had been obtained by Mr. S. S. Brettell, and the Owens Scholarship by Mr. J. C. Pollard. Mr. F. Taylor obtained the political economy prize and the Cobden Prize at Owens College; and Mr. Thomas was bracketed with Mr. Schneider, a German, for the German prize in the higher senior German class. Mr. Davies, the retiring Gaskell scholar, in the examinations at Owens College secured the second place in the first class in the lower French, and the fourth place in the second class in mathematics. He was sure they were all pleased with this report of the distinction gained by present or former students. During the session the students had done their work well. The Rev. J. E. Odgers said that the first Sharp prize had been awarded to Mr. F. Taylor, and the second to Mr. Stronge. The certificates and prizes were then distributed by the Chairman. The Rev. A. Gordon, one of the visitors, delivered the address to the students, and the proceedings closed with prayer.

DARWIN MEMORIAL.—A circular has been issued by a committee which has been formed for the purpose of raising funds with a view to establish a memorial of the late Mr. Darwin. It is proposed to erect a statue in a public place, and to establish a fund associated with his name, the proceeds of which will be devoted, in some way hereafter to be determined, to the furtherance of biological science. The general committee comprises a large number of the most eminent names of the time, including Prince Leopold and the Archbishops of Canterbury and York.

We regret to learn that the publication of Thackeray's supposed preface to his "Irish Sketch-Book" is indefinitely postponed.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Indigestion, Stomach, and Liver Complaints.—Persons suffering from any derangements of the liver, stomach, or the organs of digestion, should have recourse to Holloway's Pills, as there is no medicine known that acts on these particular complaints with such certain success. Its peculiar properties purify and regulate the circulation, strengthen the stomach, increase the appetite, and rouse the sluggish liver. It is invaluable to dyspeptic, restoring the patient to the soundest health and strength. These preparations may be used at all times and in all climates by persons affected by biliousness, flatulency, colic, nausea, or disordered liver; for heartburn, water-pangs and sick-headaches they are specifics. Indeed, no ailment of the digestive organs can long resist their purifying and corrective powers.

Religious Intelligence.

UNIVERSITY HALL, LONDON.

ANNUAL REPORT.

The following report was read at the annual meeting of the members last week:—

In presenting their thirty-fifth annual report on the affairs of the Society the Council have to congratulate the members on the close of the protracted negotiations with the Committee of Manchester New College, which have during the past two years occupied so much of their attention, and which will result, as they trust, in securing for the Hall, and for the endowment which it represents, an increased and permanent usefulness.

As was inevitable in a year of transition, in which the future of the Hall was altogether uncertain, the number of resident students this session has been small. Fourteen sets of rooms have been occupied. Of these ten were taken by students of University College, the remaining four were occupied by Manchester New College students—one of them a Hibbert scholar—under the agreement of March, 1881, by which, in consideration of a larger payment for the year, ten sets of rooms were placed at the disposal of the College rent free. Had the Hall been dependent on the receipts from its ordinary inmates, the Council would have incurred a loss on working expenses of between £300 and £400. But this loss has been largely reduced, though not entirely covered, by the increased contribution from the College.

At the annual class examinations held at University College in June last four Hall students obtained certificates and other distinctions; and in no previous year has it been occupied by a more steady and orderly set of inmates. The Council have to regret the loss by death of four life members of the Society—Thos. Watson Bagehot, Esq., S. W. Browne, Esq., W. R. Greg, Esq., and C. F. Tagart, Esq. One life member, Mr. O. C. Whitehouse, has resigned. In other respects the affairs of the Society call for no special remark. The attention of the Council has during the past session been almost entirely directed towards completing, under legal advice and in correspondence with the authorities of Manchester New College, the details of the proposed transfer and virtual amalgamation of the Hall with the College, the principle of which was determined at the general meeting last year.

The detailed scheme in the words finally adopted on the 14th of December last has already been submitted to the formal decision of the life members. But it may be interesting for the Council in this their final report to state in more general terms what are the immediate prospects of the Hall under its new management, and what guarantees they have secured for preserving in the future the permanent aims of their foundation. The existing Society being dissolved, its members, or such of them as desire it, will obtain as life trustees of Manchester New College a determining voice in its future counsels; and the property now vested in trustees on their behalf will be transferred to a new body, endowed with larger powers and responsibilities, and appointed in equal numbers by the two institutions, the objects and resources of which will be thus combined. It will be held on practically two trusts. In the first place, to allow Manchester New College by its executive committee to "occupy and manage the Hall" as a collegiate residence, open to lay and divinity students without distinction of creed, and having the declared objects set forth and defined in the second article of constitution of the Hall. This was the first condition of the proposed transfer as originally framed at the Conference of March, 1881; and it is understood to be the intention of the college authorities, as it is undoubtedly their interest, to spare no effort on their part in making this enterprise successful. During the ensuing vacation most of the students' rooms will be refurnished on a new and uniform plan. The scale of charges will be revised, and the domestic arrangements entirely remodelled. Under the advice of a competent architect the building will be put into complete repair; and a considerable sum will be expended by the Crabb Robinson trustees on its ornamentation. It is proposed by the college to reserve a certain number of rooms for the occupation of its divinity students. But the remainder and larger part of the hall will be offered on precisely the same open conditions as at present to the ordinary lay students of University College. And with a view of discharging as efficiently as possible their obligations under this part of the new Trust, and of maintaining those close and friendly relations with University College which are necessary to secure any large measure of public support, it is the intention of the committee to place the internal affairs of the hall under the superintendence of one of the most distinguished of the college professors, Mr. Henry Morley, who, in his earnest desire for the success of an experiment which he has long had greatly at heart, has cordially undertaken at their request the duties of Principal. Under Professor Morley's advice, and with the personal co-operation of the general body of his colleagues at University College, new tutorial arrangements are contemplated which will add greatly to the efficiency and advantages of the hall as a collegiate residence.

In the event of the paramount interests of Manchester New College requiring its removal to another locality, and the first of these Trusts thus coming to a close, it was the desire of the Council to provide that the Hall itself should pass on easy terms into the hands of University College, to be made available for its general academical purposes freed from onerous restrictions, and that the permanent objects of the Hall foundation, which are in some degree at variance with those of University College, should govern the action of the trustees in applying, whether in connection with Manchester New College or otherwise, the fund to be derived from its sale. It is hoped that the scheme as finally settled will tend to secure both these ends. Power is given to the Trustees to accept any reasonable offer on behalf of University College for the purchase of the Hall building. At the same time the duty is thrown upon them of seeing that the Hall endowment, raised by its Founders to commemorate the passing of the Dissenters' Chapel Act, as in their own words "the first legislative recognition of unlimited religious liberty" shall continue to advance, under its new conditions, the cause of religious freedom, and the free exercise of the individual judgment in religious matters. Subject to this prevailing consideration, there is a Trust in favour of the purposes and operations of Manchester New College, which the sixteen Trustees may exercise at their discretion in the three different ways specifically defined in the detailed scheme. But to meet the possible contingency of a failure of this Trust, power is reserved to the Trustees in this case to dispose of the fund and the income generally, and devote it to other objects more calculated in their judgment to preserve its spirit or maintain its usefulness. And this ultimate power is drawn in the widest terms.

Such are the provisions for the future destination of University Hall, which at the special general meeting held on June 2 received without a single dissenting voice the sanction of the assembled Life Members, and the approval, personally or by proxy, of three-fourths of the whole registered members. The terms of the constitution require that the resolutions then adopted shall be formally confirmed at a second general meeting, which is summoned for Thursday, June 22. But the Council cannot anticipate that a decision so deliberately taken, so wise in itself, and so largely supported, will be lightly reversed. In finally withdrawing from the responsible management of the Hall, which has now been conducted by their predecessors and themselves with varying fortune for more than thirty years, while they cannot regard without pain the parting from old associations, and the final dissolution of a society which numbered amongst its founders so many honoured names, they recognise in the changed conditions which make this step necessary the practical fulfilment of one of its main objects, and believe that in thus devoting their endowment to widening the aims and extending the resources of a kindred institution they are promoting in the most effectual manner the essential principles of their Trust.

University Hall, June 7, 1882.

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

In our last number we gave the President's address at the meeting of this venerable assembly at Chowbent on Thursday, the 15th inst., but were compelled to postpone the report of the evening meeting, which we now subjoin.

THE EVENING MEETING

was held in the chapel, Mr. CALDER WRIGHT presiding.

The CHAIRMAN said the Chowbent congregation had long been connected with that Association, and he was glad they had been honoured by the meeting

Occasional Notes.

AN American journal is responsible for the following:—"Like all eminent public men Mr. Spurgeon has the misfortune to be pestered with bores. But he manages them with much good sense and shrewdness. One of these came to him and said, 'Mr. Spurgeon, you and I are one; I think the same things that you do, and wish the same things that you wish.' Mr. Spurgeon said, 'Is that so? Do you wish what I wish?' 'Yes.' 'Well, I was wishing that you would go away,' and (said Mr. Spurgeon to the writer in relating the incident) he had sense enough left to go away." This reminds us of the reply made by Douglas Jerrold to a well-known occupier of other people's time. He was walking along one day when this bore stopped him with, "Hallo! Jerrold. Well, what's going on?" "I am," said Jerrold, and quickly disappeared, leaving his would-be tormentor gazing vacantly after him.

THE results of the Christian Evidence Society's Examinations for 1882 have been published. We notice that in the second division, wherein the text books were Mozley's "Lectures on Miracles" and Warrington's "Can we believe in Miracles?" no prizes were awarded, but only two second-class certificates. We are not surprised at this. The evidence in support of miracles does not get stronger, while the difficulties in the way of believing them increase every year.

SOME little time ago the Rev. Dr. G. E. Ellis, of Boston, U.S., made an excellent speech full of pleasant reminiscences, in the course of which he said:—"What do we read of in the Bible—the women of Israel or the ladies of Israel? There is only one lady mentioned (in the Book of Revelation), and I believe there was something wrong about her." The Rev. Alex. Gordon, of Belfast, writing to the Christian Register to correct the good doctor, says, "The 'something wrong' is with somebody's memory, for there is no 'lady' in that sad page of the Apocalypse. But on a brighter leaf we do read of 'the elect lady and her children, whom I love in the truth'; and there are 'wise ladies' in the Old Testament. Six times the word comes in in the great Book; and a good word it is, with an honourable etymology. Would that all our women lived up to it."

THE Bishop of Peterborough cannot help saying good things both in and out of the pulpit—especially out of it. The other night a rich, benevolent, but somewhat brainless millionaire was boasting after dinner that he gave away £2,000 to the poor regularly every year. He said, "I think it's right, you know; a sort of duty in my position. I can't say what becomes of it, but it's given away in charity, that's all I know, and that's all I care about. £2,000 every year!" "What! said the bishop, "do you really mean to say you pay away £2,000 to the poor every year as a religious duty?" "I assure you, my lord, that is so," replied the wealthy man with careless complacency. "Well," said the witty bishop, "that's the largest insurance against fire I ever heard of." Truth having told this story, a correspondent wrote stating it was not original, for about ten years ago, when Mr. Baird, of Gartsherrie, gave half a million to the Free Church of Scotland, he well remembered hearing the late Mr. James Merry wind up some caustic remarks about the declaration that "he was d—d if it was not the largest fire insurance he had ever heard of." The saying went all round Scotland, and was appreciated by no class more than by the "Ministers and Elders" of the sect towards which Mr. Baird had displayed such unexampled liberality.

It is not often that we find ourselves in accord with Lord Shaftesbury, but we confess to a considerable amount of sympathy with some of his remarks reported in last Monday's papers anent the Salvation Army. He said that he could not endorse the name given to the Army, and called it downright blasphemy. The excesses of the "Army" were producing great irreverence of thought, of expression, of action, turning religion into a play, and making it grotesque and familiar. He had seen in the War Cry that a meeting was to finish with the "Hallelujah Galop;" that was not the way to carry on the work of the Gospel. We have never had any sympathy with those who attempted to put down this army by force, but apart from all questions of theology, we have always regarded the movement as calculated in the long run to lead to more harm than good. What, for instance, is likely to be the result when meetings are begun at midnight and carried on till the small hours of the morning? Last week there was to be held "The Biggest All-Night of Prayer Ever Held" conducted by the General. The doors were to be closed at 11.30, and none were to be able either to enter or leave the hall from that time till 4.30 A.M. Such refreshment as might be needed during the night was to be taken with them. There was to be no admission "for any purpose but that of worship," and unknown friends must be recommended by an officer of the Army or by their minister as true worshippers of God. No report of the meeting was to be sent to any paper without the permission of the General. When we remember the fact that many of these worshippers are young girls, and that they will be in a great state of excitement, it is not difficult to imagine that this kind of thing will lead to mischief. Next Monday there is to be a Grand United Holiness Demonstration, and among the attractions advertised are a Grand March Round the Racecourse, an Indian Expedition in Native Uniform on an Elephant, an Exhibition of Trophies, a Great Assault on the Enemy, and a Mammoth Musical Thanksgiving. Well may Lord Shaftesbury express his disgust at this kind of thing. By the way, we observe that one of the recently exhibited "trophies"—the octogenarian convert who had been convicted two hundred and fifty times for drunkenness—has relapsed.

THE Free Religious Association of America received only 1,700 dols. last year but found occasion to spend less than half of it, or 809. The report of the Executive Committee gives an account of their efforts to obtain information from various states regarding legal restrictions on religious liberty, sectarian influences in education, social conditions as affecting free thought, and condition of liberal organisations. Correspondents were appointed for twenty-one states and reports more or less complete were received from sixteen states. A summary of results is given. The Committee say, on the first point, that it is the intention of State constitutions generally to guard religious liberty. They assert the rights of individual conscience in all matters of religion; but the statute books show a conspicuous violation of the assertion, and in the constitutions themselves it is common, in immediate connection with the assertion of the rights of private opinion and conscience, to find positive theological affirmations, which discriminate in favour of the opinions of one portion of the citizens against those of another. The Connecticut Constitution, for example, says:—

It being the duty of all men to worship the Supreme Being, the Great Creator and Preserver of the Universe, and their right to render that worship in the mode most consistent with the dictates of their consciences, no person shall by law be compelled to join or support or be classed with or associated to any congregation, church, or religious association.

The report continues:—

This is a sample of the inconsistency between the evident intent of the state constitutions in general in respect to religious liberty and the manner in which the intent is carried into execution. In some of the recently organised states freedom of conscience is better guarded in form, as well as substance; but in most of the states, while it is meant to secure the equal rights of opinion and conscience, there are sections of the constitutions and laws that do discriminate unfairly against these rights in some classes of citizens. These laws in many cases have been outgrown by public opinion and are not enforced; but they are on the statute books and may be and sometimes are re-suscitated in a way that works gross practical injustice.

On the second point the correspondents generally say that "Sectarianism is weakening," but there is still not a little of its spirit and power manifest in the management of public schools. On the third point the Committee says:—

In general, the reports are favourable to attempts of some kind toward a more systematic organisation of the liberal sentiment of the country, without, however, indicating the methods for effecting this. In a few of the states the conditions are represented as thoroughly ripe for an organising movement, and all that is wanted is a few leaders, to point the way and rally the people, who are all ready to supply the material of the new societies. The states where the conditions are reported as most ready for organisation are, in the East, Maine, Massachusetts, and the western portion of New York; and in the West, Michigan and Kansas. In the two latter states there appears to be a special receptivity to liberal religious ideas, and a good deal of activity is already awakened in the direction of local organisation; in Michigan, largely under the auspices of a very liberal form of Unitarianism, and in Kansas, under an association recently formed, called the Liberal Union, which is an attempt to solve the problem of uniting in local work and fellowship all the different phases of Liberalism.

STOURBRIDGE PRESBYTERIAN CHAPEL SUNDAY SCHOOL.—At their quarterly meeting, held at the Wollaston-road School on Sunday afternoon last, the Sunday-school presented the Superintendent, Mr. A. Gordon Maginnis, on the occasion of his removing to London on a business engagement, with a handsome Gladstone bag, nicely fitted up, as a token of affectionate respect and good wishes. The children of the first-class presented him with a beautiful silver pencil case, &c.

KING'S LYNN.—Assisted by the fund for advertising week-evening lectures on Unitarianism, the Rev. W. R. Shanks gave the first of a course in the chapel here last Sunday. A number of strangers were present, and fresh interest has been created, which promises to lead to permanent results. The scholars and friends of the Sunday-school had an enjoyable trip to Hunstanton on Thursday, June 22.

CROYDON.—We have much pleasure in directing the attention of our readers to the advertisement issued by the congregation at Croydon, which appears in another part of our columns, and to the drawing of the church which accompanies the present issue. The building promises to be a credit to our body, and an ornament to the town, and we heartily wish them success.

LIVERPOOL.—At a meeting of the Lancashire and Cheshire Entomological Society, held on Monday evening at the Free Library, Liverpool, a paper was read by the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams on "Darwin and Darwinism." The Liverpool Mercury gives a lengthy summary of the paper. It was decided that the paper should be published by the Council of the society. The Council of the Literary and Philosophical Society of Liverpool have just issued a paper read by Mr. Williams before the Society in January last on "Some Popular Misconceptions of Darwinism."

UNITARIAN CHURCH, SOUTH SAINT MUNGO STREET, GLASGOW.—A series of Sunday morning conferences on religious and theological subjects was commenced in the beginning of April, and have been continued up to the end of June. The attendance has been fair, and several members have, by this means, been added to the Church. Papers were read by the Rev. Alexander Webster and others, and discussion was allowed at the end of each paper. The conferences will begin again in September. Mr. Webster has also held a series of open-air meetings on Glasgow Green, attended by over 600 people each Sunday evening, who have listened very attentively and seemed deeply impressed by Mr. Webster's earnest and eloquent addresses, which were specially adapted for those holding orthodox views in religion. Large numbers of tracts have been distributed, and the doctrine of Unitarianism thus made known to great numbers who never heard them expounded before. Mr. Webster also delivered recently two discourses, in reply to a sermon of the Rev. Alexander Oliver, B.A., attacking the Unitarian faith. Great numbers of strangers attended on these occasions. Mr. Webster's refutation of Mr. Oliver's positions was most conclusive. On Sunday, June 18, a floral service was held, attended by the teachers and Sunday-school children of St. Vincent-street congregation along with our own, when the Rev. F. W. Walters preached. The church was very tastefully decorated on the occasion.

Reviews.

Christian Doctrine in the Light of New Testament Revision. By Alexander Gordon, M.A.

The title of this pamphlet expresses very happily the character of its contents. Its purpose is to give an account of the effect of the changes made in the English New Testament by the recent revision, in their bearing upon the more important theological doctrines usually held among Christians. This design is fulfilled in clear, concise and telling language; and in such a way that the impression left upon the mind of any reader capable of judging candidly and intelligently respecting the points discussed must, we imagine, be a very decided one, and one that will be anything but favourable to the claims of the various established orthodoxies.

Mr. Gordon has executed his task with a two-fold avowal of much interest. First he observes in effect (pp. 14, 15), that the Bible is no common book. It has a special character of its own, one, too, it must be added, not usually so distinctly acknowledged by Unitarian writers, at least in the way in which Mr. Gordon has here expressed himself:—"The position (he writes) here assumed . . . is that of a firm belief in the Divine Revelation of the Scriptures, in the inspiration of the men who composed them, and of the books which they composed. Their doctrine is, or ought to be, the sovereign rule of every Christian faith; their counsel is the holy word given as the inspired guidance for every Christian life." If this be a little vague, it is not necessary for us to examine it, or even to ask, what is meant by "Revelation," or by the word "Inspiration" as here employed. These points may be passed over, as indeed the author himself refrains from stating "the grounds" of his "conviction." We content ourselves, therefore, with the remark that this high estimate of the Scriptures is accompanied, by a correspondingly careful treatment, on the writer's part, of the various matters brought up for notice, and with the delicate discrimination of one thing from another which would seem to be required in dealing with such a book. This is no doubt perfectly right; while yet it is difficult to understand what is meant by a very pointed denial of the assertion, "that the Bible must be judged and read exactly like any other book" (p. 15). Properly understood, this is surely quite true. The Bible must be read, like every other book, in the sense which the author intended to express;—not in some artificial or non-natural, or non-historical sense, accommodated to the theological tastes or speculations of modern schools of whatever name, but in the sense originally intended by the writers themselves. The several questions which Mr. Gordon has appended to the words just quoted would seem therefore to be altogether beside the mark, and to have no suitability to the nature of the case:—"Is there to be one uniform standard of judgment for all books? And will the same principles of study apply to them indiscriminately? To the sixth book of 'Paradise Lost,' and the sixth book of 'Euclid'? To a library of romances and a code of laws? To Darwin on Earthworms, and George Fox's Journal?" To such inquiries, so far as they are susceptible of an answer at all, only one and the same affirmative reply can be given. All books must be read in the sense which their own authors intended to express, and in no other; and it is the duty of a translator, or expositor, to use every means in his power to find out and render that original and natural sense, to adhere to that, and to reject every other.

In the second place, Mr. Gordon avows that he has pursued his inquiry with distinctly Unitarian convictions. On this point he very justly and frankly observes:—

If, in the prosecution of this inquiry, the espousal of a particular theology has been undisguised, it is because, all through the Revised New Testament, the main features of that theology are vindicated and cleared; while the language relied upon by its opponents appears more and more to be the outcome of modern invention. In the argument of Unitarian apologists, from the time of Christopher Sand, or even earlier, the "Concessions of Trinitarians" have always formed a distinctive feature. A work bearing this title, from the pen of the late John Wilson, formerly of Belfast, has collected with laborious care the admissions, frank or reluctant, afforded by Trinitarians in all Churches to the truth of the Unitarian exegesis of Scripture, passage by passage. The Revised Version, though never intended to produce such a result, may not unfairly be appealed to, as constituting in the main a new volume of Trinitarian concessions.—P. 47.

This is well and truly said. Of its correctness this little work is itself the best and most sufficient witness. Nothing can be more forcible than the way in which it is here shown that the gains to Unitarian doctrine in the new English text are everywhere conspicuous and important. Wherever changes involving controversial points have been made at all, this will be found to hold true. Even where new renderings admitted into the text seem to tell in favour of established theology, the Revisers have in their margin conceded another interpretation, which speaks on the other side. In so doing, they have in reality simply revealed their own strong bias, which has certainly led them to disturb the old text in cases where there was no just occasion to deviate from it (Tit. ii. 13; 2 Pet. i. 1). Such considerations as these fully justify the conclusion of Mr. Gordon as to the Unitarian character of the Revised text. He observes:—

One denomination of Christians there is in particular whose sturdy advocates are not called upon to mourn the loss of a single proof-text on which they have been accustomed to rely in support of their special theology. The Unitarians are in this exceptional position. . . . Without a solitary exception it may be decisively asserted that every text, formerly adduced by Unitarians in their own favour from the Old Version, will also be found in the New. There are no lapsed verses in their case. Their old proof texts have not lost any clearness; nay, many of them speak, in their new dress, with an added force of testimony.—P. 24.

In illustration of this position we quote the following interesting passage:—

Let us come to some particulars in vindication of this strong statement. At a recent meeting of the Convocation of Canterbury, Archdeacon Allen presented a gravamen, in which he stated that "the true doctrine of the Trinity cannot receive support from the words of the Authorised Version, 1 John v. 7." The grapes are sour. Strictly speaking, this famous verse lends no support to any doctrine whatsoever, seeing that it no longer exists as a part of Holy Scripture. But it still holds its place in Archdeacon Allen's Prayerbook (Epistle for 1st Sunday after Easter), from which even a reformandum will not avail to dislodge it. It is still quoted, first and foremost, among the proof-texts for the Trinity, in every edition of the Confession of Faith of the Larger and Shorter Catechisms which contain the Scripture proofs. Evidently, then, some weight has been attached to its testimony in times past. "The Bible has taught me," said Dr. Cooke, in the Synod at Newry, in 1822, while opposing the election of an Arian Professor of Hebrew and Greek, "that the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost are one God." (Life and Times, 1871, p. 65.) Dean Bagot, in the controversy already alluded to, would not admit that the verse is an interpolation (p. 131, 142). He had, in fact, initiated the controversy by publishing an Abstract of the argument for the Deity of the Word, headed by this very text. Slowly, indeed, has the Trinitarian argument consented to dispense with it. It is even inserted in the ably reconstructed arrangement of the Shorter Catechism, edited by Professor Murphy, of Belfast. Bishop Oxenden parts with it, in honest fidelity to truth, yet in unconcealed regret, holding that "it contains a most important statement of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity" (Christian Opinion, No. 13, p. 292). How are we to listen to those who tell us now that "its excision makes, and will make, no difference to Christian doctrine? Certainly it will make this difference."—pp. 25, 26.

The above is one of many passages containing historical allusions and statements which give to Mr. Gordon's tract a special character and add greatly to its interest. Yet we must qualify our general commendation by one remark. We miss, in various cases, explanations, which might have been expected, of the reasons for adopting one form of text and rejecting another.

The author is content to point to the fact that the Revisers have spoken their ipse dixit, whether in text or margin, and to assume that this will be accepted as sufficient; whereas many readers would have been glad to have had some discussion from his own pen of such texts, for example, as Titus ii. 13, and to know from him why the one form should be taken and the other rejected. The course thus followed has no doubt simplified the treatment of the subject, and for the majority of readers it will be sufficient. But still, while this omission is noted, it will probably be admitted that, within the compass of fifty pages, it was scarcely possible to compress a greater amount of strong and clear statement on the numerous topics treated of in these pages, and we heartily commend them to the attention of our readers. Equally with Dr. Vance Smith's unpretending little book, "Texts and Margins of the Revised New Testament"—which condenses into a still smaller space several portions of the subject which are but slightly touched by Mr. Gordon—it tends directly and clearly to show how groundless is the assertion, not unfrequently met with, that the Revision has had no effect upon the character of the dogmatic teaching of the New Testament. Such a statement is directly contrary to the facts of the case. So far as the ordinary dogmatic teaching is founded upon the New Testament the effect of the Revision is in truth deep and searching in a very unexpected and startling degree.

Literary Notes.

It may interest some readers of Carlyle's "Diary of his Irish Tour," which Messrs. Sampson Low and Co. have just published, to know that there remains in manuscript a diary of a visit he made to Paris after the Revolution of 1848, which contains sketches of several of the notable statesmen of that time.

An extract from a letter published by the Athenæum, written by Mr. Browning to Mr. W. G. Kingsland in 1868 on the charge of obscurity may interest our readers:—"I can have little doubt that my writing has been in the main too hard for many I should have been pleased to communicate with; but I never designedly tried to puzzle people, as some of my critics have supposed. On the other hand, I never pretended to offer such literature as should be a substitute for a cigar or a game of dominoes to an idle man. So, perhaps, on the whole, I get my deserts and something over—not a crowd, but a few I value more."

Dr. W. B. CARPENTER is about to visit the United States and Canada. He will deliver the next Lowell Lectures in Boston.

THE third divisional volume of the "Encyclopædia Dictionary," by Mr. Robert Hunter, will be published by Messrs. Cassell in July.

MADemoiselle DOSNE has found a portfolio containing a number of notes in M. Thiers's handwriting forming a history of his time. They include memoranda of conversations, ideas that occurred to him, anecdotes, and sketches of celebrated men with whom he was personally acquainted. There are portraits of Louis Philippe, Sir Robert Peel, Jacques Laffitte, Lord Normanby, and Louis Napoleon, written after the coup d'état. Mademoiselle Dosne recoils from publishing these notes, but the literary executors of M. Thiers urge her to bring them out or to deposit them in a sealed packet at the National Library, with directions for them to be printed hereafter.

THE REV. N. W. GIBSON, Senior Canon and Sub-Dean of Manchester Cathedral, died on Sunday week, aged eighty. He was born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and his collegiate course began in the Manchester New College, York. Removing from the Moravian School at Fulneck, near Leeds, he entered that institution as a lay student in 1816, and left in the year 1818. It is probable (says the Manchester Guardian) that the liberal spirit of both the Moravian School and the Presbyterian College exercised a beneficial influence on his character and career, and that the instructions of Mr. Wellbeloved may have prepared him for the distinction he afterwards obtained at Cambridge. He was a moderate High Churchman of the old school, with a sober creed, and discharged his duties in a thorough and exemplary fashion. He was one of the life governors of Owens College under the Owens College Act of July, 1870. In 1878, in commemoration of his having been fifty years in the parish, Mr. Gibson caused a clerestory window on the south of the chancel to be filled with stained glass.

being held there. The Provincial Assembly was always looked forward to, and it was always a pleasure to see their venerable President (the Rev. W. Gaskell), and hear his address. They were always interested in the questions brought before the meeting, and were led to notice the changes in religious, social, and political affairs, changes which they could scarcely realise without looking back and considering the social position of the people and the aspect of religion at the close of the last century, and the beginning of the present. Dissenters had not now to make many sacrifices for conscience sake. They could worship in their own churches without the fear of being disturbed by a lawless "church and king" mob, and they lived in happy times, compared to the times of Priestley and Wesley, which were a period of persecution, ignorance, bigotry, and spiritual darkness, the people without education or moral training. There was now a different state of things. They had a national system of education, free public libraries, cheap books, newspapers, and other agencies at work, all tending to raise the social and moral condition of the people. With reference to religious freedom, many victories had been gained in the past, but judging from what had taken place in the House of Commons during the present session, there was much work to be done before their civil rights were secured. As Unitarians, they held that no man should suffer in his civil rights on account of the opinions he professed, nor should a constituency be disfranchised as was Northampton. The present generation had been greatly benefited by the men who had laboured and suffered in the cause of civil and religious liberty in the past. Let them then cherish those principles and protest on all suitable occasions against any infringement of them. With reference to the recent papers on the development of religious life in our churches, he did not see any allusion to the great evil of intemperance, which, in his opinion, was one of the greatest obstacles to the development of religious life—(applause). This evil, in his opinion, demanded the serious attention of those who were labouring anxiously for the development of religious life in our churches, and he hoped their sympathies would be given to the movement which had for its object the promotion of temperance. So he believed they would do much to advance the cause of religion—(applause).

The Rev. R. L. CARPENTER said he had had no theme given to him, but at those meetings one was always expected to say something on civil and religious liberty. He had been pleased with the position that their denomination had taken, and likewise the Liberation Society (comprising as it did a great number of orthodox dissenters, on the question of Mr. Bradlaugh, or rather on the question of the oath. He (the speaker) was always brought up to think that they were not to consider whether they were in sympathy with those whose rights they desired to maintain but simply whether they had those rights. The Roman Catholics were as much opposed to his views as the Atheists, and although certainly there had been times when Atheists had been very intolerant, as in France, it was unquestionable that the Roman Catholics had been the great foes of religious liberty through the centuries. Notwithstanding that, he had always been brought up to be as earnest for Catholic Emancipation as he was for the Repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts—(applause). In America, too, they must remember that Dr. Channing, that eminent Christian minister, was the one to come forward to oppose the persecution of Abner Kneeland, an Atheist. Fifty years had now passed since the Reform Bill received the Royal assent, and it made him feel quite an old man to see how little notice had been taken of that event that stirred their blood and excited such intense enthusiasm half a century ago. When he was a youth they were taught to glory in the revolution of 1688, when William III. had come to the throne as a Parliamentary King, and an end was put to the doctrine of divine right. But although he was the Parliamentary King, and Parliament assumed great power, what was Parliament? There was a House of Lords and House of Commons, but the House of Commons was not what it had been in the remembrance of the present generation. Only about one third consisted of independent members. There were ever so many rotten boroughs which were sold, just as individual voters sold their votes now, and those who sold boroughs were called "borough mongers" in his (the speaker's) day. At that time it was rather remarkable that the counties were the independent constituencies, the voters there being the forty-shillings, freeholders and they could be generally relied upon in any national emergency. As to the boroughs in Scotland, out of about forty boroughs, upwards of thirty-five could be carried by Lord Melville, the Dictator of Scotland. The constituencies had also been enlarged. Take Carlisle and Bath for instance, which has now thousands of voters. At that time the constituency was under forty in each place, so it was not simply that new members were given by the Reform Bill to such places as Birmingham, Leeds, and Manchester, but the constituencies of the older boroughs were much extended. Sir Robert Walpole once said that every man had his price, and it was no wonder if members bought their seats that voters sold their votes. The fundamental principle brought under notice by the American revolution "no taxation without representation" had been attempted to be carried out since. Pitt brought forward a Reform Bill but the House did not care to entertain it, and soon after came the French Revolution, and a time of panic and a state of things which in the present days they could scarcely imagine. Dr. Priestley was mobbed, and according to the Life of Theophilus Lindsey in 1792, Fyfe Palmer, one of their ministers in Scotland, for simply advocating Parliamentary Reform in a peaceful way was convicted as a felon and transported to Botany Bay for seven years. His health was entirely broken, and he never returned to this country. There was also the trial of Thelwall and Horne Tooke; and Sir Francis Burdett, who was one of the heroes of their youth, the father of the Baroness Burdett Coutts, was committed to the Tower for not being quite respectful enough to the House of Commons. Lancashire men would remember Peterloo. Those were serious times, and when they were a little dissatisfied with things as they were to-day, they should look on things as they used to be, and when they saw the dark cloud they would appreciate the sunshine a little more. The great French Revolution stopped liberty a long time, but the second one, 1830, which comparatively speaking was peaceful, excited the feeling of liberty everywhere. England had a new King, and people began to think there ought to be a change. The Duke of Wellington, who had consented to Catholic emancipation and the repeal of the Test and Corporation Act as necessities, put his foot down firmly against reform, like Mrs. Partington trying to stop the waves of the Atlantic with her mop, but he had to make room for Lord John Russell. Younger men perhaps knew him as "Rest and be thankful," but there was a time when he did not rest, and they were thankful. A Reform Bill was brought in much better than they expected. Rotten boroughs, some like Old Sarum without an inhabitant, were swept away. The constituencies were enlarged by including the £10 householder, which was thought a very great step. He remembered in the old times the people got drunk and used to be breaking windows for about a fortnight during the continuance of an election, the poll being kept open so long as a certain number of voters had not recorded their votes. Now there was a great change, with a proper system of registration and the early close of the polls. Mr. Carpenter then gave a detailed account of the struggles and agitation which led to the passing of the Reform Bill, and mentioned a great mass meeting in Birmingham on the site of the present Newhall Hill Chapel, on which occasion the Rev. Hugh Hutton (Unitarian) offered up prayer before the assembled thousands, and it was quite a thing to pray for, because it was a great blessing and it was a thing to be thought of solemnly and earnestly. There were great disturbances, and lawless men took advantage of a lawful agitation. He further described the fires in Bristol, mentioning that when the mob attacked the Chapter House of the Cathedral, three Dissenters got into the building, a Unitarian, a Quaker, and a Papist, and threw out the flaming brands as fast as they were thrown in, thereby saving the church. The watchwords in those days of fifty years ago were Peace, Retrenchment, and Reform. Reform had certainly progressed, but as to Retrenchment the least said the sooner mended, and as to Peace they had since had some terrible wars. They had since had the great measure, Negro Emancipation, though he must remark they paid the wrong persons, viz., the slave owners, instead of recompensing the slaves for the injury they had sustained. It had, however, produced an important effect in America and the world, and England took up a position from which he hoped it would never swerve. The old men had had their battles, the young men in the future would have their struggles too, in taking the part of the weak and the oppressed, for they must not forget that the slave trade was still rampant in Africa. There had been another measure passed—Municipal Reform—and when they saw the great works which municipal bodies had done it showed what a thriving energetic community could do. The rotten old corporations had often large charities which were grossly misapplied. The Charity Commission of to-day, however, had put all such sums to good uses. All these things resulted from the Reform Act of 1832. Many measures had been carried for removing obstacles. In his early days their light was limited by the window toll, but that had long been swept away, as also the excise upon glass, soap, paper, and other necessities; and those of the present generation could hardly imagine such a state of things as formerly existed. In former days he could not get a Bristol letter at York College without paying elevenpence for it. If people had occasionally to pay twopence now they wondered what the world was coming to—(laughter). The people had now votes and the public good was therefore considered. Another measure of practical importance was the registration of births, deaths, and marriages, not only for legal but sanitary and other purposes. Religious and civil liberty were nearly connected. Before the Reform Bill there were three or four Unitarians in Parliament. There was Mr. Bright, M.P. for Bristol, Mr. Marshall, M.P. for Yorkshire, Mr. Wm. Smith, M.P. for Norwich—(applause). He was a noble man, and lived to be almost the father of the house. He it was who made their worship legal, because until 1813 any person who advocated Unitarian opinions was liable to pains and penalties. With those few exceptions Dissenters were not represented in Parliament because the Lords and other borough-mongers did not care to have Dissenters in, and orthodox Dissenters had got into the habit of not thinking much about politics before the Reform Bill. Mark Philips and George Wm. Wood and W. Briggs, the first member for Halifax, with Richard Potter for Wigan, and others, appeared after 1832, and now not only had the Unitarian body above their share of members, as they always had had in proportion to their numbers, but the orthodox Dissenters had also a great many, and there was a feeling in the House of Commons that Dissenters' grievances had to be attended to. After a brief reference to the time of the Chartist agitation, when people rather believed in physical force, the speaker agreed that if they of the present time found the Irish a little too violent, in fact rather more than a little, they must remember that their friends in the neighbourhood resorted to force in those Chartist days. They were not so selfish as they used to be. There was a time when they did not take a sufficient interest in the great work of humanity. They now felt that they as a country had no right to go on encroaching and subduing other nations. They who loved liberty themselves honoured and respected those who loved liberty in Africa, Asia, and other parts of the world, and he hoped they would continue firm in that matter. As to the religious opinions, the opinions of his childhood were not those of that assembly. They no longer tied themselves to what they could find in the Bible. They he hoped read the wider book and strove to look with unclouded eyes on the truths God set before them. But whatever their speculative opinions they did feel they had the great principles of civil and religious liberty to maintain. He thought they had been steadfast to them, and he hoped they would be. One of the former ministers of that chapel had turned out with some of their ancestors with such weapons as they could find to withstand the progress of the Pretender. Those brave old ancestors had to fight their battle, and they, their successors of to-day had to fight theirs, but their weapons were not carnal, and he trusted with the same spirit of independence they had perhaps a greater spirit of charity and love—(applause).

Mr. CUTHBERT C. GRUNDY (Bury) then gave an address on Theology and the People. He had made use of the word theology rather than religion, for he was not inclined to think that the moral and spiritual life of the working classes was in a state of decline, or that they were the only people whose spiritual life was dark. He supposed they were all agreed that religion was natural to man, but that it, like the intellectual powers, required culture. The germ was there, but it required developing, and on how that was done to a great extent depended the character of the man. Here, then, was the use of theology. Every one ought to have a clear theological belief. He need not be a sectarian or bind himself to a particular Church, but he ought to have a well founded belief in theological matters to know what he believed and why he believed it. The best theology was that which most fully developed the individual's religious life, and although it might be of comparatively little importance what a man believed so that he lived a good life, yet it was certain that what a man believed had a great influence on the kind of life he led, and therefore the theology of those they called the masses was a matter of no little consequence. The complaint was that the bulk of the people did not care about theology, did not attend church or chapel, and did not take interest in religious matters. Mr. Grundy then referred at some length to a recent pamphlet by a Church of England clergyman "On the Causes that Public Worship is neglected by the People, and can they be removed?" and also to a recent paper by Mr. Edwin Ellis in the Inquirer. He suggested, as remedies for the state of things complained of, and as a means which would be helpful towards gaining the alliance of the higher class working men, 1. A simple, reasonable theology that should bear upon every day experience, and that should be found to be in harmony with intellectual progress. 2. That this reasonable theology should be presented in an interesting manner, devoid of unmeaning ceremonial. 3. That a welcome be given and an interest shown in those who already attend our chapels. 4. That the minister and his flock should evidence in their lives the good effect of their religious beliefs. What had been the secret of the success of the services for the people at Leicester, at Nottingham, at Kidderminster? A reasonable, cheerful attractive service, a plain, practical hearty address, but above and beyond this was it not that people felt, nay that they knew that the services were instituted with a strong desire for the people's well doing, and not to add numbers to the roll of church membership? The minister and his helpers took a real, personal, affectionate interest in the welfare and elevation of those whom they invited. In that matter, as in Sunday-school work, they must not strive for their own success, or for the success of their church, but for the higher success of winning men to the side of God. To do this they must make evident by their own goodness the goodness of their Father. As the little leaves waving in the air reflected the colour of the sky, so must their little lives reflect some heavenly rays. Let them have a reasonable enthusiasm for other's good, and with that unselfish, impersonal, Christ-like motive power, success was certain, or he would almost doubt that human nature had in it the spark divine—(applause).

The Rev. JAMES HARWOOD said he had a special interest in the relation of their young people to the church. He had, of course, the fullest sympathy with the discussions which had taken place at the Liverpool Conference and in the British and Foreign Unitarian Association with regard to the extension of their principles upon those beyond their own borders, and he thought it one of the healthiest signs of life in their churches that that interest should be aroused, and not only so, but also that some response should be given to the efforts which had been made. They had the pleasure of welcoming amongst them, both as ministers and laity, those who had been brought up in other churches, and felt that their true home as religious men and women was in the free churches. He joined as heartily as any one could do in extending a welcome to those who thus came, but at the same time he felt they were failing in an important half of their work if they were not able to retain those who had been born and brought up amongst them; and to himself it was a painful thing to go into their chapels, especially the older ones, to see walls adorned by tablets and memorials of the departed, and then when one asked where the representatives of those people were now, to be told that although they might be in the neighbourhood they were not true to the professions of their fathers. He might be treading on delicate ground, for that chapel in which they were assembled possessed numerous monuments, but he had no ground for supposing that the representatives of those men were at all unworthy of their predecessors. The experience of many present would confirm his own, that this falling off was frequently the case, and he maintained they were bound in duty to ask themselves how it was? No doubt a certain proportion went away from sincere conviction. Theological progress was not always in the direction of a straight line, and there were such things as reversions as well as progressions. It might well be in a denomination which itself was not stationary. He used the word denomination simply as a convenience and not in the narrow sense of the word. Their view, on theology and religion were being developed and some must go faster than others. It was therefore perfectly natural that some might revert to the more orthodox churches, and one must respect their honesty to their own convictions and wish them well. But the difficulty was rather with those who slipped away from indifference, some because, perhaps, the spark of religion in their own nature had not been developed and stimulated as it ought to have been, others from still less worthy motives, from social influences and what not. It was with such that they had to be concerned, and he could not feel they got rid of the matter or that they ought to rid themselves of the feeling of responsibility, by simply saying that such people were indifferent or had gone away from unworthy feelings. Such people had been brought up in their churches, and speaking in the name of the parents, ministers, and all the general influences of their churches, they at all events had had opportunities of retaining and influencing those people which no one else had had, and therefore if there was indifference, how was it, and what was the remedy? He did not know how the responsibility was to be divided between the ministers and the parents. No doubt there was something to be said on both sides. The indifference and carelessness which were often shown by parents in regard to instructing their children in the religious principles which they themselves held was almost appalling. Too often the home influence in purely religious matters was of the slightest kind possible. When the children grew a little older they were sent to a boarding-school, without much consideration as to the influences to which they would be exposed. There might not be a chapel in the locality, or if there was and it was at all inconvenient or the slightest objection was raised by the teachers to the children attending such chapel, no trouble was taken in the matter. On the other hand, the children with whom they were thrown in contact came from orthodox homes with parents of strong convictions, who had given them very definite religious instruction—he did not mean doctrinal instruction only,—whose whole religious nature had been cultivated and whose religious emotions had certainly not been starved out in the way they too often were amongst our own churches. It was therefore only a natural consequence that children exposed to such influences formed their friendships almost exclusively out of the circle of their own church, and when the time came that they were allowed to choose their own course and the parental influence, such as it was, grew weaker and weaker in that particular respect, it need not be a matter of surprise that so many of them should drift away from the church of their fathers. They who were grown up ought not to allow themselves to look with indifference upon that matter. Reference had been made as to the reception of strangers, but on the minister's side of the question he thought ministers of experience would say that although a friendly word was very often very valuable it required a considerable knowledge and caution where and when that friendly word should be bestowed. The principal thing with which he was concerned was as to dealing with the younger members of what he might call their middle class families. He did not like to make those class distinctions, but as a matter of fact it was the rich people whom he had in his mind, the people whom in the interests of their cause they should be able to retain and not let them drift away to anything inferior to that under which they had been brought up. Mr. Harwood then referred at some length in the way of approval to the confirmation service mentioned in the morning by the President, and advocated some scheme by which the ministers and laity could be educated together as in the old days of York College. He hoped with increasing opportunities the laity would be alive to them and would take advantage of them, and then he was perfectly sure their churches would go on increasing in influence and power, and that the gains over which they rejoiced so much would not be counterbalanced by the losses which often caused so much grief and disappointment. Retaining those who lawfully and truly belonged to them, and gaining those who came to them by the natural gravitation of their own opinions, and the progress of enlightenment, the Free Churches of England would be stronger in the future than they had been in the past, and their influence would go on increasing not only in volume, but also being nobler, in kind.—(applause.)

The Rev. G. H. WELLS proposed "That the warmest thanks of the meeting be given to the minister and congregation of the Chowbent Chapel for the hospitable reception of the Assembly." He said he came there with feelings of no ordinary kind, for he had preached in that pulpit in his student days fifty-one years ago. Their venerated President, were he present, would state that the first sermon he ever preached was also in that pulpit. The Rev. Charles Beard told him a few days ago that he also preached his first sermon in that pulpit, and that it was extempore, and his mother and some other friends admonished him not to go on preaching in that sort of extemporaneous way. It would, therefore, be seen that the Chowbent Chapel had associations in the minds of some of the elder ministers that their younger brethren could not at present say they felt. Mr. Wells then gave an account of the manner in which a former minister of the chapel, the Rev. James Wood, often called "General Wood," collected two hundred young men and joined the royal troops against the forces of the young Pretender at the battle of Preston. He hoped Mr. Frankland would always be as well supported in his day as was "General Wood." Mr. Frankland had entered into the arrangements for the Assembly in the most hearty and zealous manner—(applause)—had been most diligent in his correspondence in ascertaining from those from whom he thought he could get it information as to the best mode of carrying to a successful issue the meeting of that day—(applause).

Mr. SMITH GOLLAND having seconded the resolution, it was carried with acclamation.

The Rev. M. C. FRANKLAND said they were most heartily welcome. The Chowbent congregation in that instance were the "country cousins," and were very glad to see their friends from the larger places. It was not often they had an opportunity of seeing their friends from a distance, but they often thought of them. Sometimes small country congregations were reminded they were a small body, but when they remembered that in the larger towns there were great men, and great efforts were being made, they in the country had no doubt the cause they had at heart was fully maintained, and making good ground—(applause). Mr. Frankland, then, standing almost on the top of the pulpit, gave a most interesting and instructive narrative of the monumental tablets which adorn the walls of this ancient chapel, and the worthies in whose memory they were erected, commencing with the Rev. Dr. John Taylor, of Norwich, and concluding with the late clerk, who for sixteen years officiated in the lowest "deck" of the pulpit, and who with his grandfather, his predecessor, brought the term of office to over a century.

The usual vote of thanks to the Chairman closed the proceedings of a most successful meeting of the Assembly.

WEST RIDING UNITARIAN MISSION SOCIETY.

The sixty-seventh annual meeting of this society was held on Wednesday, the 21st ult., at York. The proceedings commenced with service in St. Saviourgate Chapel, the preacher being the Rev. T. W. Freckleton, of London, who delivered an able discourse on the receptive and distributive nature of the religious faculty in man. At the close of the service luncheon was provided in the Kenrick Hall, to which one hundred and fifty ladies and gentlemen sat down. The room was tastefully decorated with bannerettes and choice flowers, and over the platform was the motto "Ring out the false, ring in the true." The annual meeting was subsequently held, presided over by Mr. J. S. MATHERS, of Leeds. Amongst those present were the Revs. Chas. Hargrove, M.A., M. S. Dunbar, M.A., [Iden Payne, Mr. John Lupton, Mr. James Kitson, J.P., Mr. G. Talbot, Mr. J. Connon, all of Leeds; Mr. John Armitage, Mr. C. Woollen, the Revs. Eli Fay and C. H. Osler, of Sheffield; Mr. Councillor Walker, Mr. Councillor Legge, the Rev. William Blazely, B.A., of Rotherham; Mr. Councillor Richards, the Rev. C. D. Badland, M.A., of Dewsbury; Mr. Padley, the Rev. D. Amos, of Scarborough; the Rev. F. E. Millson, Halifax; the Rev. J. M. Pilkington, Selby; the Rev. Alex. Ashworth, Doncaster; the Rev. A. Chalmers, Wakefield; Mr. G. C. Lee, of York; Mr. and Miss Swains, York, &c.

The annual report gave interesting particulars of the mission stations and congregations associated with the society at Dewsbury, Pepperhill, Pudsey, Elland, Lydgate, Doncaster, Thorne, and Selby. Speaking of Doncaster, the report stated that the congregation was assisted by grants both from this society and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. For some years the cause had laboured under difficulties. The present minister, the Rev. Alex. Ashworth, had devoted his best energies to the work with gradually improving results. He had re-constituted the congregation. A Sunday class was maintained, chiefly attended by the children of members of the chapel. At Thorne the Sunday services were maintained by local friends. During the past quarter, by means of a small grant from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Rev. A. Ashworth, the Doncaster minister, had been able to conduct at Thorne chapel alternate Sunday afternoon services. The old cause at Selby was advantageously assisted by the Mission. The minister, the Rev. J. M. Pilkington, conducted Sunday services, taught in the Sunday-school, carried on a good day school, and took oversight of an hospital for aged women. He was thus very usefully engaged, though the congregation and schools were but small. In conclusion, the report stated:—"Your committee would encourage increased support to be given to this Mission Society. Both Dewsbury and Elland present important claims for special consideration. A special resolution, appealing for larger support, will accordingly be submitted to the meeting by the committee. Your committee now represents twenty congregations, and is composed of forty lay representatives and twelve ministers. During the past year the society has suffered serious losses in the deaths of Mr. Passavant of Leeds, Mrs. Stevenson of Sheffield, Miss and Miss H. Copeland, and Miss Thompson, of Rotherham, and our hope and prayer must be that the devotion and liberality of the departed to the Mission will be worthily emulated by our younger members, and that in all our congregations fresh supporters will offer themselves, both to sustain and extend the operations of this society.

The Treasurer's account for the year, read by Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, of Burley, showed that the year commenced with a balance in hand of £4 17s. 4d.; Leeds had contributed £141 4s. 6d.; Dewsbury, £56 1s. 6d.; Pudsey, £19 15s. 3d.; Wakefield, £20; Sheffield, £15; Bradford, £19 4s. 6d.; Halifax, £14 2s. 1d.; and smaller amounts from Huddersfield, York, Lydgate, Rotherham, Selby, Elland, Pepperhill, and Doncaster. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association had contributed £30.

The total receipts for the year were £383 6s. 3d. The following grants had been made:—Pudsey, £150; Lydgate, £25; Doncaster, £45; Selby, £20; Thorne, £5; and there remained a balance due to the treasurer of £59 14s. 6d.

THE CHAIRMAN'S ADDRESS.

Mr. J. S. MATTHEWS delivered the opening address. He said that those who took any interest whatever in political, social, educational, and religious movements and problems must at times feel overwhelmed with the difficulties and work which now lay before them, and disheartened when they reckoned up the sum of their labours. At the same time there was a feeling on the committee that the society should attempt something more. The society had been known by various names. It was originally denominated "A Society of Protestant Dissenters in the West Riding of Yorkshire for promoting, by the distribution of tracts, the knowledge of the Christian religion and the practice of piety and righteousness." The word "Unitarian" was not found in the rules. In 1824, however, the Leeds branch called it the "Unitarian Tract Society," and as such it had been generally known, till the Mission was established in 1851, and the name was altered to "The West Riding Unitarian Tract and Village Mission Society." The proposed change in our constitution involved a further change of name. It was moved in your committee, that it be henceforth "The West Riding Unitarian Society." It would thus embrace those objects which, from time to time, have seemed, or may seem, most conducive to the diffusion of Christianity, as held by Unitarians, and may with propriety be regarded as the same society which originated in 1815. It seemed to the majority, however, that it was desirable to make the title more definite, and the name proposed to you is The West Riding Unitarian Mission Society. The word village is omitted, as our operations already include the corporate town of Dewsbury, and we hope in time to extend them to other large centres of population. The original idea of tract distribution was an excellent one, and he was sorry that it was ever dropped out of its aims. Strange as it might seem, the first impulse of a missionary nature which possessed the society was the conversion of the learned Brahmin Rammohun Roy from idolatry to simple theism. A plan for extensive missionary operations in India resulted. In 1824 there was the first notice of the dawn of missionary work in this society in the Riding. The report for that year mentioned "a small institution established amongst the Divinity students at the Manchester College, York, which perhaps we may be allowed to call a Missionary Society. It has now existed upwards of twelve months, and it has been attended with all the success which could be reasonably expected. Stations have been established at Malton, Selby, Bilton, near Wetherby, and Welburn, and two or three villages near to it, and the average congregations may be estimated at sixty regular attendants." At Welburn they had a Sunday-school of seventy scholars. Our Sheffield friends, who seemed not to have joined the society, wished in 1856 to do so. New blood must have soon made itself felt, for in the following year an alteration in the constitution of the society took place. It was in 1859 that the missionary zeal of the society seemed to take root. Attention was then turned to Dewsbury, Mirfield, Batley, Heckmondwike, &c., and successful mission work was there carried on. Many and brave were the men and women who upheld the Unitarian banner at that time. Again, the society had occasionally moved resolutions and sent petitions to the House of Commons on some question of theological disability. In 1861 a petition was forwarded to Parliament "praying that those who will not profess belief in future punishments may not be disqualified from giving legal evidence." In 1864 the Tract Society became the "West Riding Unitarian Tract and Village Mission Society." In 1856 the society had no chapels erected. In 1866 there were Pudsey, Pepperhill, Dewsbury, and Elland. In 1871 and 1872 a great stride was made. The ministers' stipends at Pudsey and Dewsbury were increased, and power given to the congregations of appointing their own minister. In the same years (1871 and 1872) there was a growing feeling inside and outside of the committee to break new ground, at Keighley, Bingley, Barnsley, Brighouse, Heckmondwike, &c. He believed that the general feeling of the committee in recent years was more in the direction of sustaining and improving their old congregations, and establishing new causes only in the centres of great populations. The desire to do good was so intense that they were apt to over-estimate their powers, and while under-rating the forces against them, they were prone to fall into the mistake that they had done little or no good. They then lost heart, and ran into the common error that organisation was just what was wanted to accomplish what they had individually failed to achieve. But he would give a warning word: Organisation could not of itself produce high principles. It could not give healthy religious life, nor impart unwavering convictions of duty. But where high principles, healthy religious life, and unwavering convictions of duty did exist, organisation could direct, strengthen, and encourage. Hence it was to the health and the purpose of the individual congregations connected with the society that they must look for true and abiding success. The first step in this success must be unity of purpose. What was wanted was earnest but serious and thoughtful enthusiasm. It was that which had accomplished all that had been worth accomplishing in the world. In conclusion, the CHAIRMAN spoke of the interesting question of church-going amongst the masses. He was not willing to accept as having been proved that according to numbers they were worse than other classes in attendance at worship. On the contrary, he maintained that they would compare favourably with any class above them. Nor was he willing to admit that they were spiritually darker than other classes. Nearly every reform, even religious, had sprung from the masses. If they had not always led they had supplied the motive power. Custom, habit, and interest induced a vast number to attend church. The real causes of non-attendance were indolence and indifference. If indolence and indifference came of varied causes, so must the means to meet them be varied also. The motive power would be found in earnestness and devotion. The Unitarians might dissent from the theology of Wesleyanism, or the millinery and adornments of the service of the Ritualists, or what some aesthetically religious souls called the vagaries of the Salvationists, but the success of all was to be found in the earnestness and devotion of both minister and people. At the same time let them remember that it would never be in the pulpit that the greatest good would be exercised; but in personal contact—at meetings, on the platform, in the schools, social converse, and in the homes of the people. The pitying eye, the silent grip of the hand, some thoughtful attention or gentle sympathising word, would do more real good than all the dogmas of all the churches put together. The chairman then moved:—

"That the reports of the committee and treasurer be adopted and printed; that the thanks of this meeting be given to the retiring officers; and that the committee for the ensuing year shall consist of lay representatives from all congregations associated with this society (each congregation having power to appoint three or fewer such representatives), together with the ministers of the congregations unaided by the Mission Fund and the hon. officers, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, treasurer; and Rev. Wm. Blazebury B.A., secretary."

Mr. PADLEY, Scarborough, seconded the resolution.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A., of Leeds, proposed that the following addition be made to the resolution, viz.:—"That the committee be and are hereby instructed to prepare and present to the annual meeting of the society a report giving a history of the society from its first foundation, and showing the progress of the work, and the amount of subscriptions for periods of five or ten years from the commencement; and, moreover, to draw up, if deemed practicable and desirable, a scheme whereby the constitution of the society might be so altered that, without abandoning the mission work so perseveringly carried on up to the present, it should be a main object of the society to effect a union of the Free Churches of Yorkshire for mutual encouragement and support." Mr. Hargrove deplored the fact that the large number of Unitarians in the West Riding only contributed £400 a year to the society. He wished its basis to be extended to include all the Free Churches of Yorkshire, for it was the only society which brought the Unitarians of a wide district of the county together.

The Rev. F. MILLSON seconded the motion.

The Rev. A. AMOS, Scarborough suggested that Whitby, Malton, and Scarborough, might be taken into the association, or formed into a separate union.

The Rev. F. S. MORRIS, York, supported the rider, and thought it would be beneficial if York and the other towns mentioned were included in the society.

The resolution and the addition were then put, and carried.

The Rev. F. S. MORRIS moved, and Mr. J. CONNOR, Leeds, seconded a vote of thanks to the Rev. T. W. Freckelton, of London, for his able and eloquent sermon.

The Rev. A. CHALMERS, of Wakefield, proposed:—"That this meeting expresses its earnest interest in the work of the mission stations and congregations associated with the society and their ministers, and returns its grateful thanks to the various ministers and lay preachers who have rendered their valuable services in mission work during the past year."

Mr. Councillor WALKER, of Rotherham, in complimentary terms, seconded the motion, which was carried and responded to by the Rev. C. D. BADLAND, and Mr. Joseph Wain, of York.

Mr. GROSVENOR TALBOT, of Leeds, moved, and Mr. CHARLES WOOLLEN, of Sheffield, seconded:—"That this meeting earnestly urges upon all the congregations of the district the importance and necessity of raising larger funds for adequately meeting the increasing requirements of the mission."

The resolution was carried unanimously, as was also the following special motion, which was proposed by the CHAIRMAN, and seconded by Mr. J. ARMYTAGE, Sheffield:—"That this meeting, while fully alive to the many difficulties besetting her Majesty's Government by the arrears of legislation, would still most earnestly press upon them the necessity of introducing, at the earliest possible date, a measure which will extend the privilege of Affirmation in Parliament and Courts of Justice, now accorded to the Friends, Moravians, and others, to all her Majesty's subjects."

Mr. C. M. MELTZER, of Dewsbury, proposed, and the Rev. J. BRAITHWAITE, of Idle, seconded, that hearty thanks be given to the York friends for their hospitable reception of the society.

On the proposition of Mr. Councillor RICHARDS, of Dewsbury, seconded by Mr. G. C. LEE, of York, a vote of thanks was given to the chairman for presiding.

The proceedings then terminated.

THE REMONSTRANT SYNOD OF ULSTER.

On Tuesday, June 20, at twelve o'clock, the annual meeting of the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster met in the First Presbyterian Church, Rosemary-street.

The OUTGOING MODERATOR (the Rev. John Dickson, Moira) occupied the chair, and at the opening of the meeting preached from Psalm lxi. 2:—"From out of the earth will I cry unto thee when my heart is overwhelmed; lead me to the Rock that is higher than I." Having then constituted the court with prayer, he delivered his outgoing address, in the course of which he said:—"To be a minister of a Church which, by the Divine blessing, has been the means of producing results so plain as to be capable of being 'known and read of all men' is a high distinction. But to be called to preside over this Synod as Moderator is, by me, considered a very high honour, which I shall ever cherish with grateful recollections."

The Rev. THOS. DUNKERLEY, Comber, was called to the chair as Moderator, and thanked the Synod for the honour conferred upon him.

The usual preliminary formalities were then gone through. The Rev. Moore Getty, Ballycarry, and the Rev. T. H. M. Scott, Dunmurry, were continued as clerk and assistant clerk respectively. It was resolved to hold the next meeting in the same place on the third Tuesday in June, 1883. A cordial vote of thanks was passed to the congregation of the First Presbyterian Church for its kindness in giving the Synod the use of the church for the purposes of the annual meeting. The following were invited to sit and deliberate:—The Revs. S. C. Nelson, Downpatrick; David Gordon, Downpatrick; J. C. Street, Belfast; R. E. Dunne, James Cooper, H. M. Macgownan, J. Miskimmon, and C. J. McAlester. The invitations were accepted with thanks by the brethren named.

REPORTS OF PRESBYTERIES.

TEMPLEPATRICK.—This Presbytery reported that their Moderator for the year is the Rev. James Caldwell. The congregation of Ballymena had been under the care of the Presbytery since last meeting. The only annuitant on the Widows' Fund is Mrs. Hall, Cairncastle. Three meetings were held during the year. The Templepatrick congregation continues under the care of the Presbytery.

BANGOR.—The report of the Bangor Presbytery stated that the Rev. John McCaw, Killinchy, is their Moderator for the year. The various congregations in connection with the Presbytery had been regularly supplied with properly qualified ministers. The only student in the ministry under care of the Presbytery is Mr. T. S. Mulligan. Three meetings were held during the year.

ARMAGH.—The Presbytery of Armagh reported that the Rev. David Thompson, Dromore, is their Moderator for the year. The annuitants on the Widows' Fund were Mrs. Alexander, Bray, and the family of the Rev. John Jennings.

The Rev. James Caldwell, Glenarm, applied to the Synod to relieve him of the responsibility and work of the ministry, on account of failing health.

On the motion of the Rev. MOORE GETTY, seconded by the Rev. F. McCAMMOND (Banbridge), and supported by the Rev. J. McCaw, the following resolution was agreed to:—"That this Synod, while deeply regretting the reason of Mr. Caldwell's wish to retire from the active duties of the congregation of Glenarm, feels constrained by the statement that Mr. Caldwell has made regarding his health and by the medical certificates to grant permission to the congregation of Glenarm to choose an assistant and successor."

It was resolved:—"That the financial condition of the Church is not satisfactory; that an improvement in the arrangement connected with the collection and payment of stipend is desirable; that the recommendation of the Synod of 1873, in favour of a printed annual statement of accounts, be generally carried out; and that this question be remitted to the presbyteries, with instruction that, by sermons preached in the congregations within their bounds, and other instrumentalities, they should do their utmost to promote congregational liberality, and to effect other improvements referred to in this resolution."

REPORT OF THE FINANCIAL COMMITTEE.

The Rev. D. THOMPSON (convenor) read the report of the Financial Committee. Regret was expressed at the removal by death of Mr. J. Lindsay, J.P., Tullyhenan, who had been most regular in his attendance at the meetings of the committee, and who, as trustee, and in other respects, showed a very warm interest in the Sustentation Fund. The address on behalf of the Sustentation Fund, by Mr. J. Smyth, jun., read at the last meeting, was circulated by the committee, who regarded it as certainly a very interesting and valuable sketch of the history of the fund, and also facts which they recommended to the careful consideration of the congregations. The committee regretted that the congregations of Ballymena and Moira had failed to comply with the requirements of the Sustentation Fund, and therefore lost their claims on that fund. A difference of opinion arose in the committee regarding the claims of the congregation of Rademon on the Sustentation Fund. It appeared that the congregation enjoyed the benefits of commutation effected by the Rev. J. Kennedy, a former minister, and, that being so, some members of the Finance Committee thought the congregation was not entitled to the usual dividends of the Sustentation Fund. It was agreed by the sub-committee appointed to consider the question to take the opinion of counsel. The opinion thus obtained was submitted to a pro re nata meeting of Synod held on April 15 last, and the Synod by resolution empowered the trustees to pay the annual dividend to the Rademon congregation. The sole remaining trustee of the Sustentation Fund, Mr. J. Miller, J.P., Comber, nominated the following:—The Rev. J. A. Crozier, the Rev. D. Thompson, Dr. J. Lindsay, jun., J. Smyth, jun., W. Davidson, J.P., H. J. McCance, Thos. Andrews, Comber. The last-named gentleman was not able to act owing to other duties, a circumstance which the committee regretted to report. A sum of £100 from the Dunbar Fund has been allotted to Comber, Baloo, Cairncastle, Warrenpoint, £25 each.

The report was adopted; and a resolution appointing the Committee of Finance was agreed to.

In the absence of Mr. J. Smyth, Banbridge,

The Rev. D. THOMPSON read the report on the Sustentation Fund. The report stated that the same six congregations which were receiving help from the fund last year were still receiving aid. There were now ten congregations in connection with the fund. The income from the congregations was £21 less this year than it was last year, the result of a withdrawal of the annual contributions of Moira and Ballymena, and to the circumstance that part of the contribution of Banbridge was paid the previous year. In the other congregations there were some slight differences in the payments, which, on the whole amounted to a small increase on the revenue. The deficiency now in this source of income was £9 16s. The investments were £22 5s. 1d. more than in the previous year, and that was the result of an increase in the capital from £5,646 to £5,965. In addition to the investments mentioned in last report a £100 share in the Dublin and Kingstown Railway stock had been purchased. The balance now in the hands of the trustees of this fund in the Ulster Bank is £53 12s. 4d.

The report was adopted, and a vote of thanks was passed to the auditors, Mr. Hunter, Knock, and Mr. T. Andrews, Comber, for the way in which they had audited the accounts. Mr. Andrews, at his own request, was not asked to continue in the office of auditor; and Mr. J. M. Dickson was appointed as a substitute, on the motion of the Rev. J. A. Crozier, seconded by the Rev. D. THOMPSON.

It was resolved to renew the following resolution passed at previous meeting:—"That we adhere to our former system of paying every minister who receives aid from the Sustentation Fund the sum of £50 for the present year."

The subjoined resolution was also agreed to:—"That the wealthier members of the congregation in connection with the Synod be recommended to increase, by donations and legacies, the Sustentation Fund, and that exchange of pulpits be organised in order to carry out that object."

THE BALLYMENA CONGREGATION.

The Rev. DAVID MATTS (Ballymoney) reported the position of affairs in connection with the Ballymena congregation. Last year it was agreed that the Hallelujah Army, which had possession of the meeting-house in Ballymena, should be forthwith required to give up possession. It was also agreed last year that the Rev. J. McCaw, the Rev. D. Thompson, and the Rev. J. A. Crozier should make arrangements with the view to having a minister settled in this congregation. Mr. McCaw and Mr. Thompson reported the results of their efforts. The interviews which they had held with the congregation resulted in a most unsatisfactory issue. The deputation urged the necessity of an immediate withdrawal of the Hallelujah Army, but that has not yet taken place. The Rev. R. CLELAND reported the receipt of a letter from Lord Waveney on the subject. His Lordship was desirous to see the congregation of the Synod continued. It was agreed to put the Ballymena congregation in charge of a committee.

The MODERATOR pronounced the benediction, and the meeting concluded.

[Owing to the pressure on our space we are unavoidably compelled to hold over the "Association of Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterians and other Free Christians" meeting till next week.]

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION

ANNUAL MEETING.

The annual meeting of the American Unitarian Association was held in Hollis-street Church, Boston, Tuesday, May 30, at 9.30 a.m., the Hon. Charles Allen, Vice-President, in the chair. Prayer was offered by the Rev. William O. White. The records were read by the secretary, the Rev. Grindall Reynolds, and the Board of Directors for the ensuing year were elected. The Secretary then read the annual report, which showed that 193 congregations responded to the call for contributions, which amounted to £7,000, a steady gain over preceding years. The report stated that during the past year the feeble societies in New England had been sustained; the work in college towns has been maintained and increased; the number of missionaries in new States and territories has been enlarged; while never has there been a freer distribution of our tracts and books. Meanwhile, some special works of immediate necessity have claimed attention, and demanded a large expenditure of money. The saving of the old societies in New Orleans and Evansville, the aiding of the Spring-garden Society in Philadelphia to purchase a church building, the establishment of the interesting mission to the Scandinavians of the North-west under the charge of Kristofer Janson, are instanced as enterprises which have been attended with gratifying success.

The report then considered in detail the most prominent features [of the work of the year, and closed with the following resolutions:—

"That the experience of the past has shown that the varied work of the Association cannot be satisfactorily performed with any sum less than 50,000 dollars, and that it is a duty which our churches owe to the truth for which they stand to furnish every year that sum."

"That, in view of the great opportunities for successful missionary efforts which are now opening, it is the duty of the Association to engage in fresh and broader work, and that our churches should recognise that it is their privilege to sustain the Association in so doing."

"That we owe a deep debt of gratitude to Mr. J. H. Wade for his offer to endow a Theological School at Cleveland, and that our people should give immediate and serious consideration to the question, whether our body can co-operate with him in the establishment of such a school as he desires."

THE EVENING MEETING.

The evening meeting of the Association was held in the Music Hall, on Tuesday, May 30. The Hon. CHARLES ALLEN presided. A delightful organ voluntary by Mr. B. J. Lang, and excellent singing by the quartette of the South Congregational Church, opened the exercises. Prayer was offered by the Rev. F. Frothingham.

The Rev. F. B. HORN BROOKE was the first speaker. He thought that there is much in the signs of the times to comfort and to encourage. The way to victory was never better paved. A vantage ground is ours which did not belong to our fathers, or even to those who struggled for the liberal cause twenty years ago. At that time a systematic theology was set up against progress. To-day Calvinism is disintegrating, and all that holds orthodox societies together is the sentiment associated with the past victories that were won by those systems. Liberal Christianity can now stand up and say to those systems of Protestant theology: "We are as certain of our ground, we are more consistent in our position than are you. At any rate, we thoroughly believe what we do believe, and do not pretend to subscribe that which we do not believe." That is in our favour. Again, the things for which we contend are larger and nobler; for, instead of contending for a certain interpretation of Scripture, we are striving to understand what Christianity really means.

The Rev. C. G. AMES gave a brief history of the new Spring Garden Society of Philadelphia. Mr. Ames then passed to speak of the importance of creating and multiplying live churches, taking for his text some words made in the last report by Dr. Bellows to the National Conference: "Nothing but churches—organised and perpetual schools in this art of faith and life—ought to satisfy our zeal or to guide our policy." "You know what you have done when you have created a church where there was none before!" "If every local Conference aimed to increase its numbers by one new church every year; if every church of vigour and means would create a daughter church every two years; if every minister of commanding powers would constitute himself a missionary on his off Sundays, and instead of scattering his fire would found a new church and nourish it into self-support—then we should be following the primitive and apostolic way; we should give our churches something to do besides maintaining a service every Sunday, and we should again buzz and hum with busy and charming life instead of growing sleepy and lame and rusty, and then talking about the decay, or tendency to ruin, of the Unitarian cause"—words worth repeating once a year in this assembly.

The Rev. F. HOSMER spoke warmly on behalf of the proposed Theological School at Cleveland.

The Rev. T. R. SLICER made a very brief address, in which he drew attention to the relation of Unitarianism to the spirit of religious unrest and theological discontent prevalent in the orthodox churches. The mission of Unitarianism is to show that the Bible is not a book, but books; and that when we differentiate between book and books we do not question them as repositories of religious experience. We own Christ to be the supreme flower of humanity. The test of inspiration of the Scriptures is the end and effect. The mission of Unitarianism is that it is able to accept the word of its Master and to touch human nature on every side as he did, and to harmonise the great essentials of restraint and inspiration.

The Rev. KRISTOFER JANSON was the last speaker, and was received with marked attention. The singing of the doxology closed the exercises of the evening.

THE FESTIVAL.

The "festival" for the clergy and their wives and lay friends, corresponding with what we call "The Collation," took place on the next day at the Music-hall, which was filled with a large assembly. The Hon. John Lowell presided, and we observe that the Rev. C. H. A. Dall, Unitarian missionary at Calcutta, who was in London last week, returned thanks. The Hon. R. S. Rantoul, of Salem, welcomed the guests, on behalf of whom the Rev. F. TIFFANY responded.

Dr. O. W. HOLMES, the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table," read the following poem he had written for the occasion:—

The waves unbuild the wasting shore;
Where mountains towered the billows sweep,
Yet still their borrowed spoils restore
And raise new empires from the deep.
So, while the floods of thought lay waste
The old domain of chartered creeds,
Its heaven-appointed tides will haste
To shape new homes for human needs.

Be ours to mark with hearts unchilled
The change an outworn age deplores;
The legend sinks, but Faith shall build
A fairer throne on new-found shores.
The star shall glow in Western skies
That shone o'er Bethlehem's hallowed shrine,
And once again the temple rise
That crowned the rock of Palestine.

Not when the wondering shepherds bowed
Did angels sing their latest song,
Nor yet to Israel's kneeling crowd
Did Heaven's one sacred dome belong,—
Let priest and prophet have their dues,
The Levite counts but half a man,
Whose proud "salvation of the Jews"
Shuts out the good Samaritan!
Though scattered far the flock may stray,
His own the shepherd still shall claim,—
The saints who never learned to pray,—
The friends who never spoke his name.
Dear Master, while we hear thy voice
That says, "The truth shall make you free,"
Thy servants still, by loving choice,
O keep us faithful unto thee!

Other addresses were made by various speakers; the Rev. C. G. AMES speaking most seriously of the great field ready for the earnest workers in all churches, especially in the liberal church, and the Rev. J. H. MORRISON, D.D., brought to mind the memories, both glad and sorrowful, of Dr. Dewey and Dr. Bellows. Mr. A. P. ALLEN, from London, late of Lynn, expressed gratitude for what American Unitarianism had wrought of good to him and to his nation. The Rev. H. W. FOOT spoke of the value of traditions, and the Rev. J. S. THOMPSON on the strength of Unitarianism.

A unique feature of the evening was a tale from the Norse, recited by Rev. Kristofer Janson. The noble sentiment it embodied was, it is stated, as pure and fresh as the breezes of his native fjords.

The Christian Register, in an article on the Anniversaries, writes:—"The decline of the 'missionary spirit,' so called, is marked in all quarters; but the work set for Unitarianism to do will not therefore suffer. A new perception of the meaning of our commission is evident. To be one of the forces shaping the civilisation of the American nation, to bring to the moral sentiment motive and stimulus, to assist in giving influence to the best ideas in public and social affairs, may well become the sources of inspiration to us, apart from our special ideas. In shaping the social and national fortunes of this people, the Unitarian Church is called to a work peculiarly suited to its genius. Many were the indications that, with new energy and enlightened interest, it will begin to devote itself to the work of making pure morality and pure religion manifest forces in the future life of our nation. To this end, we must have schools, colleges, churches, books, money, and men; and, when once we see what form our work is to take, we prophesy an awaking of interest and a steady increase of resources, which will make the triumphs of the past insignificant.

METROPOLITAN BOARD SCHOOLS.—A return showing the number of children on the roll of each standard in the Board schools of the metropolis gives as the total number of boys, girls, and infants, 291,711. Of these the boys number 93,454; girls, 86,246; mixed (boys and girls), 13,233; infants, 98,760. These children are arranged in eight divisions—namely, six standards, some below any standard, and some above all the standards. The highest rate of percentage—that of 27.9—is for children below even Standard I.; the next highest percentage, 21.7, is in Standard I.; and each higher standard carries a lower ratio of percentage, necessarily on account of the higher demands made upon the children. Those beyond the sixth standard reach only .6 per cent.

Our Calendar.

SUNDAY, JULY 2.

LONDON.

Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, at Little Portland-street Chapel, at 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M.
Rev. CHAS. VOYSEY, at Langham-hall, 43, Great Portland-street, 11.15 A.M.

* Notices of Sunday Services are inserted in this Calendar at 6d. a line, and of other Meetings and Service gratis, provided a detailed Advertisement appears.

SELECTED BOOKS.

Blunt's (Rev. J. H.) Reformation of the Church of England, Vol. 2, A.D. 1547-1662, 18/
Erskine (Hon. H.), Lord Advocate for Scotland, with Notices of certain of his Kinsfolk and of his Time, by Lieut.-Col. A. Fergusson, 31/6
Garibaldi (Giuseppe), Life of, Italian Hero and Patriot, by H. Blackett, 3/6
Lethbridge's (R.) High Education in India, 5/
Saint-Amand (Imbert de): Marie-Antoinette et l'Agonie de la Royauté, 3fr. 50.
Smyth's (Rev. N.) The Religious Feeling a Study for Faith, 2/

Mr. WALTER MAWER, Sunday School Association Office, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C., will supply any of the above-named new books and new editions, at the price named, carriage free, on receipt of Post-office Order, payable at the East Strand Post-office.

MARRIAGE.

CARLISLE—HOLLAND—On the 20th ult., at Little Portland-street Chapel, London, by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, M.A., John, second son of John Carlisle, Esq., M.A., of Belfast, to Lucy, daughter of the late Charles Holland, Esq., of Liscard Vale, Cheshire.

DEATH.

BURROWS—On the 18th ult., at High Barnet, of diphtheria, Marguerite Caroline (Daisy), youngest and dearly loved child of Herbert and Mary Burrows, aged 8 years.

The Inquirer,

A Religious, Political, and Literary Newspaper, and Record of Reverent Free Thought.

ESTABLISHED 1842.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

One Copy for 3 months (13 weeks) (prepaid)	5s. 5d.
" " " " (not prepaid)	6s. 0d.
Ditto for 6 months (prepaid)	10s. 6d.
" " " " (not prepaid)	11s. 11d.
Ditto for 12 months (prepaid)	£1. 1s. 0d.
" " " " (not prepaid)	£1. 3s. 10d.

ADVERTISEMENT SCALE.

Up to and inclusive of first five lines . 2s. 6d.
Each line afterwards 0s. 4d.
For Six consecutive insertions, 25 per cent. less.
For Thirteen " " 50 "

All payments in respect of the INQUIRER are to be made to Mr. WALTER MAWER, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C., to whom all Advertisements and Business communications should be sent.

All Letters and items of Intelligence intended for publication should be addressed "To the Editor of the INQUIRER," 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE XIXTH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY,
ADELAIDE-PLACE, LONDON-BRIDGE, E.C.
SHARES £10, Payable in one Sum or by Periodical Payments.

Directors—Henry Waldemar Lawrence, Mark H. Judge, F. H. A. Hardcastle, Eliza Orme, George Palmer, M.P., Mary E. Richardson, and Henry Rut.

This Society affords the means of investing money in large or small sums with complete safety at good interest. Interest on Shares 5 per cent. per annum, paid half-yearly. Deposits received at 4 per cent. Withdrawals up to £10 at three days' notice. Prospectus free of FREDERICK LONG, Manager and Secretary.

LONDON.—WEST-CENTRAL TEMPERANCE HOTEL, 97, 99, 101, Southampton-row, Russell-square.—Patronised and highly commended by the Rev. D. S. Govett, M.A., English Chaplain, Gibraltar; Rev. H. M. Holden, M.A., St. Bartholomew's, Bradford, Yorkshire; Rev. Canon French, M.A., Killaloe, Ireland, &c. Central, quiet, exceptionally clean, moderate in charges. Visitors' Drawing Room. Breakfast or Tea, 1s. 3d. Beds from 1s. 6d. Printed Tariff Card on application.

FREDERIC SMITH, Proprietor.

ASSURANCE AGAINST ACCIDENTS OF ALL KINDS.
ASSURANCE AGAINST RAILWAY ACCIDENTS ALONE
ASSURANCE AGAINST FATAL ACCIDENTS AT SEA.
ASSURANCE OF EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

Railway Passengers' Assurance Company,
THE OLDEST AND LARGEST COMPANY, INSURING
AGAINST ACCIDENTS OF ALL KINDS.

The Right Hon. LORD KINNAIRD, Chairman.

Subscribed Capital, £1,000,000.

PAID-UP CAPITAL AND RESERVE, £240,000.

MODERATE PREMIUMS

Bonus allowed to Insurers after five years,

£1,700,000

HAS BEEN PAID AS COMPENSATION.

Apply to the Clerks at the Railway Stations, the Local Agents, or

64, CORNHILL,
or 8, GRAND HOTEL BUILDINGS, CHARING-CROSS,
LONDON.

WILLIAM J. VIAN, Secretary.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY:

FOR JULY, 1882, Price 2s. 6d.

The "Home Rule" Fallacy. By Professor GOLDWIN SMITH.
The Caucus and its Critics. By F. SCHNADHORST.
The Proposed University of Music. By Sir JULIUS BENEDICT.
Climate in Town and Country. By Professor FRANKLAND.
An Apologue. By J. H. SHORTHOUSE, Author of "John Inglesant."
Civil Service Examinations. By W. BAPTISTE SCOONES.
Muhammed and his Teaching. By Professor MONIER WILLIAMS.
Theory of Political Epithets. By G. J. HOLYOAKE.
Electric Light and Force. By the Right Hon. Viscount BURY.
Fair Play to Landlords. By the Right Hon. the Earl of BELMORE.
A Note on Thought-Reading. By Professor DONKIN.
With the Emigrants. By J. H. TUKE.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, AND CO., LONDON.

Quarterly, Price 2s. 6d.

THE MODERN REVIEW.

CONTENTS FOR JULY.

The Book of Wisdom. By REGINALD LANE POOLE, M.A., Ph.D.
Tennyson's "Despair." By CHARLES SHAKESPEARE, M.A.
The Religious Situation in France. By ERNEST FONTANES.
Charles Darwin: his Life and Work. By Dr. W. B. CARPENTER, F.R.S.
Wordsworth's Two Styles. By R. H. HUTTON, M.A.
Elizabeth Stuart, Queen of Bohemia. II. By H. SCHUTZ WILSON.
Justin and the Fourth Gospel. I. By Dr. EDWIN A. ABBOTT.
The Temple of Sorrow. A Poem. By the Hon. RODEN NOEL.
Notes and Discussions. By T. TYLER, M.A., and C. C. COE, F.R.G.S.
Notices of Books.

Published for the Proprietors by

JAMES CLARKE AND CO., 13 AND 14, FLEET-STREET, LONDON.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

WORK OF UNITARIANS IN THE PAST AND THE FUTURE. The Sermon Preached at the Annual Meeting, May 31, in Unity Church, Islington, by the Rev. Dr. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE. Price One Penny. Fifty copies will be sent, carriage free, for 3s.; one hundred for 5s. A large edition having been printed with a view to the widest possible circulation.

SERMONS, by ROBERT COLLYER. Cheap Issue. Price 2s.

POSITIVE ASPECTS OF UNITARIAN THOUGHT AND DOCTRINE. Cheap Edition, 1s.
TEXTS AND MARGINS of the REVISED NEW TESTAMENT. By Dr. G. VANCE SMITH, 1s.
A Cheap Edition of this work is now issued, price 3d.

Address, Miss C. PHILPOT, Bookroom, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London.

Just published, 8vo., price 10s. 6d., cloth,

PROFESSOR KUENEN'S HIBBERT LECTURES, 1882, on NATIONAL RELIGIONS AND UNIVERSAL RELIGIONS. Delivered in Oxford and London, in April and May, 1882. By A. KUENEN, LL.D., D.D., Professor of Theology at Leyden.

PROFESSOR KUENEN'S GREAT WORK.

THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL TO THE FALL OF THE JEWISH STATE. By Dr. A. KUENEN, Professor of Theology at the University, Leyden. Translated from the Dutch by A. H. MAY.

3 vols., 8vo., cloth, price 31s. 6d.

The previous Hibbert Lectures—

1881.—T. W. RHYS DAVIDS. On the Origin and Growth of Religion, as illustrated by some points in the History of Indian Buddhism.

1880.—M. ERNEST RENAN. On the Influence of the Institutions, Thought and Culture of Rome on Christianity, and the Development of the Catholic Church. Translated into English by the Rev. CHARLES BEARD, of Liverpool.

1879.—P. LE PAGE RENOUF. Lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion, as illustrated by the Religion of Ancient Egypt.

1878.—Professor MAX MULLER's Lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion, as illustrated by the Religions of India.

May be had at 10s. 6d. each volume.

WILLIAMS and NORGATE, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London; and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

Just published, 8vo., cloth, 10s. 6d.

A SHORT PROTESTANT COMMENTARY on the Books of the NEW TESTAMENT: with general and special Introductions. Edited by Professors P. W. SCHMIDT and F. VON HOLZENDORFF. Translated from the Third German Edition, by the Rev. F. H. JONES, B.A. (in 2 vols.). Vol. I., Matthew to Acts.
Vol. II. will be published in the Autumn.

Subscribers to the THEOLOGICAL TRANSLATION FUND LIBRARY receive this Volume for 7s. Prospectus with Contents of the Series post free on application.

WILLIAMS and NORGATE, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London; and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

APARTMENTS FURNISHED.—Comfortable Sitting-room, with one or two bedrooms, in a quiet house. Suited for a gentleman or two friends.—Address, Mrs. Kemp, 58, Pyrlaud-road, Canonsbury, N.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK.—Current Accounts opened according to the usual practice of other Bankers, and Interest allowed on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £25. No commission charged for keeping Accounts.

The Bank also receives money on Deposit at Three per cent. Interest, repayable on demand.

The Bank undertakes, for its Customers, free of charge, the custody of Deeds, Writings, and other Securities and Valuables; the collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the purchase and sale of Stocks and Shares.

Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued.

A Pamphlet, with full particulars, on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane.

THE BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY'S ANNUAL RECEIPTS EXCEED FOUR MILLIONS.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH, with Immediate Possession, and no Rent to pay. Apply at the Office the BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH, with Immediate Possession, either for Building or Gardening purposes. Apply at the Office of the BIRKBECK FREE HOLD LAND SOCIETY.

A Pamphlet, with full particulars, on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane.

FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, CROYDON.

The members of this Congregation having determined to rebuild their church in accordance with the drawing accompanying the present issue of the Inquirer, desire to invite the contributions of former members and well-wishers residing at a distance. Subscriptions will be gratefully received by the Honorary Treasurer, JAMES PAGE, Esq., Addiscombe Lodge, Croydon.

Amounts already promised:—

	£	s.	d.
Jesse Fagg, Esq.
R. Cuddiford, Esq.
C. L. Kingston, Esq.
H. Moore, Esq.
A. Nicholls, Esq.
J. Jeffers, Esq.
B. Latham, Esq.
Mrs. Miller
E. Fagg, Esq.
W. H. Teulon, Esq.
F. Walters, Esq.
Other amounts

Total to date 3621 15 0

MISS BOWRING, holding an Honour Certificate from Dublin University, and having passed Groups A and B in the Cambridge (Higher) Examinations, wishes to instruct Pupils, either personally or by correspondence, in English, French, German, and Latin. Seven years' experience in teaching. Good testimonials.—Address, 160, Bower-street, Maidstone.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Mrs. HOOD will be pleased to receive a few GIRLS to board and educate. Special arrangements made for delicate girls during the winter months.—Address, care of the Rev. ALFRED HOOD, Bournemouth.

HIGH SCHOOL, STOKE GREEN, NEAR COVENTRY, established (1865) by the Rev. G. HEAVISIDE, B.A., of University and Manchester New Colleges, London, promotes a Liberal Education at a moderate cost.

BRENTWOOD, WORSLEY, near MANCHESTER.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.
Principal MRS. F. SHAWCROSS,
late of Brook House, Knutsford.
The NEXT TERM begins MONDAY, May 8.
For prospectus, apply to the Principal.

"THE FORT, MARGATE."—APARTMENTS in a well-furnished house, facing the sea, on moderate terms.

Address, Mrs. Stabback, Lansdowne Lodge, the Fort Margate.

BRIGHTON.—Apartments, with or without Board, at Miss Wood's, 12, Lower Rock Gardens. Three minutes from Madeira-walk and the Chain Pier.

LAW.—To articled CLERKS intending to spend their last year in London. A Graduate of London, B.A., LL.B., admitted in 1864, will be glad to receive a gentleman for the last year or whole time of his articles. Personal assistance, if desired, for the Final Pass or Honours' Examination. Facilities can also be given for acquiring a good knowledge of short hand and English composition.—Address, X. Y. Z., care of W. Mawer, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C.

SWITZERLAND.—A Gentleman, who has made eight walking tours in Switzerland, would be willing to take charge of two young gentlemen whose parents may desire to give them such a holiday under careful and experienced guidance.—For particulars, address before Aug. 1, Rev. S. Farrington, 7, Acorn-street, Manchester.

SEASONABLE DELICACY.

BROWN & POLSON'S CORN FLOUR

As Blanc-Mange, Custard, Baked Pudding, &c.

WITH

STEWED FRUIT

OF ANY KIND.

Printed by WOODFALL and KINDER, of Milford-lane, Strand W.C.; and Published for the Proprietors by WALTER MAWER, at the Offices of the SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London, W.C.—Saturday, July 1, 1882

The Inquirer.

A Religious, Political, & Literary Newspaper, & Record of Reberent Free Thought

[REGISTERED AT THE GENERAL POST-OFFICE AS A NEWSPAPER.]

No. 2089.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 8, 1882.

[PRICE 5D.]

CONTENTS.

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:—

Suitable and Unsuitable Topics of Preaching	437
Religion in Modern Rome	437
Our Manchester Letter	439
Franklin Howorth	439
Dr. Williams's Trust—XXXII.	441

OCCASIONAL NOTES ... 442

REVIEWS:—

Ueber das Teleologische Fundamental-princip der Allgemeinen Pädagogik	443
---	-----

CORRESPONDENCE:—

English Unitarianism	444
The Revised New Testament	444

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE:—

The Home Missionary Board	444
The Home Missionary Conference...	445
Presbyterian College, Carmarthen	446
Association of Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterians and other Free Christians	447

THE LIBERAL PULPIT:—

Confirmation Address	451
----------------------	-----

SUITABLE AND UNSUITABLE TOPICS OF PREACHING.

THE address of Sir JAMES LAWRENCE at the recent annual meeting of the London District Unitarian Society and the letter by a Unitarian Minister which appeared in our columns a week or two afterwards, commenting on that address, open up a subject of considerable importance to our ministers, namely this—whether arguments on the existence of God and the immortality of the soul are suitable subjects for ordinary preaching. The President of the London District Society takes very decidedly one view, and our correspondent quite as decidedly the opposite view. There is something to be said on both sides of the question. We cannot go altogether with Sir JAMES LAWRENCE; still we are very much in agreement with him. An ordinary Unitarian congregation consists of persons who already believe in God and the immortality of man. These are the fundamental doctrines which unite them as an assembly of religious worshippers. The very fact of their meeting together week by week for the express purpose of uniting in prayer and praise, and engaging a minister to conduct their worship, shows that the belief in God and the duty of worshipping Him are assumed by them. They are not open questions, but accepted settled beliefs. They are matters upon which it may be fairly assumed that the members of every ordinary congregation have made up their minds, and do not wish or need to have their faith called in question. Does it seem consistent for a congregation after engaging in solemn prayer to God and lifting their voices unitedly in his praise then to have to listen to a discourse arguing the question whether such a Being exists at all? First pray to God, then have their minds thrown into an attitude of doubt and uncertainty whether any God exists! Is not such a proceeding the very height of inconsistency, to use no harsher term? Is it not calculated to pain and distress the devout heart which has just been pouring forth its sentiments of thankfulness and adoration to the Great Supreme? We are convinced that such argumentative disquisitions, delivered under these circumstances, have been listened to with pain by many a devout hearer.

What is the object of preaching? Surely it is not to prove the existence of God, or the immortality of the soul. It is not as members of a debating society that we meet in the house of prayer. The object of preaching is to quicken devout feeling, to awaken religious emotion, to deepen religious impression, to bring home to the heart and conscience convictions already accepted by the mind, but needing to be made more vital and operative. It is taken for granted that certain beliefs exist, and on the ground of these the preacher appeals to the religious nature and seeks to invigorate, to strengthen and inspire it. He might say with the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, "Leaving the principles of the doctrine of CHRIST, let us go on unto perfection; not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works and of faith toward GOD." The preacher who is continually digging about the old foundation is like a child pulling up to-day what it planted yesterday, to see if it had taken root. We are very much, then, of the same opinion as Sir JAMES LAWRENCE, that ministers and missionaries preaching on such topics as the affirmation of GOD,—the probability, possibility, or certainty of an immortal life are departing from their true work; and that those simple propositions lie at the root of all preaching, whether by Unitarians or others.

It is worth while to inquire, have we not been too much bent on arguing and proving in our preaching? Instead of simple appeals to the heart and conscience our sermons have been disquisitions on difficult and controverted questions—instead of religion itself our topic has been the philosophy of religion; instead of winning the heart, have not some of us too frequently only puzzled the mind? And is it not to be feared that sometimes our hearers have gone away empty and unsatisfied, instead of having their hearts warmed by the discourse of an earnest religious spirit? Some ministers, whatever the topic they handle, must begin at the very beginning, as if nothing must be taken for granted, however familiar the theme. We are reminded here of a passage in the memoir of the late Mr. SAMUEL GREG, in that excellent book "A Layman's Legacy." Writing to a minister who had requested his opinion of a sermon he had heard him preach, Mr. GREG says:—"I could not understand why you thought it necessary to prove that man has a soul, in order to convince your hearers that for the soul to be without knowledge is not good. And yet I suppose this was the point on which you intended your former argument to bear. . . Was not the suggestion of the doubt more likely to give it entrance into their minds than the arguments which followed, or any that possibly could have followed, were likely to remove it? Was it not putting a question in order to answer it? Starting a difficulty in order to explain it? And is there no danger in an unnecessary discussion on such a subject, of sometimes unconsciously leaving the strength of the argument on the wrong side of the question?"

We are assured that this is no imaginary danger, and that it is always incurred by the inconsiderate treatment of difficult and doubtful questions. Such unseasonable ill-advised discussions are answerable for a large amount of the crude, popular unbelief of the day.

Do we object, then, to such topics as the existence of GOD and the immortal life being discussed? By no means. We only object to them when obtruded as part of the ordinary ministrations of the pulpit. Let them be discussed in courses of lectures previously announced, so that those who come may know what they are going to listen to; and even then there needs to be great care on the part of the lecturer, for the subjects named above are of such a character that the discussion of them, unless it be judicious, does more harm than good. It creates more doubts than it removes, or excites doubt where, perhaps, none before existed. It has been said that "Butler's Analogy" made more doubters than believers. Works, too, on the Christian Evidences not unfrequently expose the weakness of the cause they are intended to defend. If Theism or Christianity is to be successfully defended in this age, it can only be by a union, far from common, of prudence and ability. An able man needs to think twice before he undertakes the task. We do not write this in order to discourage the discussion of these subjects when the suitable conditions are present, but only when they are not present, as we conceive they are not in ordinary Sunday preaching. In fact, it seems to us that arguments on the existence of GOD, the future life, or any other difficult question, are best read quietly over, and pondered by the inquirer with an able treatise before him. His attention then is not distracted by any disturbing element, as the voice and manner of a popular lecturer. He can read leisurely, pause when needful as he goes along, and so follow BACON'S advice to read, not to contradict or confute, not to believe and take for granted, but to weigh and consider. We do not go, then, with Sir JAMES LAWRENCE, who seems to object to such discussions altogether, but we do say, let them be discussed under such conditions as will be calculated to promote—not injure—the cause of truth.

RELIGION IN MODERN ROME.

ROME is the mother of the nations and churches of Europe. From her we derive our laws, civilisation, and, largely, our languages and modes of thought. Very early her idea of Christianity became supreme, and her missionaries spread far and wide the notion of the faith of CHRIST which was vouched for by the successors of ST. PETER. The great schoolmen dressed it in the garb of philosophy. DANTE put its mythology of the next world into picturesque poetry. A long succession of painters, from CIMABUE and GIOTTO to RAPHAEL and MICHAEL ANGELO, familiarised the popular eye with its legends, and instructed the imagination through the most intellectual of the senses. The great founders of the religious orders, Benedictines, Dominicans, Franciscans, &c., and their followers won the sympathies of the people by self-devotion and the power of faith. European history down to the fifteenth century is a chapter of the history of the Church of Rome, and politics, science, literature, and art all moved obedient to her bidding.

No doubt heretics appeared now and then, but they were soon got rid of. Nations also, England among the rest, struggled for some control over their own ecclesiastical affairs, but they fought a losing battle against the authority that held the keys of heaven and hell, and opened and shut the gates as it pleased. In a fortunate hour LUTHER guided to victory the forces that were too weak to conquer under JOHN HUSS and JEROME of Prague, and here at home HENRY VIII. was triumphant where WICKLIFFE had failed. Contemporary with LUTHER and the Protestant Reformers arose IGNATIUS LOYOLA and the Jesuits, and these latter imparted new life to what seemed a dying superstition. In the course of less than one hundred years Protestantism gained the bulk of the Teutonic nations, but vainly dashed itself against the solid ramparts of faith which protected people of the Latin race. And since the first conquest, won in its vigorous youth, Protestantism of the primitive type has barely held its own. It has taken possession of no country which resisted successfully its first onslaughts. LUTHER could shake the old Church; he was not able to subdue it.

Italy in particular remained next to invulnerable. Not by any means that there was there a disinclination to speculative free thinking. On the contrary, the men of the Renaissance epoch boldly grappled with problems that reformers in Germany and England were afraid to look in the face. But Protestantism seemed to content itself with half measures, and put the infallibility of the Bible in the place of the infallibility of the Church, and so lost the logical attraction for the Italian mind which it might otherwise have had. And then also Italy got the benefit of whatever pomp and power belonged to the Church of Rome as a holy city. And both reason and old association combined to keep Italy clear of the Protestant current that swept over the rest of Europe. There were abundant doubts concerning the claims of the Papacy, but these doubts, if they made action necessary, would not permit the doubters to stop where LUTHER and CALVIN set up their motto of finis. After the first rude blusterings of the storm, then, had blown over, Italy settled down contentedly to believe in the old watchwords, and Rome continued the centre of Orthodoxy. Critical investigations of the Scriptures produced no effect there, for the Church was master of the Scriptures. Science, especially astronomy and geology, made untenable a whole host of dogmas, but never disturbed the peace of mind of the Vatican. Books contrary to the faith were quietly put into the Index Expurgatorius, and then they were done with. Foreign settlers were permitted to erect Protestant churches for themselves in Italy, but they made no converts among the natives. In Rome they were only permitted to erect these churches outside the walls, the worship was conducted in a foreign tongue, and the Romans paid no more attention to what went on there than if the proceedings took place in Timbuctoo.

During the last twenty years an intellectual religious revolution has been going on in Italy, and during the last ten years even Rome also has felt the influence that was everywhere abroad. When the Italians made Rome their capital, and first PIUS IX. and now LEO XIII. determined to be a self-confined prisoner in the Vatican, Rome was suddenly emancipated. The withdrawal of the Pope was the second birth of the city. Posts that were formerly held by priests were now filled by laymen. Education was encouraged, religious liberty was guaranteed by law, the grass ceased to grow in the streets, the air of picturesque decay vanished in the presence of new life, and in ten years Rome has added 100,000 to its population. Now that religious thought and speech are as free in Italy as in England we can judge of the relative strength of religious ideas much better than we could do when the Pope was absolute. We have, therefore, tried to form a judgment on the facts of the case as we have seen them in Venice, and Florence, and Naples, and other cities, and more especially and last in Rome itself.

When we first entered the Eternal City our imagination was filled with Paganism and Catholicism. The Paganism is merely a recollection now. Its monuments are splendid ruins. Its gods are dead, alive only in marble. Catholicism, however, is a present reality. In St. Peter's and the other churches we find the people in crowds still worshipping in the old fashion. Apparently the self-imposed isolation of the Pope does not much trouble their religious sensibilities. They are learning to do without him, and he is inflicting a fatal wound on himself. A Pope who is never seen will soon cease to be indispensable, and if LEO XIII. really possesses the discretion with which he is credited he will make peace with Italy, and save the prestige of the Church while there is yet time. But if the Pope be absent in person, still the dogmas of the Church are prominent enough, and the priests are legion and their ceremonies as gorgeously celebrated. In Rome the Virgin Mary takes precedence of all other divinities. The mother of CHRIST eclipses her Son. She who is paradoxically, though with sound Protestant as well as Catholic logic, styled the mother of God, throws God himself into the shade. The Virgin and saints are devoutly believed in by the masses of the people. On Sundays and saints' days the churches, numerous as they are, are crowded, and one notices with intense satisfaction a phenomenon universal in Catholic places of worship though not common in Protestant ones, the rich and poor kneeling side by side, and forgetting their differences of rank in the presence of the Infinite and Eternal.

A casual observer in Rome would see no outward signs of the decay of Catholicism, and least of all would he be inclined to augur favourably of the future of the popular Protestantism from what he sees. But when we look below the surface, or study the literature, or enter into conversation with intelligent residents, we discover that the Roman system of thought is gradually losing hold. It survives in the masses, it is dying out of the minds of the more cultivated persons. Popular Protestantism in Rome pursues the methods with which we are familiar here. It preaches Biblical infallibility, and interprets doctrines from an Evangelical standpoint akin to that of Messrs. MOODY and SANKEY and the Salvation Army. The Church of England and the Presbyterians provide worship in English for English residents in Rome. They, therefore, do not touch the natives, and the sermons preached are such as we may hear at home—plain, practical, and orthodox, with an occasional allusion to the Man of Sin, whose headquarters are so close.

In addition, however, to providing for the religious wants of their own countrymen, English, Scotch, and American religionists have instituted missionary enterprises among the Italians themselves, with native preachers. They have established what is called a "Free Italian Church," and its strength is the measure of the influence which is exercised by popular Protestantism. And this seems to be very small. Among the educated classes it may be reckoned nil. So, although the "Free Italian Church" has congregations in many cities, there is not one single self-supporting native Protestant congregation in all Italy. We do not wonder at this, and we hardly regret it. For the report of the Church reveals a melancholy condition of things. The theology is benighted in the extreme. The advance from Catholicism, if advance it can be called, is summed up in rejecting the Pope, the Virgin and the saints, and in each individual becoming a smaller Pope himself, and more dogmatic as he is more ignorant. We know no organised Protestant Church at home where the tone is so poor and low as the tone of this Free Italian Church is. Possibly it may be the beginning of spiritual growth. At any rate it means some degree of independent inquiry, and this must lead to some good results at last. Let us hope so.

It is not at all surprising that this narrow and dogmatic Protestantism has no charms for educated Italians. If they are discontented with what Rome teaches they are not likely to seek refuge here. And discontent is now very widely spread. The young men of the better classes are free thinkers. They have read the French and German authors. At Naples the favourite philosopher at the University is HEGEL. And the complaint of the Protestants is that they cannot get hold of the educated young men. They have given up their belief in Catholicism, but the popular Protestantism pipes its tunes to deaf ears. Italy may cease to be Roman Catholic. It will never become Protestant in the sense of the Thirty-nine Articles or the Westminster Confession. It may wander in the wilderness of doubt for a long time, but when finally it finds its way again to the genial atmosphere of faith, the faith will be large and liberal, and in advance of the cut-and-dried dogmatism that the popular Protestantism offers in exchange for Roman Catholicism. Here and there already we find men of light and leading who look sympathetically on Unitarianism, or on Theism interpreted in a Christian spirit. This seems to satisfy the logical demands of the intellect, and at the same time to do full justice to the emotions and to the laws of historical development.

And this is the goal to which Protestantism has always pointed, so far as it has understood its own significance. The protest against Rome made by LUTHER involved a protest against the authority of any Church, book, or man. It left the personal conscience to deal with God only. Not human creeds, and not the Bible, not the Pope, and not JESUS CHRIST, but creeds, and Bibles, and Popes, and Christs as schoolmasters to the spirit of man, educating us for the glorious liberty of the children of God, and making us followers of the true light that enlighteneth every man coming into the world—that was the energy which gave birth to Protestantism, which the Reformers dimly understood, and were only partially faithful to; and that is the inspiration of religion to-day. The Roman Catholic holds the pregnant idea of development. The popular Protestantism holds a closed and completed revelation. The future of religion in Italy and everywhere else belongs to development, as the whole past has done. Rome has tried to limit development; the popular Protestantism has denied it. We want now the germ of truth in both systems, the free spirit rejoicing in the ever-brightening day.

W. B.

OUR MANCHESTER LETTER.

MANCHESTER, July 1, 1882.

One is sometimes set thinking whatever we in this city would do were we suddenly deprived of the Memorial Hall. As the Free Trade Hall is the rallying place of political Liberalism, so is the Memorial Hall the rallying place of religious Liberalism. I have often heard expressions of a justifiable pride in its possession, and of gratitude to the earnest and able men who achieved the task of building it, and making it a possession of Liberalism for ever. But often these expressions have been qualified with the statement that the Hall would be vastly improved if the ventilation were better. A headache is not a pleasant gift, and as far as I am concerned I can see no good in a needless martyrdom. Indeed, a martyrdom without the merit of vindicating some principle is a waste of spiritual energy. Whatever the cause may have been the number of visitors to the examinations of the students of the Home Missionary Board has been much less this year than usual, and from what I have heard at different times the bad ventilation of the Hall has been one of the reasons. The trustees of the property should look into the matter and try whether they cannot find some remedy. Never did the students of this institution appear to greater advantage in their examinations than on Tuesday and Wednesday last. The tutors have done their work thoroughly during the year that is now passed. Taking the whole of the courses through, a thoroughness was manifested that promises well for the future of our churches. And yet the students who have received their certificates this year have elected to prolong their preparation for the life-work to which they have devoted themselves. One of them has won the Gaskell scholarship, another the Owens scholarship, and they will remain at their studies in Owens College for another year. The other three are going to London to share in the inestimable privilege of personal discipleship to Dr. Martineau, and the other advantages which Manchester New College offers to the studious youth preparing for the sacred calling of the Christian ministry. This prolonged study under varied influences will conduce to thoroughness of mental development, and as a minister of religion in our day cannot have too many resources it is well when such a choice is made.

At the close of the examinations an address was given by the Rev. Alex. Gordon, of Belfast. Never before did I hear Mr. Gordon to such advantage. His address had wit and wisdom, pathos and learning mingled in equal degrees. His appeals went straight to the hearts and consciences of his hearers; his propositions took captive their reason, and his elevated thoughts lifted their minds to a lofty level. I was told by a friend who sat near me that his use of Latin and Greek quotations had an amusing effect on the reporters, who stopped the pens they held and gazed up aghast at his fluency in these tongues. I did not note this myself—I was so absorbed in the fine strain of the speech that I had eyes and ears for nothing else. I would commend to your readers the careful perusal of this fine address.

With the ending of the examinations other labours began. Next morning (Thursday) the Missionary Conference began its proceedings by partaking of the Lord's Supper, the President (the Rev. Joseph Freeston) and the Secretary (the Rev. Noah Green) conducting the service. The Report did not reveal any very extensive amount of work as having been done; but of its two missions, Douglas in the Isle of Man was spoken of hopefully, while Droydsden is in a sufficiently developed state to be handed over to the Manchester Unitarian Association. A long and earnest discussion arose on the suggestion (by letter) of the Rev. Henry Williamson that Carlisle should be made a missionary station, and that an attempt should be made to resuscitate Barrow. The Rev. Mr. Shanks urged the claims of Wisbeach, where an old chapel, unused for years, exists. These suggestions having been thoroughly talked over in a business-like manner of question and answer principally, all the information obtained was commended to the managing committee, and the decision of what should be done left with them. I may as well explain that the position which the conference assumes towards missionary enterprise is that of a pioneer. It seeks out a likely place to operate upon, and having found out its capabilities it begins operations, fosters its growth until its success seems assured, and then hands it over to the nearest local association, or what is better still, until it becomes a self-supporting church. In this way Blackpool and Scarborough have had free churches established in them, while Barrow, for various reasons, had to be given up.

The chairman's address was an earnest appeal for more zeal in missionary enterprise, which he reinforced by reference to that prince of Unitarian missionaries, Richard Wright, and others, who in their time have done good work. It was a useful address, calculated to strengthen the determination to work in all who heard it. The first day was closed by a lively discussion on the offertory, introduced by the Rev. William Mitchell, who exposed what he believed to be the evils and weaknesses of this system. It was defended as earnestly as it was assailed; but the prevailing sympathy of the ministers present seemed to be with a mixed system, which avoided dependence on any one alone. The introducer was about the only one present who expressed any belief in the system of renting and appropriating seats, though he confessed that much depended on local circumstances as to what was really best. The fact seems to me, on reflection, that almost any system of finance will work with the right man in the right place, while a man without ability or earnestness will be unable to make any system successful; still of course there are better and worse systems. We may insist on the right principle that men ought to attend the church for the purpose of worshipping God before and beyond all other purposes; but the fact remains all the same, that even those who do so prefer to worship where a man who can inspire and instruct occupies the pulpit. Men have intellects as well as hearts and souls, and the majority of them insist on having those intellects fairly dealt with. And, moreover, it happens in most cases that the big heart and the great soul kindles the intellect into a clear flame, so that one almost always means the other. Perhaps, then, it is a matter of securing the right men rather than a question about systems of finance.

The Rev. Mr. Slater, of Middleton, was elected president for the year 1882-3. Mr. Slater well deserves the honour he thus received; for years he was the hard-working and efficient secretary of the Conference, and in many ways he has done good service for the advancement of our liberal principles, and as he is full of zeal we may look for much more good work from him.

The second day's proceedings of the Conference were very interesting. After a little preliminary business had been done, the Rev. H. W. Perris, of Norwich, read a paper on "The Public Worship Problem." As the Inquirer has published it in full, I need but to say that it is a paper full of lines of suggestive thought; that it throws light on different points of this important question; and that in spite of the subject having been well threshed out for months and years, there was considerable freshness in the treatment; and a lively discussion followed, in which the speakers each contributed his own quota to the clearing of the problem. Why the attendance at our free churches is not larger than it is? Two of the speakers dwelt on an aspect of the question which seemed to me to throw real light upon it. They insisted that the Unitarian Church is engaged in such a serious work as it never before was engaged in but once—that was by Jesus and his Apostles. It is, and has been, engaged in working an entire change in the religious ideas of Christendom; that it leaves no point of moral life untouched, and consequently such a work must necessarily be a slow one. This is the plain fact, and as the whole fauna and flora, say of Australia, cannot be replaced by those from Europe only by slow degrees, so it is with ideas of the human mind, and the habit of looking at spiritual matters in a certain way. Another fact, too, ought to be taken into consideration. While our churches have produced some of the greatest thinkers of each generation since they originated, no man of great organising genius has risen among us; indeed, the very spirit of our faith is opposed to such a mind appearing among us. John Wesley himself, could he be restored to our country, and come to Unitarian conclusions, would find it impossible to enclose the free soul in the iron bands in which he bound his followers. Liberty of conscience is incompatible with bonds of any kind other than those which the spirit lays on the individual. Rigid rules are impossible to those whose faith is a progressive one. We shall have to submit to the place assigned to us by Providence, and slowly win the world to our nobler faith. A dinner and post-prandial speeches, where much good sense and sound advice came to the front, as well as not a little mirthful wit, which helped to make things pleasant, and cheer the minds of those present, closed the meeting of the week. I may say, in conclusion, that though I have been at many of those meetings in past years, I never was at one where there was better speaking, or where more profitable things were uttered, and all in that good spirit which is so needful where earnest men differ so widely from another.

I may add, for the information of your readers, that every preparation having been made in respect to the new church buildings in Ardwick-Longsight and Miles Platting, in the first-named place the actual work will begin at once. It is time that this was so, though an impatient public has not known all the difficulties that had to be overcome before this could be.

W. M.

FRANKLIN HOWORTH.

This "beloved disciple," who nearly thirty years ago left our ministry and founded a Free Christian Church, unconnected with any Denomination, was born at Audenshaw, near Manchester, Nov. 24, 1804. His family were "English Presbyterians." When about six years old he went to the Moravian school at Fairfield, and having from an early age desired to devote himself to the ministry, he entered Manchester College, York, in 1821. The "Roll of Students" informs us that seven other divinity students entered in that year, among whom was "John Smale," who soon turned his attention to the Bar, and (as Sir John Smale) is the honoured Chief Justice of Hong Kong. The Revs. E. Kell, Dr. Beard, Dr. Wreford, and E. Tagart were one year his seniors; and in the following year we find the late Revs. R. B. Aspland, E. Talbot, A. T. Clout, and Dr. Martineau and the venerable E. Whitfield who survive him. This was a time when there was much Unitarian zeal. In 1825 the Welburn Chapel was built, which was supplied by the students; and in 1823-24 Mr. Wellbeloved, the learned theological tutor, was vindicating Unitarianism against the assaults of Archdeacon Wrangham; but he was always true to the unsectarian character of the college. Mr. Howorth testified that "in the course of theological study, when translating passages from the original languages of the Bible, the students were informed what were the opinions and views of learned men of different and opposite parties, and left to form their own judgment."

On leaving college, in 1826, he became minister of the Blackwater-street congregation at Rochdale, with whom he lived "in harmony and love" for ix years. He married Miss M. Milne, of Rochdale, who died young; their only daughter is the wife of the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, of Manchester. Mr. Howarth's second wife, who survives him, was a sister of the late Sir Henry Holland, Bart. In 1832 he accepted a unanimous invitation to Bank-street, Bury. The old meeting-house, erected in 1719, soon proved too small to accommodate the congregation which he attracted to it, and, after he had been in Bury about three years, it was resolved to build a new chapel, with a school-room, which was opened in 1837. A private letter of that date recounts the zealous contributions of the congregation, and adds:—"Two gentlemen, not of our faith, subscribed each £50 as an additional testimony to the worth of our minister; in fact, such is his mildness, energy, and activity—such is his truly Christian character—that he commands the respect of all parties. Not the least valuable of his good qualities is the affectionate and attentive manner in which he discharges his pastoral duties—too much neglected among Unitarian ministers. . . . His labours in the Temperance Society, in conjunction with others, are producing some of the best results of Christianity. . . . When reformed drunkards bring with them no preconceived notions or prejudices, the simple truths of the gospel, preached in Mr. Howarth's plain but beautiful and affectionate manner, fix their attention, and take hold of their hearts. As one of them said last Sunday, with all the earnestness of his soul, 'There is not a man in England can preach such sermons as Mr. Howarth does, let the other come from where he will.'" He embodied Cowper's ideal:—

"Simple, grave, sincere;

In doctrine uncorrupt; in language plain,
And plain in manner; decent, solemn, chaste,
And natural in gesture; much impressed
Himself, as conscious of his awful charge,
And anxious mainly that the flock he feeds
May feel it too; affectionate in look,
And tender in address, as well becomes
A messenger of grace to guilty men."

His "advanced views" of practical Christianity, which were distasteful to some of his elder brethren, had the ardent sympathy of some younger men, among whom were the late Francis Bishop, Philip P. Carpenter and Travers Madge. Forty years ago Father Mathew was in the height of his popularity, and his fellow labourers in England were inspired with hopes of the change which temperance might effect. The Teetotal Society at Bury was conspicuous for its zeal, and for the valuable information conveyed in its reports. Mr. Edmund Grundy presided at some of its crowded meetings. At one of these Mr. Howarth delivered an excellent lecture, entitled, "Popular Objections to Total Abstinence Calmly Examined," of which several thousand copies were printed, and which had a deep and wide influence over many who were repelled by more vehement appeals. The Peace Movement then excited attention. The war-fever in the country had long abated; but the physical force Chartists, and the attempt of the Government to make service in the Militia compulsory, awakened the zeal of those who saw "a more excellent way," while Free Trade was promising a golden age—a peaceful community of nations. Joseph Barker was then protesting against sectarian divisions, and wakening an ardour for primitive Christianity. Franklin Howarth, and those who felt with him, were kindled with an enthusiasm for humanity, and also with a warm devotional spirit. They found most encouragement among the young, and strove to make the Sunday-schools nurseries of faith and good works. F. Howarth was the first to preach the Good Friday sermon at the meeting of teachers of "The Province," which has become such a valuable institution. In 1843 he preached before "The Provincial Meeting of Presbyterian Ministers of Lancashire and Cheshire" in Paradise-street Chapel, Liverpool, on "The Constraining Love of Christ." The theme was most characteristic of him, and he dwelt on it faithfully. With earnestness and singleness of heart he applied it to his brethren:—

What has been the characteristic of our denomination? Has it been a constraining love of Christ and of souls? We, I fear, have been so much engaged in controverting some opinions, and defending others, respecting the person and dignity of Christ, and so jealously on our guard lest the love we give him should be so much transferred from the Father to a rival claimant, that we have not yielded our hearts to the full constraining influence of the love of Christ. Let us, however, no longer give way to the freezing influence of cold controversial calculation; but by our fervent and unceasing labours for the spiritual improvement of the masses of the people evince our deep heartfelt interest in their present and everlasting welfare. . . . A Christian community can only exist in health as it lives in active labour for the promotion of the great object of Christ's life and death—the winning of souls from sin to holiness, from devotion to self and the world to devotion to Christ and to God. Now, is our body engaged with ardour and energy in this work? What are we doing? &c.

He does not hesitate to criticise the assembly he addressed:—

In what way may the meeting of twenty or thirty of our ministers, and a number of members from our congregations, be turned to the best account? Our arrangements for many years have provided for the preaching of a sermon in the morning, and the spending the rest of the day in social and convivial intercourse, for such as could afford the means. Is this, permit us respectfully to ask, the most profitable way of bringing our varied talent and Christian zeal to bear on the great interests of the Gospel among us? Where is left the hallowed influence of so many men of education, and of the ministry, after the day thus spent? Might not arrangements be made for an evening meeting, at which the poor of our own or of other societies might be admitted at a very small, or at no cost; and the interests of domestic missions, Sunday-schools, private, family, and public worship, tract societies, village preaching, and other kindred objects be pleaded by stirring practical addresses?

We think it to the credit of the meeting that it requested the publication of this candid discourse.

For ten years more F. Howarth remained with his attached congregation, declining overtures that were made to him to settle elsewhere. He and Samuel Martin, of Trowbridge, were alike conspicuous, as those whom the common people heard gladly and loved heartily. At Bury, however, there were influential men, some of whom cordially sympathised with his work, but others increasingly felt a desire for preaching of another sort. The opportunity presented itself, when, owing to the construction of a railroad, it was desirable to take down the plain chapel of 1837, which had witnessed so much useful work: and the present handsome edifice was erected in 1852. The trustees arranged a course of doctrinal lectures in the new chapel by Unitarian ministers, and when at their close he announced a lecture on "The Influence of the Temperance Movement on the Intellectual and Moral Interests of Society," he received a resolution from the trustees which he regarded as a veto on its delivery. This seemed entirely at variance with the freedom which he had enjoyed from the commencement of his ministry, and as the trustees would not alter their resolution, he resigned. The Congregational Meeting urged him to withdraw his resignation; but since there was no change as regards his ground for it, he could not consent. He had given the ordinary three months' notice; but the trustees expressed their wish that he should not again preach to the congregation. It may be supposed that he might have resisted the encroachments on his ministerial rights with greater firmness, but it was no want of courage that led him to retire. It has been well said in a poem published on his death:—

In conscious rectitude, unwavering, strong,
Bold as a lion to oppose all wrong,
Dauntless he stood where many weakly yield,
A faithful warrior on truth's battlefield;
Yet meek and gentle as a lamb or dove,
Binding men's hearts to his by cords of love.

He would do and say the most daring things, in the calmest way, when principle so required. But he did not feel bound to minister where painful obstructions would be placed in his way; and among his principles was this—To study the things that make for peace. He protested against the Russian war, for which the nation was then wild; and he would not do battle, nor suffer others to contend through any personal wrong. So he wrote to his people (July 31, 1853):—

"One thing let me especially entreat of you, that while firm to principle in adherence to what is right and just, we all maintain the spirit of peace. . . . My very dear friends and brethren, we have lived in peace, let us part in peace, as becomes the followers of the Prince of Peace. If you attach any value to the most earnest desire of my heart—to my parting wish and blessing—let faithfulness be swayed by love, and let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and evil speaking be far from you."

The meeting in tendering him "its most grateful thanks" for his ministry (of nearly twenty-two years), assured him of "the undiminished respect and affection" of the congregation, collectively and individually."

On leaving Bank-street, he engaged a room, in which he and a number of his friends met for Sunday work and worship as a Free Christian Church.

The circumstances attending his resignation were reported in two numbers of the Inquirer, and aroused much painful feeling. The trustees had shown that they did not wish to be regarded as opponents of temperance; for they selected as his successor a minister who was then a zealous teetotaler; but many who did not sympathise with F. Howarth's opinions regarded the action of the trustees as setting a precedent quite as dangerous to the rights of congregations as to the freedom of ministers; and felt that some notice should be taken of it, at the next Provincial Meeting. Others, however, thought that it would be very undesirable to raise a discussion, which would necessarily be imperfect, on an occasion usually marked by friendly unanimity. The meeting was held in June, 1854, at Warrington: and a resolution was moved by the Rev. J. Martineau, and seconded by the Rev. W. Gaskell (F. Howarth's fellow-students), offering him the right hand of fellowship as pastor of a Free Christian Church, which intrusted its minister "with the duty of studying without creed, and teaching without reserve, the principles of Christian faith and morals." Several gentlemen from Bury were present, who protested against a resolution which (however it might be worded) would be understood as reflecting on their proceedings; and as the secretary had retained F. Howarth's name on the list of ministers of the Assembly, which he had read, it was voted that "any resolution welcoming his return to it is uncalled for." The discussion was warm, and had a valuable and unlooked-for result; for, at the meeting at Liverpool the following year, a committee of ministers and laymen was appointed, on Mr. Martineau's motion, to decide as to the right of voting; and a system of lay representation was adopted, which has greatly increased the attendance at the meetings.* The dinner has given place to a collation, at which ladies are present, and the topics which F. Howarth suggested in 1843 receive their share of attention. Though he declined to remain a member of the Assembly, he did not withdraw from "The Widows' Fund," and when the annual meeting was held at Bury, in 1875, he attended the breakfast, where he received a most cordial welcome. The last meeting was held at Chowbent, on the day of his funeral, and the President had the sympathy of the forty ministers present in departing from the usage of the society by moving, in feeling terms, a vote of respect for the character of their oldest member (he joined in 1827).

About a year and a half after F. Howarth had founded his Free Christian Church he printed a pamphlet announcing his renunciation of Unitarianism "as defective and erroneous, neither true to scripture nor to man's nature; and as a spiritual agency for the regeneration and sanctification of man as a sinner, as altogether a failure. While it may be suited for the respectable moralities and amenities of an easy passage through life, it does not meet the fearful wants of a convulsed moral nature." At the same time he says that "it is adorned with many of the most amiable and honourable of persons, among whom are some of the tenderest and dearest connections that have and do shed the most delightful and touching love over my feeble path of life." The results of his ministry, while he was holding Unitarianism as the doctrine of the Gospel, seem to us to contradict his censure; and members of our household of faith have been noted for their success in reforming criminals; but his sermon, in 1843, showed that he was discouraged by the want of manifestation of spiritual life in a large section of our denomination. His friend Travers Madge had just come to a similar conclusion. F. Howorth was much disturbed by the assaults now made on the credibility of the Gospels. He cherished a scriptural religion, though in our opinion he misjudged the doctrinal import of Scripture. We are not aware that he ever embraced the scholastic doctrine of the Trinity; and while he valued the Bible as his fathers had done, he also retained their objection to creeds. He maintained his Christian freedom, and refused to be "in bondage" to any Denomination.

* Instead of "twenty or thirty" ministers there were about sixty-three ministers, and fifty-eight lay-delegates at the last meeting at Chowbent, in spite of a wet morning.

In 1860 a chapel was erected for his congregation. On entering it he took the opportunity to say that if, in the separation, seven years before, "he or his friends did or said anything not consistent with Christian meekness and forbearance, he hopes for forgiveness, as he from the heart extends the same to all." He also expressed his gratitude to the congregations that had lent him their chapels for the Sunday-school anniversaries. In a worldly point of view he had made a great sacrifice. He had left a large and influential congregation which could minister to his support to preach to poor people who could give him little or nothing. He refused to be welcomed and honoured as a convert by any Church, and felt for a while deprived of the sympathy of many valued friends. The pecuniary sacrifice but little affected him. "He was always more anxious to give his energies and spiritual advice than to receive a salary." He remained a "Total Abstinence," and "he lived much more plainly than many of those whom he assisted out of his slender means. It was to many persons a perpetual surprise how he contrived to do so much good with the means at his command, but he did it mainly by self-denial, and the careful husbanding of his resources."

During his later, as in his earlier ministry "he went about doing good." It would be impossible to recount the various benevolent enterprises which he aided—still less his private charities; but we must not omit his care for the blind in Bury. "He employed a visitor to impart to them spiritual and other instruction, also providing them with books in the raised type in which they were enabled to read. He also brought them together annually for several years past, for a pleasant reunion, which was a source of considerable enjoyment to them." (In the list of those who formed part of the funeral procession, we note "The Blind.") In his good works he was greatly aided by his wife.

The light which cheered his days did not fade at the eventide; for it was the light of love which never faileth. While making new friends he cherished the remembrance of the old. The Rev. W. Roseman (Congregationalist) says:—"One name towered above the rest, next to that of his dear tutor Wellbeloved; and that was the name of the venerable Dr. Martineau, whose works were very dear to him, even to his dying day. Frequently has he, again and again, with a smile playing on his countenance, read to me a passage from the works of that distinguished writer, and turning and looking at me he would say, 'And who is it, that has thus written and spoken?'"

When he had reached his seventy-third year, he proposed to resign his pastoral charge; but his congregation begged him to retain it, and provided him with a colleague. In 1880, he had a paralytic seizure, from which he partially recovered. He had a second seizure in the same year; and a third stroke peacefully ended his mortal life on the 12th of June. Marked respect was paid to his memory. The Bury Times of June 17 devotes half a page to a biographical notice (from which we have quoted) and to the funeral services, and last Saturday reported the funeral sermons at his Free Church, at Bank-street Chapel and elsewhere; at Trinity Church and St. John's Church tributes were paid to this faithful Nonconformist. After the Rev.

D. Walsmsley's excellent discourse the congregation at Bank-street, in reverent silence, passed a resolution "recognising the high moral worth and Christian spirit of their friend and former minister."

The funeral was attended by ministers of all Denominations, and by delegations from the different institutions in which he was interested, as well as by his congregation and other friends. Along the route, from his church to the cemetery in Manchester-road, the places of business were closed, and the windows darkened. With one or two exceptions, this was even the case with the public-houses, and at one large brewery, where the blinds were drawn down, the men stood outside, reverently watching the sad procession. The thousands of mourners who crowded the streets testified that it was no common man who had been taken from them. No wealth, or station, or talent could call forth the loving respect which was felt for him. The Rev. W. Roseman, who delivered the funeral address, spoke from an acquaintance of forty-three years, which had ripened into brotherly affection. He said:—

Of few men could it be more truthfully said than of our dear brother—no master but Christ, no creed but the Holy Scriptures. His watchword was forbearance, as the basis of all true Christian unity, and his motto through life was Love. His beautiful, simple, devout life was well-known to his brethren. He was one of the most benevolent of men. . . . He had a strong objection to any title to his name. . . . As Franklin Howorth, minister of the Gospel, he was known in life, and as such he desired to be remembered after death. . . . His humility was a most striking trait in his character. I thought he never did himself justice, considering his culture and scholastic attainments. He always seemed to act as if he esteemed all others better than himself. His spirit was most loving and lovable. . . . His life was noble, useful, honourable, and his faith and love of Christ unwavering. "Mark the perfect man and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace." R. L. C.

DR. WILLIAMS'S TRUST.—XXXII.

[CONTRIBUTED BY W. D. JEREMY, ESQ.]

190. WILLIAM ARTHUR CASE, ESQ., M.A. (1855-72).—For nearly twenty years one of the Masters of University College School, Gower-street. On his retirement from the Vice-Mastership a testimonial was presented to him at the college in Feb., 1867, consisting of a handsome ewer and stand in silver, a purse of 220 guineas, and an address from past and present pupils, expressive of their respect and admiration. On Dr. Williams's Trust Mr. Case rendered valuable services as a Member of the Glasgow College Committee, always taking his share of work at the examination of candidates for scholarships. He died 24th of June, 1872, aged fifty-four years. He was the son of the Unitarian Minister at Shrewsbury who was lately referred to in connection with the late Mr. Charles Darwin, and whom he baptised, whose father attended the Unitarian chapel in that town.

191. WALTER D. JEREMY, ESQ., M.A. (1856-58).—Barrister-at-Law of Gray's-inn. Author of a "Digest of the Proceedings in Chancery of Dr. Williams's Trust since its Foundation in 1715"—the Trust having been administered under the direction of the Court uninterruptedly until 1851, and occasionally since. A member of the Estates and Audit Committees (1856-58), and of the Glasgow College Committee during the same period; afterwards honorary Examiner of Candidates for Scholarships for fourteen years (1858-72); Treasurer of the Presbyterian Board; * a Manager of the

* The Presbyterian Fund is probably the oldest Nonconformist Trust in England, having been founded immediately after the passing of the Act of Toleration (1 Will. and Mary, c. 18). Its chief objects are the assistance and encouragement of ministers and congregations in the country, and the education of students for the ministry. One of its founders was Dr. Daniel Williams, and it has been appropriately administered at his library since that institution was first opened in 1727. The Managers of the Fund, collectively called the Presbyterian Board, are the Governors of the College at Carmarthen, which was founded by the Rev. Samuel Jones, M.A., Fellow of Jesus College, "Widows' Fund;" and one of the Governors of Dr. Williams's Endowed School for Girls at Dolgelley. As a member of the Presbyterian Board he was enabled to render a signal service to Dr. Williams's Trust by opposing, and ultimately defeating, what is known as Mr. Field's scheme. Eldest son of the late Rev. John Jeremy, Minister of the Ancient Presbyterian Congregation of Caeronsen, Cardiganshire, and son-in-law of the late Rev. Richard Evans, sometime Unitarian Minister at Devonport, but for many years resident at Swansea.

192. REV. GEORGE VANCE SMITH, B.A., Ph.D., D.D. (1855-58).—Sometime Principal of Manchester New College, and one of its Professors from 1846 to 1857; Minister of St. Saviour's Gate Chapel, York (1858-75), and of the Upper Chapel at Sheffield (1875-76). Since 1876 Principal of the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, one of the Company for the Revision of the New Testament, and author of various theological works.

193. ALGERNON SYDNEY ASPLAND, ESQ. (1857-65).—Barrister-at-Law of the Middle Temple (1848-71), having previously, for twelve years, practised as a Special Pleader. A careful and accurate lawyer, whose opinions were greatly esteemed, and who had the ear of the Courts of Common Law. As a member of the Northern Circuit he gained considerable reputation and practice, and was greatly esteemed in the profession and by his friends. His health having broken down just when he ought to have taken silk, he spent the last seven years of his life in retirement, residing chiefly at Durdham Down, near Bristol, where he died 26th of July, 1870, aged sixty-one years. He was the third son of the Rev. Robert Aspland, and was for some years Treasurer of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

194. EDWARD ENFIELD, ESQ. (1857-80).—Third son of the late Mr. Henry Enfield, Town Clerk of Nottingham, and grandson of Dr. Enfield of Norwich, compiler of the now almost forgotten "Speaker." For some time a student at Manchester New College, York (1826-27); for a short period "Moneyer" at the Mint, but on the abolition of the office in 1851 he retired on a handsome pension, which he lived to enjoy for twenty-nine years. The whole of that long period he devoted with assiduity to works of benevolence and public usefulness. His name will long be remembered in connection with the London Domestic Mission, in which he took so deep an interest, and at University College Hospital, Gower-street, of which he was the Treasurer. He was an active member of the Council and Committee of University College, and a member of the Council of University Hall. At the time of his death he was President of Manchester New College. On Dr. Williams's Trust he was an active member, taking a foremost part in any special matter requiring time and trouble, and a most constant and valuable member of the Estates and Audit Committees.

195. REV. JAMES MARTINEAU, D.D., LL.D.

Oxford, one of the ejected ministers of 1662, and which is now conducted by a Unitarian and two Independent Ministers. About thirty students, chiefly Congregationalists, but sometimes including Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists, and generally some Unitarians, are educated there, both tutors and students living together in perfect harmony. Under Dr. Williams's will £10 per annum is payable by his trustees to the college for the support of Welsh students. At the suggestion, and through the long-continued efforts of the writer of these notes, the grant has lately been increased to £100 a year, offered in the form of competitive exhibitions. The Berman Trustees, under the inspiration of their senior member, Thomas Field Gibson, Esq., formerly the Treasurer of the Presbyterian Board, also give £50 a year to the college in similar scholarships. In the last century many young men were ordained by the Bishop of St. David's direct from the Presbyterian College, where they were received and educated as private pupils preparing for the Established Church. One of these by his will left two silver cups to the then bishop for his life, and after his death to the tutors for the time being of the Presbyterian College, to be handed down by them as heirlooms to their successors. One of these cups is now in the possession of Dr. Vance Smith, and the other in the hands of Professor Morgan. These particulars serve to show the broad sympathies and unsectarian practice inherited by, and which are the distinctive features of, the Presbyterian Board as well as Dr. Williams's Trust.

(1858-68).—Minister at Eustace-street, Dublin (1822-27); of Paradise-street and Hope-street Chapels, Liverpool (1832-57); and of Little Portland-street Chapel, London (1859-72); Professor at Manchester New College since 1840, and Principal since 1869. Author of numerous works.

(To be continued.)

KIDDERMINSTER: CONFIRMATION SERVICE.—On Sunday week the annual confirmation service was held at the New Meeting House. The first of these services was conducted by the Rev. W. Gaskell, M.A., in 1878, when twenty-three candidates were confirmed. No service was held in 1879, but in 1880 twenty-three young people again joined in the service, which was conducted by the Rev. Charles Wicksteed, B.A. In 1881 the Rev. Dr. Drummond confirmed twenty-one; and last Sunday thirty-four—nineteen females and fifteen males—received the rite from the hands of the Rev. Dr. Sadler, of Hampstead. These candidates, with three others who were unavoidably absent, had been under instruction in doctrine and practice from the Rev. W. Carey Walters for some time, and had attended most regularly the preparatory classes. A large congregation gathered to take part in the service, and a bright sunny morning helped to give an air of gladness to the day. The whole of the chancel was exquisitely decorated with ferns and flowers, and on the communion table, standing out from a background of moss, and surmounted by a wreath of hot-house flowers, stood a cross of white everlastings. The pulpit, lectern and font were appropriately adorned. Everything spoke in silent language of the joy which should accompany the first avowed entrance into the Christian service. The first part of the service was conducted by the Rev. W. Carey Walters, and after the singing of the hymn "Life nor Death shall us Dissever," the Rev. Dr. Sadler entered the pulpit and delivered a most impressive and earnest address to the candidates, which will be found in another column. At the close of the address the minister of the congregation and the Rev. Dr. Sadler stood one on each side of the communion table, and the female candidates ascended the chancel steps and, standing in front of the table, answered the question which is to be found in the Order of Confirmation in the Ten Services, and then, reverently kneeling, Dr. Sadler, with outstretched hand, repeated the collect "Defend, O Lord, these Thy children with Thy most gracious favour," &c., and the candidates rising went back into their seats. The male candidates followed, and the same service was repeated. The remainder of the Order of Confirmation followed, and then after the offertory and the singing of the hymn "O Lord Thy heavenly grace impart," the non-communicants left. All the candidates, and about a hundred other members of the congregation, remained to join in the communion service, at which an address was delivered by Dr. Sadler, and a welcome into the spiritual fellowship of the Church was given by the Rev. W. Carey Walters to the newly-confirmed. In anticipation of the service the candidates were on the preceding Thursday evening admitted into the membership of the guild, which is a brotherhood and sisterhood formed for the promotion of Christian fellowship and work, and into which all who have been confirmed, and all of the younger members of the congregation who were communicants before the introduction of the confirmation service, are admitted. The guild numbers 101 members, of whom seven are non-resident, and meets monthly before each communion Sunday. It combines all classes of society in the congregation, and aims to promote Christian unity and earnestness among the younger members. Only two of those who have joined this guild are not now in fellowship with the Church, and among those are a large number of very devoted workers in Church and school. Further particulars in relation to its working will be gladly given by the Rev. W. Carey Walters to any who, roused to an interest by the report of this service, or by the Rev. J. E. Millson's interesting paper in Teachers' Notes for July, may desire to know more particulars.

THE Rev. Samuel Longfellow, brother of the poet, has resigned the Germantown congregation. He intends to return to his home in Cambridge.

A GOLDEN WEDDING.—The fiftieth anniversary of the wedding day of a fine old Protestant couple has just been celebrated at the Oratoire, in Paris; and after Pastour Dide had addressed the venerable pair, he baptized a great-grandchild and married three of their grandchildren.

Occasional Notes.

THE short debate in the House of Lords on Tuesday last, of which a miserably meagre account appeared in the Daily News, reminds us that a constituency is still deprived of its rights by the illegal action of a majority of the House of Commons. The Duke of Argyll moved the second reading of the Parliamentary Oaths Act (1866) Amendment Bill, having for its object to substitute an affirmation for an oath on the occasion of a member taking his seat. This, it will be remembered, is just the measure that several persons have pressed the Government to bring in, and its reception in the House of Lords fully justifies the Government in their declining to deal with the question, especially as they contend that the law is enough as it stands. Lord Redesdale's Bill, which had the merit of logically carrying out the views of his party, met with no better fate than was accorded to the Duke of Argyll's. Lord Carnarvon's amendment to the effect "that nothing has arisen in the proceedings of this House which makes it expedient at this time to propose a change in the existing Parliamentary oath," unquestionably affirmed a fact, and admirably embodied the Conservative principles that predominate in the House of Lords. In the debate of course the broad ground of constitutional liberty was lost sight of, and the question narrowed down to the personal one of Mr. Bradlaugh's offences. It was a Bradlaugh Relief Bill, and there was no need to relieve him. Such was the burden of Lord Carnarvon's and the Archbishop of Canterbury's arguments, and by a majority of more than two to one the House endorsed them. We do not suppose that the Duke expected the result to be otherwise, though there can be no doubt that his well meant attempt will sooner or later find its place on the Statute Book. We should not be surprised if at the next election there may be others returned who will refuse to take the oaths, and that the Archbishop of Canterbury's expectation will not be fulfilled.

FROM the Italian Census of the 31st of December, 1881, it appears that in twenty-three out of twenty-four provincial chief towns the number of persons knowing how to read and write has greatly increased since 1871. In ten years the citizens of Udine had increased in such knowledge at the rate of 9 per cent.; in Como, 6.50 per cent. Brescia made a strange exception; in 1871 there were 2,899 persons ignorant of reading and writing, and in 1881 this number was increased to 3,120 persons; data are wanted to explain this fact. In the twenty-four capitals of provinces the average result is that a little more than 50 per cent. of the inhabitants know how to read and write.

AT a meeting of the executive committee of the Darwin Memorial Fund, held last week, at the Royal Society's Rooms, Burlington House, it was announced that the total subscriptions already promised or received amounted to £2,487 13s. It was decided that the memorial should take the form of a marble statue; and a sub-committee was appointed to make the necessary arrangements. It was agreed to ask the trustees of the British Museum for permission to place the statue in the large hall of the British Museum (Natural History), South Kensington. The sub-committee consists of the following:—Mr. W. Bowman, Sir J. D. Hooker, Professor Huxley, Mr. C. T. Newton, and Sir F. Pollock, with the chairman, Mr. W. Spottiswoode, Pres. R.S.; the treasurer, Mr. John Evans, treas. R.S.; and the hon. secretaries, Professor Bonney and Mr. P. Edward Dove.

RECENTLY a statement has been going the round of the Press to the effect that Mrs. Sarah Flower Adams, the writer of the exquisite hymn "Nearer my God to Thee," was a Baptist, and that her body lies buried in the cemetery of the Baptist church at Harlow, Essex. Wishing to get the exact facts, the editor of the Christian at Work—an Evangelical publication in America—addressed a note to the present pastor of the church, and received the following interesting reply:—

Mrs. Adams was the daughter of Mr. Benjamin

Flower, the editor and proprietor of the Cambridge Independent Press. Politically, he was in advance of his times, and was imprisoned for articles which in our day would hardly be called radical. He belonged to the Baptists of Cambridge, and I think there is no doubt that he became a Unitarian about the same time as his pastor, Robert Robinson. He removed from Cambridge to Harlow, where the fact of his Unitarianism is still remembered. I have no doubt that his nonconformity was stronger than his Unitarianism. He found a large congregation of Baptists here, and he worshiped with them. He carried on his business of printer here, and issued Robert Robinson's works, as well as others, while here. He and his wife before him were both buried in our burial-ground. His daughters, Eliza and Sarah, removed to London after his death, but were brought here for burial. They were buried by a Unitarian minister. That fact seems decisive of the position they took religiously. They conducted for some time the musical part of the service at South-place, Finsbury, where Fox preached. A gentleman assured me that he had known Sarah from his boyhood, and that he was confident she was not a Unitarian. The evidence, however, is the other way. For many years there was a monument over her grave without an inscription upon it. I had written an appeal which I intended to publish, pleading for funds to restore the monument and put an inscription upon it. Before I sent it the widow of Mr. Adams, who had married a friend of his former wife, called upon me and asked permission to do the work herself. This has since been done. I give you below a copy of the entry of death and the inscriptions over Mrs. Adams, in which you may be interested.

Extract from the book of Foster-street burial-ground, belonging to the Baptist church, Harlow, Essex:—

August 21, 1848. Buried in this ground, Sarah Flower Adams, daughter of the late Benjamin and Eliza Flower, who died in London, August 14.

J. P. MALLISON, A.B.

Copy of inscription upon Mrs. Adams:—

"NEARER, MY GOD, TO THEE."

Sarah Flower Adams,

Second and youngest daughter of Eliza and Benjamin Flower, the wife of William B. Adams. She wrote many noble, sacred poems, but her life was the noblest and the best. Worthy of her parents and her sister, she joined them on the 4th of August, 1848, aged 43. They were lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in their deaths they were not divided.

"Part in peace! Christ promise gave,
Of a life beyond the grave
Where all mortal partings cease:
Part in peace."

I have corrected many biographical notices of her, as a strange mystery seems to have beclouded her memory. In one record I read an account of her funeral, which is said to have taken place in a village in America, and at which the children of the Sunday-school sang one of her hymns over her grave. I believe that one of her hymns was sung over her sister's grave by professional singers from London. I refer to the one, "An angel sat beside the tomb." Yours faithfully,
T. EDWARDS.

MESSRS. ROUTLEDGE AND SONS have just issued "In the Arbour," which contains all of Longfellow's unprinted poems that will be given to the public, save two sonnets reserved for his biography, and "Michael Angelo," a dramatic poem, which will be published later. This little volume contains "The Poet's Calendar," being verses on each of the months. We quote that on July, which is indeed exquisite:—

My emblem is the Lion, and I breathe
The breath of Lybian deserts o'er the land;
My sickle as a sabre I unsheathe,
And bent before me the pale harvests stand.
The lakes and rivers shrink at my command,
And there is thirst and fever in the air;
The sky is changed to brass, the earth to sand;
I am the Emperor whose name I bear.

RECENT American papers contain full reports of a remarkable garden party to Mrs. Beecher Stowe on the occasion of her 70th birthday. Most of the literary celebrities of America were present. It is stated that Dr. Wendell Holmes's verses were thought to be the most apt of all the poetic tributes to the lady of seventy years. He begins by enumerating the various tongues into which "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was translated, and the reason of the power which the story exercised, and closes thus:—

All through the conflict, up and down
Marched Uncle Tom and Old John Brown,
One ghost, one form ideal.
And which was false and which was true,
And which was mightier of the two,
The wisest sibyl never knew,
For both alike were real.

Sister, the holy maid does well
Who counts her beads in convent cell,
Where pale devotion lingers;
But she who serves the sufferer's needs,
Whose prayers are spelt in loving deeds,
May trust the Lord will count her beads
As well as human fingers.

When truth herself was Slavery's slave
Thy hand the prisoned suppliant gave
The rainbow wings of fiction.
And Truth who soared descends to-day
Bearing an angel's wreath away,
Its lilies at thy feet to lay
With Heaven's own benediction.

The following appears in the Christian Register of Boston, U.S.

"The Rev. Edward D. Towle, who has been a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, having applied to the Committee on Fellowship 'appointed by the National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches,' to be recognised as a Unitarian minister, and his application having been approved by this Committee, I recommend him, in its behalf, to the churches and to the fellowship of the ministry of the Unitarian faith.

"C. C. EVERETT, Chairman.

"Harvard Divinity School, June 12, 1882."

This "Committee of Fellowship" was appointed at one of the National Conferences in order to investigate the character and claims of ministers joining us from other denominations. We are inclined to think that something of the same kind would be very desirable in this country. At present the needful inquiries are made in an unofficial and hap-hazard way, and the result is that we do not always "entertain angels unawares."

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION SOCIETY.—We understand that in accordance with the resolution passed at the last annual meeting of this society the committee are taking steps to establish a new Mission Station. The Rev. Joseph Pollard, of Belfast, has accepted the invitation of the committee to conduct it.

DOMESTIC MISSION, SPICER-STREET, CONVALESCENT HOMES.—Mr. Corkran thankfully acknowledges the following donations:—W. Thornley, Esq., £3; Mrs. J. Potter, £1; Miss M. C. Martineau, £1; Miss Worsley, 10s.; Mr. D. B. Squire, Mrs. Squire, and Mr. H. Squire, 10s. 6d. each (£1 10s. 6d.).

THE DESERT OF THE WANDERINGS.—Between Akabah, the ancient Elath, the port from which Solomon's fleets sailed for Ophir, and the Sinaitic peninsula, there is a small region of country which is at present unexplored. Professor E. H. Palmer, the author of "The Desert of the Exodus," has undertaken for the Committee of the Palestine Exploration Fund to pay a visit to this district with the endeavour to complete the map of the scene of the "Wanderings of Israel." Among the places which he proposes to examine may be mentioned the site of Kadesh Barnea, originally discovered by the Rev. J. Rowlands, and more recently visited by Mr. Clay Trumbull, of Philadelphia. Should time allow, Professor Palmer proposes also to revisit the very interesting city of El Barid, north of Petra, which he discovered in 1870 during his journey with Mr. C. F. Tyrwhitt Drake.

EPPE'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in Packets labelled—"JAMES EPPE & CO. Homoeopathic Chemists, London." Also makers of Epps's Chocolate Essence for afternoon use.

Reviews.

Ueber das Teleologische Fundamentalprinzip der Allgemeinen Pädagogik (On the Fundamental Aim of General Education). Von Erhard Schultz. Mülhausen im Elsass Buchlebsche Hofbuchhandlung, 1882.

This is a treatise, preliminary to a larger work, on the fundamental principle of a liberal education by one of the most eloquent and earnest of free-thinking German clergymen; a prominent member of the Protestantverein, who has been hunted from pillar to post by the dominant Orthodoxy, but who appears for the nonce to have found a refuge in Jena.

His present brochure is a timely and, we think, a successful attempt to define the true end of education. His introduction consists in a large measure of a trenchant criticism of his predecessors. James Mill and Alexander Bain come badly off in the ordeal to which he subjects them, and however wounding his shafts of satire may be to our national pride, it is hard to deny that there is justice in his animadversions. Bain he especially condemns for talking wisely about methods and means of training the mind, without ever so much as telling us what the end of this training is to be. It is true that Bain speaks of "developing the whole man," of drawing "out all the faculties," and much more in the same sapient fashion; but where is the good of this unless we understand what manner of man it should be our aim to develop, and to what end, or in what direction the faculties are to be drawn out? It is the ideal of humanity sought to be realised which our author misses in current schemes of education. James Mill again speaks of education as imparting the knowledge of the way to attain the greatest happiness of the greatest number, but he does not tell us wherein this happiness consists. Bain finally rouses the ire of Herr Schultz by relegating all questions as to the ultimate end of education to "other departments" of inquiry than pædagogik itself, and setting up the dogma that, in regard to subjects of instruction, the educationist must confine himself to those things on which general agreement prevails, while in respect to method he remarks, "from this point of view the main question in the art of education is, How is the memory to be strengthened?"

After using a very strong expression of indignant scorn, which we are wholly unable to translate into adequate English (Das ist also des Pudels Kern!) Herr Schultz proceeds to comment on this axiom of Bain as follows:—"The main question in the art of education would be, accordingly, in other words: How may the business of coaching and cramming be most successfully performed?" Here, we think, he does Bain some slight injustice, but there can be little doubt that the Scotch philosopher, in common with other writers, English and foreign, on education, have confounded to a great extent the mere imparting of instruction with the far more important task of a true training of the whole nature.

Herr Schultz having exposed the absence in his predecessors of the recognition of any guiding principle in their theories of education, proceeds to unfold his own, which, as he points out, was already indicated by Kant, and which he calls for shortness the "principle of humanity" (das menschliche Princip). It is, indeed, no other than the golden rule, "Do unto others as ye would that others should do unto you." The leading aim of all education, the end to which all else should be made subsidiary, according to Herr Schultz, is the development in the consciousness of the pupil that he is part of the whole of humanity; that the life of a man (as distinguished from that of an anchorite or cast-away) consists in intercourse (Verkehr), and that this intercourse is impossible without mutual respect (Rücksichtnahme). While recognising that the germs of this principle are to be found, and should be sedulously cherished in the domestic life, Herr Schultz regards it as imperative that the conception should be extended by successive stages to larger and ever larger relations, and insists upon the dictum already laid down by Kant that all education should be not merely domestic or national, but even cosmopolitan in its tendency. Children should be trained not for the world as it now is, but for the better world of the future: not as members only of the body politic, but as sons and daughters of one great human family. Simple and obvious as all this sounds, yet how utterly is it disregarded amongst us! In how many elementary schools do we find the favourite song of "Rule Britannia" saturating the infant mind with Jingoism from earliest days! How is all history by judicious (?) manipulation made to illustrate the dogma that one Englishman is as good as three Frenchmen, and rather better than four Russians! So, too, in the domain of religion, though sectarian formulas are supposed to be forbidden, yet our children are taught in their geography books that the "subjects of the Turkish Empire are mostly followers of the false prophet Mohammed," and that the Eastern Church is "a very corrupt form of Christianity," and much more to the like effect." In respect to the relation of religion to education Herr Schultz is, as might be expected, at once a radical reformer and a thorough-going Erastian. Education for him must be essentially religious. He will not hear of any separation between secular and religious training; and above all things, religious teaching must not be left to the Churches. Cavour's maxim of a "free Church in a free State" he denounces in no measured terms. As for theological training in schools it should consist of an impartial survey of existing religions, and the setting forth of their respective degrees of approximation to the true ideal of universal religion, a sense of dependence on that order of nature of which the moral aspect is the brotherhood of man. We have left to the close a reference to one of the most interesting portions of the pamphlet, a dissertation on the question of the freedom of the will. Strangely inverting the strange paradox of Kant that the will is phenomenally determined but "intelligible," i.e., transcendently free, Herr Schultz maintains, on the contrary, that the will is apparently free, but a deeper insight reveals it as determined partly by outer circumstances, partly by the character of the man. But this somewhat unqualified declaration of determinism is subsequently modified by the consideration that all the three currents of spiritual activity, viz., thought, feeling, and will, are ultimately referable to a hidden source or back-ground of existence whose nature we are unable to investigate. The door (a kind of back entrance) seems thus left open for bringing in again the old Kantian doctrine of a possible "intelligible" (though the plain Englishman would rather say "unintelligible") freedom of the will. To do Herr Schultz justice, we should observe that he is anything but dogmatic in his utterances on this subject, and especially guards them with the proviso, "The propositions set down have, of course, only validity in relation to the present state of knowledge." Altogether, it is long since we have come across a book so stimulating and suggestive as this educational treatise. It runs directly counter to some of our most cherished British liberal (?) prepossessions, and is none the less valuable on that account.

E. M. G.

AVONDALE ROAD CHAPEL, PECKHAM.—Mr. Hahnemann Epps, as secretary, was enabled at the congregational meeting on Sunday last to present a most encouraging report, from which it appeared that there had been a material increase during the past quarter both in the church membership and Sunday-school attendance. Among the agencies reported are a tract-distribution society, an open-air mission, and a "sympathy fund" for the immediate relief of urgent cases of distress. The new chapel will be ready for occupation, it is expected, in November, when it is hoped that the amount requisite for opening free of debt will have been obtained. It was agreed that the organ to be presented by Henry Tate, Esq., should not be placed in the new building till the spring of next year. At the close of the meeting Mr. Carter, accompanied by a few friends, proceeded to Peckham Rye Common, where he delivered the second of a series of addresses on the principles of Unitarianism, which was listened to by a large and evidently sympathetic audience.

ROTHERHAM.—The Sunday-school anniversary sermons were preached in the Church of Our Father, on the 2nd inst., by the Rev. J. M. Dixon, of Hull, to large congregations.

Correspondence.

ENGLISH UNITARIANISM.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Under the above heading, in your last week's paper, Mr. G. B. Dalby demurs to a passage you recently quoted from the Index as to Mr. Moncreux Conway's isolated position. He tells us that within the last few months Mr. Conway has conducted the services in at least two Unitarian chapels, and would possibly be asked to do so in others if his engagements permitted. Will Mr. Dalby be so good as to inform us whether, on either of the occasions referred to, Mr. Conway engaged in prayer or any act of worship recognising the existence of God? If he did not, is it not very misleading to say that he conducted Unitarian service?

London, July 3.

HENRY JEFFERY.

THE REVISED NEW TESTAMENT.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Permit me to say, in reference to the very kindly notice of my pamphlet, that while I reject the proposition "the Bible must be judged and read exactly like any other book," I am so far from rejecting my reviewer's proposition "all books must be read in the sense [or senses] which their own authors intended," that I welcome this second proposition as simply conveying, in another form, the identical view on which I myself lay especial stress. From my reviewer I should diverge, if at all, only as regards the principles to be adopted for arriving at the author's meaning in particular cases. I, for one, should decline to prejudge the process of study by assuming that every author's ultimate meaning must always be that which lies on the surface, and is contained within the "natural," or first suggested force of his words; and I think my reviewer would probably agree with me if it were a question of interpreting, say, Rabelais, or Cowley, or Browning. Of course, the Bible may be, throughout, the work of men who intended themselves to be taken au pied de la lettre; but, even if so, this proves my point, for certainly there are books in existence which cannot be, and were never meant to be so taken. Hence the rejecter of a so-called "artificial" sense cannot say that he is dealing with the Bible as he would deal with "every other book;" but simply that he puts all the various authors of the Bible in the same class with such plain writers as, say, Cowper or Benjamin Franklin. In that case the interpretation of Scripture should be much easier work than it has generally been found.

This consideration applies not only to the mode of communicating thought (and the Bible contains nearly every variety of literary mode), but to the subject-matter. And here the questions are, whether the subject-matter of the Bible, or of any of its parts, is such as to place it or them in a distinct class; and again, whether the books of the Bible, or some of them, or parts of some, are the sole occupants of this class, and, if not, which are the other books entitled to rank with them. It is quite possible that my reviewer and I might return somewhat divergent replies to these questions; but it seems necessary to remember that these are the questions which require answer before we can fairly say of any (not to speak of all) "other books," that the Bible is to be judged and read exactly like them.

Permit me to add that, in two particulars, my reviewer seems to me to stretch the Unitarian case, as based on the revision, a little too far.

1. I can hardly endorse the sweeping statement that "wherever changes involving controversial points have been made at all," these changes are Unitarian gains. For there are a few changes (with no marginal alternative) which are not gains to, though they may be reconcilable with the Unitarian position. Such, among others, are Matt. v. 11, Heb. ii. 17, Rev. xxii. 14.

2. It would certainly add greatly to the moral impressiveness of their concessions if the Revisers, as a body, could be convicted of an exhibition of "strong bias" in the direction of Trinitarianism. But the evidence for this seems to me singularly deficient. In a few cases, where no change is made, theological conservatism may perhaps be alleged. Of these the most important occurs in John viii. 58. Yet I confess that the more closely I examine their work, the more inclined I am to judge it in particulars by the prevailing spirit of general fairness and superiority to bias.

ALX: GORDON.

9, Upper-crescent, Belfast, July 3.

THE WELSH UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.—The annual meeting of this Society was held at Pantydefaid, Llandyssul, on Wednesday and Thursday last week, when there was a large muster of ministers present. Among these were the Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, of Chicago; Secretary of the Western Unitarian Association, U.S.A., and editor of Unity. Service was held on Wednesday evening at 6.30, when the Rev. John Evans, of Gellioeen, conducted the devotional service, and the Rev. W. Carsy and W. Rees preached, and on Thursday at 10.30 A.M., the Rev. J. Davies conducted the devotional service and the Rev. J. Ll. Jones preached in English. Mr. Jones rather took the audience by surprise by first reading out a Welsh hymn—a paraphrase of "The Lord is my shepherd"—which he did as well as any native, and the surprise became a very pleasant one to the bulk of those present when he went on to declare in the vernacular his great indebtedness to this particular congregation, of which his father was a zealous member thirty-eight years ago, before going to America. He (Mr. Jones) was then a child in his mother's arms, and only nine months old; but though so young when his father and mother emigrated with their family, all the young children grew up as familiar with the name of Pantydefaid, and those of the old ministers as if they had remained in the country, the father's religion and the father's language became their own. Mr. Jones took as his text Paul's words "not yours but you." The motto of the Society of which he is secretary is "freedom, fellowship, character." Character is going to be the great word of the future and it will carry the marks of (1) integrity; (2) courage, (3) action. The great obstacles to the realisation of this grand idea, are (1) bigotry; (2) formality; (3) substitution. The Welsh sermon was preached by Mr. Jones, of Aberdare, who took for his text the words of the prophet "Watchman, what of the night." The Conference which followed was devoted to the subject of "the Sunday-school and how to improve it." The Rev. J. Thomas was appointed to the chair, and the subject was introduced by a paper read by the Rev. J. H. Davies. The Rev. Jenkin L. Jones followed, again in Welsh, and gave his own experience, telling how he went to an orthodox Sunday-school as a boy, and how his father catechised him as to what he had been taught there and then corrected whatever he thought amiss. The Revs. R. C. Jones, W. Rees, J. Evans, and Mr. D. Jones Castell also took part in the discussion. It was proposed that the paper be printed in the Yr Ymfynydd. After that the chairman formally introduced Mr. Lloyd Jones to the meeting as a delegate, bearing a very warm greeting from the Western Association to the association in Wales. The meetings were brought to a close with two more discourses preached by the Rev. J. Evans and Edward Lloyd. The attendances at all these meetings were very large, and on Thursday scores were unable to get inside the chapel. The next annual meeting is to be held at Allt-y-placa, the Rev. W. James to preach, and the next quarterly meeting at Cwrtnewy (opening service of new chapel), the Rev. R. J. Jones to preach.

WALMSLEY.—On the last Sunday in June the annual sermons were preached by the Rev. Jeffery Worthington, of Brixton, and the scholars' service was conducted by the Rev. Robert Wilkinson, of Ainsworth. In the evening Bank-street Chapel, Bolton, was closed, so that the congregation could come to hear their old minister. They came in great force, and the collections amounted to £58 1s. 6d. On the following Saturday the teachers and scholars had their annual field day, when many members of the congregation joined them, and headed by the Egerton brass band all marched through the village and through the gardens of C. Ashworth, Esq., and John Heywood, Esq., M.A. Heavy rain coming on the usual halts for singing were dispensed with, but after tea the rain ceased, and young and old enjoyed themselves with games and dancing in a field kindly lent by Mr. John Mayoh.

Religious Intelligence.

THE HOME MISSIONARY BOARD.

VISITOR'S ADDRESS.

The following is the address delivered by the Rev. ALX: GORDON, M.A., at the close of the examination held last week:—

MR. GORDON said:—It is related, Mr. Principal, that an advocate of teetotalism, who was anxious to gain a convert, made a promise to the person whom he was addressing that this regimen would have the effect of lengthening his days. The man replied, "I believe it, I tried the system myself for about a couple of days, and I found they were the longest days I ever spent in my life"—(laughter). Some such feeling as this, I may suppose, has been present to the minds of some of those who have been examining and examined, during the two days which are now about to close. At any rate I can testify that the feeling has not been altogether absent from the mind of one of the visitors; I can sympathise with, though I must not commend, the ingenious student whom I observed to be dallying with the pleasing pages of an old book catalogue by way of varying the monotony of one of the examinations. He was in search, I presume, of the proper classification of Müller's "Symbolism"—(laughter). With regard to the general scope of this institution, and what can be said for the main programme of its studies, I have already expressed on a former occasion when I had the honour of delivering an address as visitor what it seems to me necessary to say. Indeed, I may adopt the words of a sacred writer, presented to us yesterday morning, which may be freely rendered, "my former discourse went over the whole of the ground." However, while that applies to the general programme of studies, we have had brought before us in these examinations three subjects which, while none of them exactly new, have been placed this year in greater prominence than before—the Latin, the History of Dogma—and the lectures on Health. In reference to these lectures on health, we found from our researches into Roman history this afternoon that the augurs discovered long ago "it was a bad omen when the chickens would not eat"—(laughter). Such was a primitive effect of ancient physiological investigation. But the students of this institution have been drawn further than these first principles, and have received most valuable instruction in regard to matters of bodily regimen, which I do hope may be useful, not only to themselves, but to their future congregations. In reference to the examination in Latin I would observe that, in the Senior Latin class, there was distinct promise of scholarship. In reference to the examination on the History of Dogma, I would remark that it was plain that the young men who had attended the lectures in that department, entered with appreciation into the views of doctrine presented to them as representing the minds of very different schools of Christian theology. They expressed their own criticism of those views, with frankness, and occasionally with an independence of thinking which scorned the trammels of the professorial lectures. In all that, I see indications of a state of mind which fits its possessors to grapple not only with the obsolete and partly extinct problems of the past, but with the far more pressingly important problems of theology, in its relation to the human mind and human life which are rising up around us in the living day in which we move and have our being. Appended to the lectures on the History of Dogma was a supplementary course, in itself interesting and suggestive in no ordinary degree, in its bearing upon the theology of our own land, I mean the course with reference to the English Deists. Of the answers submitted in that examination we had, through pressure of time, only specimens offered to us; but those specimens were typical. There was, first, the beautiful spirit of Herbert of Cherbury, of whom I would say, speaking from the standpoint of one somewhat conservative in theology—with his devoutness may I be devout, and with his charity may I be charitable—(applause). We had also a glimpse at the massive intellect of Thomas Hobbes, who has frequently been animadverted upon in that he has laid it down as a principle that the state of rude nature is a state of war, but in whose favour it has not perhaps been so often remembered but he lays it down that the first law of nature is "Seek peace and ensue it." Theology is presented in this institution largely in its historical aspects; less as an abstract speculation, somewhere in the clouds, and more as an actual force which has entered largely into the minds of men, the habits of men, the history of men, the moral and political dealings of men, and as largely conditioned by, and intertwined with, the varied phases of human thinking and being. And in this connection we may re-echo the opening strain of that grand chorus of the Antigone, so well translated this morning, "There are many things that excite wonder, not unmixed with awe, but among them all there is nothing more wonderful, more awful than man." I was glad to observe indications in the examinations not only of the diligent care of the constant student, passing his mind with average fairness over the whole compass of the subject presented in the lectures—and this, I think I may say, I noticed universally—but also, and in one point of view this is even more important, of the aptitude to get hold of a special bit of study and make it the student's own, to dig into it, round it, and thus to enjoy in some degree the beginnings of that highest of all intellectual pleasures, the joy and glory of original research—(applause). The indulgence of this pleasure is at the same time the most profitable and instructive of intellectual pursuits. Take, for example, one of those problems which we had before us yesterday, the problem presented by the reading monogenes theos (God only begotten): or, again, that disputed reading "feed the Church of God." I think that if a student were to enter into a question of that kind, a question interesting in itself, and in these days of New Testament revision, somewhat exciting in its interest, and go thoroughly into it, it might be of immense benefit to him. He would view it not only as a dry piece of Biblical criticism, a judgment upon a reading, to be determined on principles of pure critical science. He would estimate the theology which underlies the right reading and the theology which gave birth to the wrong one; he would watch the effect in succeeding centuries of the forms of thought by or nourished by the accepted text; he would see what influence these have had on the development of the estrangement of churches. Thus he has secured an available standpoint from which to survey a very wide and important field at once of Biblical criticism, of Christian theology, and of ecclesiastical history. It has been said in regard to some of these questions, apparently so minute in themselves, yet on which so much often hangs, it has been said, and said very truly, from one point of view, that it is often a case of "You pay your money and you take your choice." Yes, that is quite true. But, remember you must first pay and down the full coin, full weight, of diligence and thoughtful care, of research as complete and as original as you can make it. Not until then are you in a position to make a choice at all, but then you are entitled to take your own choice. Having made that preliminary payment, the choice is not simply an honest one, but it is the only choice which is open for you as an intelligent being. You may not be right, in the sense in which the All-seeing Eye, the All-knowing Mind understands right, but you are right in so far as you have been true to all the available methods and opportunities open to you for attaining a correct result—(applause). Now I would say in regard to the whole of theology in every department, the laborious department of Biblical criticism, the fascinating department of Church History, the constructive department of Christian theology, let your theology be purely scientific, as far as you can make it so. Divest it as absolutely as you can from the personal element of your own controlling prejudices, even of your own aspirations and fancies. Consult and make the best use you can of every source by which the mind of God makes its approach to the mind of man; and remember that in this department you are not dealing with a subject which is under the control of your wish and will, that you are interpreting actual realities, matter about which there is a truth and a falsity. It is your duty to come as near to the pure, clear line of this majestic truth as God may give you grace and strength wherewith to approach it—(applause). But, on the other hand, let your religion be purely practical, absolutely personal. I was rejoiced to hear the personal tone, the frankness, the freshness, even, I may say, the originality of the grasp of religion as brought before us in the examination upon Homiletics. I was comforted in the thought that the young men educated here are looking at the problem of present religion with the actual eyes and feeling, and feeling the force of religion with the living hearts of those who will have to animate the religion of to-day and preach the religion of days to come. But while I say theology should be scientific and religion personal, I do not forget that, as indeed we may have been reminded by a passage in Xenophon to-day, sophia (wisdom) is not altogether, either etymologically or practically, distinct from sôphrosynê (self-control). Character plays an important part in our scientific as well as in our practical life. It is the real root from which all the intellectual as well as the moral activities of the man must spring. He who in his own personal self is lax of life and idle of habit, who gives way to the temptations of the lower nature, can never bring that pure quality of intellect to bear upon the noblest problems, which the industrious, the devout, the pure can bring; in such strength as it has been bestowed by the Almighty, and with that strength unimpaired by any vices of his own—(applause). The other day the mortal frame of the greatest man in the world of physical science in our time was laid in the grave within England's noble Abbey. We look upon this as a triumph of science; I think we may appeal to it also as a triumph of character—(applause). In the Grammar School of Shrewsbury Charles Darwin's first preceptor was a clergyman to whom also fell the honour of becoming, at a later day, the tutor of George Eliot. About the time of the publication of the "Origin of Species through Natural Development" his old master was in a company where some one spoke of Darwin as an infidel. This old man replied in a moment—"No, sir! he is not an infidel. He was a good boy at school. He could put puzzling questions then, he can put puzzling questions now; but he is not an infidel"—(applause). I am quite sure that my dear old schoolmaster's feeling in this matter had nothing whatever to do with the contents of a book which, I imagine, he never read. But he relied upon the man, because he had proved the mettle and the morale of the boy. And in the same way, gentlemen, you who are going out to preach the gospel, you who are going out to make an influence of your own, and to speak such truths as you know, must ever remember this, that the world will judge you far more, very far more, by what you are, than by what you say—(applause). If they can rely upon the man, then they will be led to make large allowance for what they may deem errors in the presentation of opinion, and they will be led to feel that the impression you are producing is an impression which is salutary and helpful to their religious lives—(applause). There is, indeed, an important addition to the programme of studies in the case of some of our students. Those studies are to be protracted, though no longer in this place. To-day there is a departure from the usual custom of closing the labours of the session, in that there is no valedictory service. No, we don't propose to say "farewell" to those of our students who are going either to Owens College or to Manchester New College to continue their preparation for the ministry. I believe, gentlemen, you will not forget your first alma mater—(applause from the students)—and in the corridors at University Hall, and under the instruction of Manchester New College, you will be both mindful of, and grateful for, the influences and the information received within these walls. Here is another thing, which I believe and hope that you will not forget, and that is, the pledge of self-dedication to the ministry which you took on entering this institution, a solemn pledge "to preach and extend the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, especially among the less educated classes." These are not unmeaning words. It may be difficult to say which, in the theology, are "the less educated classes," at the present day—(applause)—and may become increasingly difficult as time runs on, if the popular information keeps its present rate, not to speak of enhancing its rapidity. But there can be no doubt in the minds of any as to which are "the less educated classes" in point of Christian religion. It is to bring the light of Christian religion to the darkened and sinful heart and home; to uplift the minds that have been debased in their self-indulgence and in the misery which it entails; to make the glory of the Christian religion to shine in our day as we are told it shone in the first ages, when martyrs died and confessors appealed—it is for this great end, young men, that you solemnly dedicate yourselves. The strength of this institution rests not in the erudition of its professors, not in the information at the command of its alumni, but in the devout and consistent self-dedication of the young spirits who come hither, that they may receive some little help for the maturing of their powers, to fit them for the great work, of which God Himself, our Father, has kindled the desire and the spirit in their hearts, as He awoke it at the first in the soul of His own Son.

Mr. S. S. Brettell has obtained the "Gaskell," and Mr. J. C. Pollard the "Owens" Scholarship in connection with the Home Missionary Board.

THE HOME MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

The annual meeting of this Conference was held on Thursday week, in the Memorial Hall, Manchester. According to usual custom the proceedings were commenced with the Lord's Supper.

The following members were present:—The Revs. W. G. Cadman, H. Eachus, W. Fielding, J. Freeston, N. Green, T. Leyland, D. Matts, J. T. Marriott, W. Mitchell, J. McDowell, R. Pilcher, J. Pollard, H. W. Perris, G. Ride, W. R. Shanks, J. G. Slater, W. S. Smith, W. R. Smyth, E. Turland, J. J. Wright, F. M. Blair, and Mr. J. Phillips.

The Committee's report and the accounts were adopted. On the motion of the Rev. W. G. CADMAN, seconded by the Rev. J. G. SLATER, the balance of £8 1s. 4d. due to the treasurer of the Droylsden Mission was ordered to be paid out of the general fund.

The Rev. F. HAYDN WILLIAMS, on the motion of the SECRETARY, was elected a member of the Conference.

The roll was then called by the Secretary (the Rev. Noah Green), and the minutes of the last annual meeting having been read and confirmed, the annual report, which had been printed, was taken as read.

The report congratulated the Conference on its having attained its majority, and that the work of the past year had shown that the Society had satisfactorily used the experience and strength gathered while passing through its minority. Attention had been principally directed to the working of the missions at Droylsden and Douglas. At Droylsden the attendance of the past year had been a little under that of the previous year, which may be accounted for by the fact that the preaching room is not a good one, and in the winter is subject to currents of cold air which come in at the ceiling and other parts of the building, and very much affect the comfort and health of the congregation. In the Sunday-school there has been a slight falling off in numbers, both of scholars and teachers. There are on the books thirty-three scholars, as against thirty-nine last year, and six teachers, as against ten. Droylsden is a populous village, and there is no doubt of establishing a much larger congregation than the present one, when a comfortable chapel is erected, which there is a strong probability will be done at no very distant date. During the year the desirability of transferring the Droylsden Mission to the Manchester District Unitarian Association had been suggested, and after due consideration a resolution was passed recommending the Droylsden congregation to apply to the Association to be taken into their charge. The President and the Rev. J. G. Slater were appointed to take council with the congregation concerning the transfer, and it is suggested, we understand, by the Association to put up an iron church when a suitable site is found. Coming to Douglas the work there has gone steadily on, and the Mission has met with a fair measure of success. The summer services were recommenced on Whit-Sunday and continued to the beginning of October. The attendance was larger than it had been the previous season, and the offertory had increased. As the summer season was closing the feeling arose with the residents to carry on the work in winter. In the meanwhile the little band of worshippers carried on the services under the ministry of M. De Maine Brown, a resident, whose thoughtful discourses have delighted and edified hearers. This gentleman deserves special commendation for the valuable assistance given in this way to the Mission. It is gratifying to record that when the census of the attendances at the various churches and chapels in Douglas was taken, the infant mission numbered forty-one. As it was only opened in July, 1880, these numbers were very encouraging. The average attendance at the services at the close of the year was about twenty-five, which increased as the winter advanced to about 30. A Sunday-school has lately been started with seventeen scholars and four teachers. An invitation was given to the Committee to send representatives to the National Conference which was held last April in Liverpool. The invitation having been accepted, the President and Secretary were appointed to attend the gathering on behalf of the Missionary Conference. It gives the Committee much pleasure to say that not only have old friends repeated their kindness in contributing to the funds of the Missions, carried on by the Conference, but new ones have responded to appeals. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association have increased their grant from £10 to £20. James Hopgood, Esq., has repeated his donation of £5, the Memorial Hall Trustees have subscribed £10, the Liverpool Fellowship Fund £5; the Rev. Joseph Freeston 10s. 6d.; the Rev. S. F. Williams 5s.

The Rev. W. G. CADMAN submitted his financial statement, and it appeared that on the general fund account £28 14s. 9d. had been expended, and there was a balance in hand of £6 5s. 1d. On the Droylsden Mission account the balance due to the Treasurer was £3 1s. 4d., while on the Douglas account there was a balance in hand of £8 6s. 6d. On the whole the Conference had £6 10s. 3d. in hand.

The Rev. JOSEPH FREESTON then delivered an excellent president's address on home missionary work.

On the motion of the Rev. W. R. SHANKS, who expressed a wish that something should be done at Wisbech, where there is a closed chapel requiring £30 of an expenditure, a vote of thanks, seconded by the Rev. H. EACHUS, was passed to Mr. Freeston for his address. Mr. FREESTON briefly replied, urging that the Conference should do more work.

The following officers for next year were then appointed, viz.:—President, the Rev. J. G. Slater; Treasurer, the Rev. W. G. Cadman; Secretary, the Rev. N. Green; Auditor, Mr. John Phillips; Committee, the Revs. J. Black, M.A., J. McDowell, W. Mitchell, J. T. Marriot, and R. Pilcher, B.A.

On the following day the Conference assembled again, when an address on "The Public Worship Problem" was delivered by the Rev. H. WOODS PERRIS, late of Norwich, and was followed by a discussion. The address was published in full in our last number.

PRESBYTERIAN COLLEGE, CARMARTHEN.

The annual examination of this College was conducted last week by the Rev. J. T. Whitehead, the Rev. T. L. Marshall and Mr. S. S. Taylor, deputation from the Presbyterian Board, assisted by the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., of Swansea, and the Rev. William James, B.A., of Llandysul. The written examination in mathematics and natural philosophy was conducted by Mr. James a few days before the visit of the deputation. The public portion of the examination commenced on Tuesday, June 27, and was brought to a close by the distribution of prizes on the following Thursday afternoon.

On this occasion Mr. S. S. Taylor presided, and there were also present, in addition to the gentlemen already named, the Principal Professor of the College, the ministers of the town and neighbourhood, and several ladies. Our American friends, the Revs. J. Lloyd Jones, of Chicago, and G. W. Hosmer, of Cleveland, were also deeply interested auditors.

The CHAIRMAN said there was a time when the Christian ministers had to do all the intellectual education as well as the spiritual education of their flocks, but now all that was altered, and they had to do their best to lift themselves head and shoulders above their neighbours, that they might see that they fitted themselves for carrying out their work. Representing the Presbyterian Board on that occasion he felt that their thanks were due to those of their friends who had come together on an occasion of that kind, those gentlemen who were ministers in different parts of the country, and the ladies and others who came to help to make the gathering pleasant and agreeable, and to give their sympathy. He felt that the thanks of the Board were also due to the Professors who worked steadily but quietly and with so much painstaking and so much real earnestness. He also thought that the thanks of the Board were due to the bulk of the students for earnestly and conscientiously trying to make use of the opportunities there afforded to them. Offering a word of counsel as one who had seen something of the world, he advised them to make the best of their time whilst they had it. The course was only four years. Time went on rapidly, and it behooved them to make the best use of every opportunity afforded them, by diligence, usefulness, exactness and feeling. Real culture was what they all aimed at, because culture meant excellence, and as one of those present had remarked in the course of his sermon, the highest spiritual condition meant the highest cultivated condition that human nature could attain. That culture meant exactness, and whether in study of one kind or another, the real aim should be to do the thing in a manner most complete, therefore, most exact, most just, and most true. He trusted that was the aim of all present; that they did everything in the best, purest, and most noble form. After urging the students to be actuated by this feeling he suggested that they should also be generous, because that was what they were noted for. Their character was generosity and kindness—(applause). It was one of the pleasantest things when looking back upon their college life to feel that they had acted kindly and nobly to those with whom they had worked. The greater ability they possessed, the more easy their studies would be to them, and the more careful and conscientious they should be in setting a good example. He did not believe in their trying to help fellow students to pass through their studies easily. He was of opinion that every good thing had to be attained by labour, and if they helped a man, if they did another man's labour for him instead of leaving him to do it himself, they would not do the man any good, but would rather demoralise him, and take from him the opportunity which he should have made use of to improve himself. If, before he sat down, he said one or two words to those who had completed their course, he thought he ought to convey to them the best wishes of the Presbyterian Board for their prosperity in the future. They had taken the advantage of the small opportunities, whatever they may have been, that were afforded them at College, and were now about to go out into the difficult—he might almost say dangerous—service of Christian work. They had to fight against sin and wickedness, and those obstacles which beset Christian work. It was their duty to try and erase these evils. They would have a great and difficult task in many of these things, but the careful pursuance of their studies now would be most useful to them and would help them much in the work they would have to do. He would now call upon the Secretary to the Presbyterian Board, who was no stranger to those present.

The Rev. T. L. MARSHALL said most of those who were students there and the visitors too would know that that was one of the oldest Academic institutions amongst Nonconformists, whether in Wales or in England—(applause). The Presbyterian Board of which he had the honour of being secretary, was the oldest of Nonconformist institutions, having been founded at the end of the seventeenth century, when the liberties of Englishmen were saved on the accession of William III. The position of Nonconformists then led them to form the Presbyterian Board, and afterwards the Independent Board, in order to consolidate and strengthen the churches in different parts of the country connected with those denominations. That college had a very honourable history, and it depended upon the students of the present and of the future to maintain the noble traditions which were so closely associated with it. He had an advantage in some respects over his colleagues and over the professors in being able to compare the present with the past. He could say that the college had greatly improved during the last few years—(loud applause). Partly owing to the more systematic way of examining candidates, they had a better set of students,—students who were better prepared to receive the advantages offered than was the case when he (the rev. speaker) came down to the college first, which was more than a quarter of a century ago. Some of the improvements were in a great measure due to the earnest labours of the principal, who had introduced new life into the working of the institution, and both he and his colleagues commanded the confidence and respect of the Board. He had been a little surprised when taking up some of the local journals to read the controversies which occasionally took place, and had been considerably amused by a statement made by a gentleman who appeared to have some local reputation. He was surprised to see a letter published in one of the Carmarthen papers stating that "dissent, by its very name, implies disagreement and disaffection, and fosters a discordant opinion." The writer had, of course, a right to his own opinions, but it was very obvious that he differed from them, and therefore he was a dissenter, inasmuch as he differed from other people—(applause). Many people, and especially those in the Church of England, seemed to imagine that all those who differed from them must necessarily be in the wrong, reminding him of a rather sarcastic statement made by Archbishop Whately, in reference to his own church, that he did not claim that it was infallible like the Church of Rome; still, it was never in the wrong—(laughter and applause). He left his hearers to discern the difference between these statements. When he saw all that was said in the controversy referred to with reference to Professor Morgan—whose absence he very much regretted—he must say that if they had not known him well and had not thoroughly understood his character and its great merit, they would be inclined to think that they had a very suspicious character in their midst. He was spoken of as being of a "meddlesome and quarrelsome disposition." He (the rev. speaker) had known Professor Morgan for more than a quarter of a century, and he was the last person in the world of whom this could justly be said. The writer of the letter to which he referred went on to say, "I charitably hope that Professor Morgan was not under the influence of the evil one when he penned his letter"—(loud laughter). That was an expression which was meant to imply that he was very decidedly under the influence of the evil one—(laughter). He was sorry to see that coming from a churchman and clergyman, because Professor Morgan was well known and respected by those who had known him longer and more intimately than the gentleman to whom he (the speaker) now referred. But Professor Morgan needed no vindication of his character at their hands. The late and ever-to-be lamented Bishop Thirlwall in a little friendly controversy he had with Professor Morgan some years ago had spoken of the courtesy and ability which Professor Morgan had displayed, and for their part they would rather accept the testimony of Bishop Thirlwall than that of the gentleman in question. Mr. Marshall then referred to the great loss which Wales had sustained in the death of their post-preacher, the Rev. Thomas Jones, of Swansea. He had had no personal knowledge of Mr. Jones, but from what he had read and heard, he thought they had lost one of the foremost men of Wales, who had reflected great honour upon the ministry, and had attained that high standard of the ministry which their lay friend in the chair had so well described—(cheers). Eighteen candidates had applied for admission that year, and seventeen had come up for examination, of whom nine would be recommended for admission. Besides, there were two English candidates from the north of England who would be examined with the same papers in their own neighbourhood.

The Rev. J. T. WHITEHEAD, of London, expressed a most favourable opinion of the examination, with hardly any qualification whatever.

The Rev. J. E. MANNING, M.A., of Swansea, said he was very well satisfied with the examination. Some men had lagged behind, but the majority had done well—some of them exceptionally well.

The prizes awarded in the examination were then distributed by the chairman, as follows:—

PRIZE LIST.

FOURTH YEAR.—First prize, J. D. Jones, L. W. Poans, squales, £2 each; second prize, Wm. Joseph, George Phillips, squales, £1 each.

THIRD YEAR.—First prize, John Morgan, £2 10s. No second prize.

SECOND YEAR.—First prize, T. Lloyd, £2; second prize, W. R. Bowen, W. Roberts, B. C. Davies, £1 10s. each.

FIRST YEAR.—First prize, E. K. Evans, £2; second prize, James Jones, R. H. Lambley £1 10s. each. To all other students presents of books.

The PRINCIPAL (Dr. Vance Smith) referred in feeling terms to the late Mr. Sharpe, and the great beneficence of the deceased gentleman to that college and other colleges, and the course of education generally. Mr. Sharpe's two daughters were anxious to continue their father's work, and it was their gift which he had to distribute that day—(applause). The Sharpe prizes had been divided into seven portions, and awarded as follows:—Two firsts of £2 each, William Joseph and Lewis W. Evans; two seconds of 30s. each, John Morgan and George Phillips; three thirds of £1 each, J. D. Jones, Lewis Morgan, and D. G. Davies.

The CHAIRMAN gave "Hearty welcome to two visitors from the other side of the Atlantic," the Rev. Lloyd Jones and the Rev. Mr. Hosmer, the former of whom had his birthplace in that neighbourhood.

The Rev. LLOYD JONES said that England was sending millions of her unwashed unregenerate children to America, and she ought to send along some missionaries to deal with them. They would find plenty of difficulties over there, although they knew nothing of conformity—(applause).

The Rev. Mr. HOSMER also replied.

The Rev. J. R. KILSEY JONES, of Llanwrtyd, as the oldest student of the college present, thanked Mr. Marshall for his handsome reference to the late Rev. Mr. Jones, of Swansea. Mr. Jones had been admitted to be one of the most natural speakers in Wales or England. Once last summer he asked Mr. Jones if natural speaking was an easy thing, and Mr. Jones said it was most difficult. One of the first lectures their late friend delivered he wrote out six times, till he could not make it more perfect, and then he read it every day (except Sundays) for six weeks. He wanted to know whether students had the pluck and perseverance to do that sort of thing. It was very kind of Mr. Marshall to defend Professor Morgan, but that defence was a superfluity. A tailor might as well attempt to upset a pyramid with his needle as any man to upset Mr. Morgan's reputation—(laughter and applause). He well understood the references which had been made to the services which Nonconformity had rendered to Wales. He never felt prouder than he then did of being a Nonconformist. That Carmarthen College had contributed its share to the happy and peaceful condition of the Principality. Did not Wales compare favourably with Ireland? The judges came round, and when they found nothing to do they complimented the grand juries, and said that it was the activity of their magistrates and their intelligent interference had brought about the favourable state of the country. He often wished he could whisper a few correcting sentences in the ears of the judges. These magistrates! There were tyrants in Wales—he could name them, but he would not. They had tyrants, but their palaces were never set on fire, their corn barns were never set in flames, and no one lurked behind hedges waiting for them. These tyrants might leave their doors open and their silver and gold vessels unprotected, and they would be quite safe unless some vagabond of a stranger from across the borders should come along—(laughter and applause). Churchmen call their chapels "gospel-shops," and these "gospel-shops" were found on every hill-side at the farther end of the most tortuous glens and in every vale. It was the unpaid police of the principality—the Sunday-school teachers and local preachers, who had not had the advantage of a course at that or any other college, who had brought the Principality into its present condition—(cheers).

The proceedings were closed with prayer by the Rev. J. E. K. JONES.

[A full and admirable report of the proceedings appear in the Welshman of this week, and the South Wales Daily News give an excellent summary.]

ASSOCIATION OF IRISH NON-SUBSCRIBING PRESBYTERIANS AND OTHER FREE CHRISTIANS.

On Tuesday evening, June 20, the annual meeting of the Association was opened in the First Presbyterian Church. There was a large attendance. The outgoing President, the Rev. T. H. M. SCOTT, M.A. (Dunmurry), preached from Col. iii. 24 (last clause).

The Hon. SECRETARY (the Rev. Alex. Gordon, M.A., Belfast) read the roll.

The Rev. J. A. Crozier, B.A., was elected president, on the motion of the Rev. C. J. M'ALESTER, seconded by the Rev. S. C. NELSON. Mr. Crozier then took the chair, and thanked the Association for the honour conferred upon him. In the course of his address he said:—They could not remain lifeless in the present fearful condition of their unhappy country. They could not but feel that it was their duty to sympathise with her woes, and deprecate the outrage and crime that were being perpetrated over the land. He hoped it would be the happy record of his presidency that it was coincident with the dawn of a brighter day for this country, and that the crimes that had so deeply afflicted her, and that had made her name a reproach among the nations of the earth, shall cease. In regard to the work with which the Association was more immediately engaged, he saw many indications of more prosperous times amongst them. On every side they saw amongst other Churches, whether Presbyterian or Episcopalian, the spread of the spirit of co-operation, and a greater energy in Christian work.

The benediction was pronounced, and the proceedings concluded.

WEDNESDAY.

The business of the Association was proceeded with on Wednesday, June 21, the President, the Rev. J. A. Crozier, B.A., in the chair. After devotional exercises,

The Hon. SECRETARY (the Rev. Alex. Gordon, M.A.) called the roll of elders. There was a considerable attendance of ministers and elders. Mr. Gordon then read the minutes of the previous annual meeting, which were confirmed; and

On the motion of the Rev. HUGH MOORE, M.A. (Newtownards), seconded by the Rev. S. C. NELSON, M.A. (Downpatrick), the Rev. A. Gordon was requested to continue as secretary, and he was thanked for the manner in which he had discharged the duties of the office of the past.

The Rev. T. H. M. SCOTT gave notice of the following motion:—"That it be an instruction to the General Purposes Committee to prepare and send forward for presentation in Parliament a petition protesting against the continuance on the part of the Government of England in the fatal and demoralising opium trade in the East, and asking that a Christian nation may be considered free from a traffic which was a crime against humanity."

The following resolution was moved by Rev. ALEX. GORDON, and adopted:—"That a memorial be forwarded from this meeting to the Chief Secretary, urging the claims of our religious community in reference to the Crown vacancy on the senatus of the Royal University."

THE REPORT OF THE THEOLOGICAL COMMITTEE.

The Rev. C. J. M'ALESTER submitted the report of the Theological Education Committee. It stated that the instruction of the students during the past session had been entrusted to the Rev. Alex. Gordon, expressed it as the opinion of the majority of the committee that a theological institute should be established in connection with the Association, and that the education of the students for the ministry should be carried on within their own ecclesiastical bounds. It further stated that the examinations at the close of the year afforded the most gratifying evidence of the value of Mr. Gordon's instructions. No effort had yet been made to revive the Ministerial Education Fund. In moving the adoption of the report, he might observe that he remembered, though somewhat vaguely, a debate taking place many years ago in connection with the question of the education of their students in the then General Synod of Ulster, and he supposed in the Associated Synod. Previously their students had been educated in Glasgow, but subsequently provision was made for theological training, as well as the undergraduate course for their students, in the Belfast Institution, afterwards the Royal Academical Institution. He had a vivid impression of the importance then attached to home education on the part of the older ministers of the Synod of Ulster. He was sure the very feelings which actuated them were those which now prompt him to advocate strongly the education of their students within their own bounds. All would be ready to admit that they had received most important aid from their brethren educated in England, and some of them Englishmen. He should be very glad that the same kindly feelings should still subsist between them as hitherto, but at the same time he felt the importance of having the education of their students for the ministry conducted at home in this country. He believed that the opinions which he now expressed on this subject were also the opinions entertained by the great majority of the members of the Theological Committee. They all remembered distinctly the great advantage which their denomination possessed in having men like the Revs. John Scott Porter and

Dr. Montgomery at the head of the theological instructions of their students, and he was glad to say that, as a successor to the Rev. J. S. Porter, they had one who was eminently qualified to be the head of such a theological institute. While education was of the first importance, he regarded other matters as even more desirable—he meant a mind and heart in the work of the ministry. There were in the present day many occupations which young men of ability and culture could follow with much more advantage, in point of compensation for labour, than they could receive in the ministry. There was no profession so imperfectly remunerated as that of the ministry, and yet there was no portion [of the community so uncompensated]. The truth was, that all that ministers could reasonably look for was a sufficient competence for the support of themselves and their families. In entering the ministry, however, the candidate should have higher objects before him than making money. He was not so foolish as to say that they should not think of that subject; for it was right that men in the ministry should be respectably supported; but they should aim at something more than earning money beyond what was requisite for the purpose stated. The ministers in every Church meet with discouragements and annoyances; but he did not believe there was any Church in Christendom in which ministers, labouring earnestly, were subjected to more discouragement and annoyances than were the ministers of that Church.

The Rev. S. C. NELSON (Downpatrick) moved an amendment. He desired to express his satisfaction with the manner in which Mr. Gordon conducted the education of the students under his charge. They never had a professor more thoroughly competent to give instructions to the youth of their Church than Mr. Gordon was. But he (Mr. Nelson) did feel that it was a very heartless task for a professor to have to deliver lectures to so few as two students, or, as had happened, to not more than one, and he regarded it as equally heartless for the students to be engaged in that solitary work. He believed that it would be a great advantage to the students in preparing themselves for the ministry if they had an opportunity of meeting with other students, and be inspired by that energy as they would be for the studies which they were attending to. Such advantages they could secure only by attendance at the Manchester New College, London, or the Home Missionary Board, both of which institutes were equipped with excellent professors. His amendment was in these words—"That the report of the Theological Committee be received and entered on the minutes; that we approve of the arrangements made and carried out last year for the instruction of the undergraduate students; that we express our thanks to the Rev. Alexander Gordon for his very valuable services, and request his acceptance of £50 for his trouble, which sum we direct the committee to pay out of the interest of the Professorial Fund. That our students, after graduation, attend for such time as we may hereafter arrange for, in each case at Manchester New College or at the Home Missionary Board, for such additional instructions and exercises as may qualify and prepare them for the efficient discharge of the duties of the Christian ministry. That, in order to encourage and assist them, we allocate from the interest of the Professorial Fund a bursary of £30 per annum for a student attending the Manchester New College, and £20 per annum to a student attending the Home Missionary Board. That the Theological Committee be now dissolved; and that the General Purposes Committee be henceforth entrusted with the carrying out of the above-mentioned arrangements."

The Rev. DAVID THOMPSON (Dromore) seconded the amendment.

The Rev. W. S. SMITH (Antrim) said they were not sure that the students, even if they presented themselves at the Home Missionary Board, would be elected.

The Rev. F. M'CAMMOND (Banbridge) remarked that a student of theirs who had been three years at the Queen's College failed to pass the entrance examination of the Home Missionary Board.

The Rev. W. NAPIER (Clough) thought they should have regard to their powers regarding the money before they allotted it. He was not one who had much respect for the professorial character, and he was prepared to adopt the view put forward in the Association some years ago by the Rev. James Orr, of Clonmel, in a very sensible speech, in which he said that lectures were to a large extent a humbug. He (Mr. Napier) thought that whenever they had students to attend to they could surely find amongst them a minister to train them in theology, and a certain remuneration could be given for the trouble. He believed that it was better for a student to study a good text-book, and be examined afterwards, than to be listening to lectures. He quite concurred with Mr. Nelson's idea of the importance of contact with other minds, but he did not think that object could be attained to a greater extent in the colleges named in the amendment than at home here, because when he was at college in England, in one of the institutes referred to, there was only another student with him to engage the attention of four professors—(laughter).

The Rev. T. DUNKERLEY (Comber) reminded Mr. Napier that the students of Manchester New College were classed together according to subjects, and that in that way there were as many as nine or twelve students in some of the classes.

The Rev. Mr. NAPIER said it was not so in his year, but at any rate the value of lectures was overestimated. He might also add that a number of their congregations were not flourishing, and perhaps it would be a wiser way to use their funds to pay an accomplished minister with a small stipend £50 to train students for the ministry. He did not think, however, that they were in a position to finally decide the matter this year. They were not an exceedingly rich body, and their people were not exceedingly liberal in donations for religious or educational purposes, so that it would be more prudent, perhaps, for the Association to husband its funds. He thought they should not create any new life interests in these funds.

The Rev. A. GORDON thanked Mr. M'Alester and Mr. Nelson for the kind terms in which they referred to him. He endorsed Mr. Napier's view: that to create new life interests in these funds would probably involve them in difficulties similar to those from which they had recently escaped. He agreed with the opinion that to educate students under one man would be a great mistake. He believed that they could, from time to time, with the moneys at their disposal, make arrangements for the education of such students as would come forward. He confessed to considerable disappointment in the working of the Theological Committee. He felt inclined to move an amendment proposing to drop all the words at the beginning of Mr. Nelson's proposal, and substituting these words—"That the Theological Committee be now dissolved, and that the General Purposes Committee be entrusted with the arrangements for the education of our theological students." Regarding the proposal to establish bursaries for their students at Manchester New College, and at the Home Missionary Board, it should be remembered that these institutions would deduct the amount of the bursary from their foundation exhibitions; and the association could not expect to be able to support a young man in London for £30 a session, and pay in addition to that the professors' fees. Besides, in order to have their students put on the foundation, it was necessary that the students should pass a very stiff examination, and if the student was put on the foundation as an immediate divinity student he must have his degree, and there was no fund at their disposal for doing that.

The Rev. J. McCaw (Killinchy) seconded Mr. Gordon's proposal.

The Rev. THOMAS DUNKERLEY said it was true that they could not support a student in London for less than £30 a session; but, if they could not be put on the foundation, the students in that case would not be able to do that association credit, and, therefore, would not be worthy of aid. He thought there should be a stimulus for students to exert themselves and take a high position, so that the status of their ministry might be kept up. He did not at all agree with Mr. Napier's idea of placing studies by a student on a level with lectures; at the same time, he admitted with Mr. Nelson that it was a most heartless thing for a student to be studying in a class so small as to be composed of two or three persons. It must be, indeed, an extraordinary nature that could tolerate such a form of training, and they could not expect always to have extraordinary natures amongst them. He thought that the number of students that had been trained since the establishment of the Ministerial Fund was so small that they should feel called on to adopt a new mode of attending to their students for the ministry.

The Rev. J. HALL (Ballyclare) thought that it was hardly worth their while to have a staff of professors to teach two students only. It was a well-known fact that a great number of their young men went to England for education, and also that a great number of their congregations chose clergymen from England, and who were educated in England; and the Association did not prevent either of these things being done. He would be glad, indeed, if they had, like the General Assembly, such a large number of congregations that they would be justified in expenditure for colleges and professors. The greater number of their present ministers were educated in England. He agreed with Mr. Nelson that the students, having obtained their degrees, should proceed to the Manchester New College, or to the Home Missionary Board. But he was not prepared to support the proposal in reference to a theological institute for the Association. He agreed with Mr. Napier that they were not in a position to settle the question now, and he thought it should be referred to a committee to consider. He had no doubt in that way a right conclusion would be arrived at.

The Rev. J. J. WRIGHT (Mountpottinger) said that the only argument he had heard yet in favour of establishing a theological institute was that they should endeavour to keep their funds in this country. But, surely, if the students received a better education in England than here, the money should be expended where they got the better education. As a matter of fact, whatever advantages existed in Ireland in reference to education, the young men for the ministry, while aware of those advantages, passed them by, preferring to be educated in the English colleges. The numbers of students in the colleges in England at present from the North of Ireland proved what he said, and indicated something of the way in which the money for educational purposes should be used.

The Rev. J. A. KELLY (Rademon) thought the subject should be allowed to lie over till they received information as to how their students could be entered in the colleges he alluded to.

The Rev. J. MISKIMMIN (Greyabbey) heartily agreed with the spirit of Mr. Nelson's proposal, but he thought they were not yet in a position to give effect to it. He also agreed with Mr. Napier that a good text-book when studied was better than a professor's lecture.

The Rev. J. KENNEDY (Larne) thought that they should require the committee, if they passed Mr. Gordon's amendment, to report to the Association.

The Rev. R. ORR said he could not vote for the amendment.

The PRESIDENT suggested the propriety of taking advantage of the opportunities for theological training and degrees which the Dublin University had placed within their reach.

The amendment of Mr. Gordon was adopted, and the report was received.

On the motion of the Rev. Mr. NAPIER, it was resolved that the General Purposes Committee have power to draw upon the Professorial Fund for the purposes specified in the preceding resolution.

ADDRESS TO THE LORD LIEUTENANT.

The Rev. A. GORDON moved, and the Rev. J. KENNEDY seconded:—"That a deputation be appointed to wait upon the lord lieutenant with an address of congratulation on his appointment to office."

THE PRESENT CRISIS.

The Rev. C. J. M'ALESTER moved:—"That a committee be now appointed to draw up a circular, to be immediately issued with the signature of the President, recommending special prayer in our congregations suitable to the present crisis in the affairs of our nation." He introduced that motion with sorrow and pain, but with a feeling that it was right to bring it forward. If they were overtaken by trouble as individuals, or if sorrow came into their homes as Christians, they brought their trials before their Heavenly Father. Sad calamities had befallen their country, and great afflictions had come into certain neighbourhoods. As for instance, since his settlement in Holywood, they were visited twice with cholera, and on these occasions all the Christian Churches exerted themselves as best they could to alleviate the suffering consequent upon that plague. At present in our country, in one portion of it, there was much unsettledness. He did not want to drag party politics into their association, but this was not a question of party politics. It was a question affecting the best interests of their nation, and affecting not one party, but all parties. They found that law and order had been set at naught; that the authorities seemed unable to cope with the difficulties that surrounded them; and that outrages most terrible were committed, and murders most fiendish and cold-blooded, while the perpetrators of those crimes uniformly escape with impunity. There was evidently on the part of many in this country sympathy with those who committed such outrages, and there was, on the part of a large portion of the community, terror so great that they feared to give information. There was emphatically in three-fourths of the country a reign of terror. It was true that for a length of time the agricultural portion of the community were subjected to great hardships and difficulties. Those difficulties did not come on at once, and could not be at once removed. Those who now held the reins of Government had exerted themselves as far as they could, and, he should say, had even gone beyond the limits of strict justice in order that in that way they might remove the hardships under which the farming community had been labouring. All those efforts, noble and generous as they were, seemed to have been useless. The Government appealed, and he thought wisely, to the generosity of the nation; but they had appealed in vain. But a fact lay behind all the agitation in connection with the Land League; it was not simply reform of the land laws they looked for. He who was looked upon as the leader—although not the most extreme man in a certain party—early in this agitation stated, in words that were to this effect, that if it was only to reform the land laws and relieve those who were ill-treated in consequence of those laws they were to work, he would not take off his coat. He aimed at something more. He aimed at the disintegration of the kingdom, and the separation of Ireland from the sister island. He felt that if that were accomplished a great calamity would fall upon this country, and on none more than the members of that association. For if there was one denomination in the country specially attached to the principles of civil and religious liberty, it was that one of theirs. They had been for centuries the consistent advocates of civil and religious liberty. And if the plans of a certain party could be carried out, their civil and religious liberty would not be safe for a day. He thought with sorrow and with terror on the terrible suffering which have been brought into so many homes by the fearful outrages that have been committed, and he felt that those who may have had most influence with a large mass of the population of this island had not from the beginning, and had not yet, spoken out as they ought to have done, whether they be priests or laymen, denouncing those fearful outrages against the laws of religion and against the laws of humanity. He felt that at this crisis of their country's history it became them to bring their sorrows and trials and anxieties to the Throne of Grace, and to go, as children, and ask His blessing and guidance on those to whom He had entrusted the government of this country; and put up an earnest prayer that in a little time those dark clouds may pass away, and by and by all the inhabitants of this country shall be living in peace with one another and loyal to the Government—(applause).

The Rev. T. H. M. SCOTT had such deep and earnest sympathy with the resolution proposed and and so ably spoken to by Mr. M'Alester that he had no hesitation in seconding it.

The Rev. JOHN MISKIMMIN felt as strongly as anyone regret at seeing the unhappy state of this country. He believed no language was too strong to express their abhorrence of the terrible deeds that had been committed in this island. But he thought the resolution was without precedent, and he thought, too, that it was unnecessary. Their ministers had all given expression already to their horror at the outrages which had been committed in Ireland. Besides, the prayer to be offered under such circumstances should rather be the spontaneous effort of individuals than a compliance with such a circular as the resolution contemplated. He moved the previous question.

The Rev. HUGH MOORE seconded the amendment.

The Rev. ALEXANDER GORDON said Mr. Miskimmin was right in saying that there was no precedent for the resolution; but there was no precedent for the present state of this country. He fell in heartily with the resolution.

The Rev. J. F. KENNARD supported the motion. No one felt more paralysed than he did when he heard of the outrages which had been committed in the Phoenix Park and other places.

The Rev. DAVID GORDON was very glad that Mr. M'Alester had afforded them an opportunity of speaking out on this question. They were a loyal people, and they were the advocates of civil and religious liberty, and the opponents of those who would attempt to exercise tyranny in the land, or to crush the rights of the people. The man who would say to him "You must not pay rent" he would regard as one who interfered with his civil rights. The Unitarians were a loyal and law-abiding people, and they sought to support—no matter who he was who headed the Government—the man who endeavoured to uphold the civil and religious rights of the people. This great excitement, which they all deeply deplored, was the result of the action of a party in America, who were quite distinct from the Americans, and to whom the Americans gave the cold shoulder. It was by that class that the dangerous associations were formed, and they were enriched by the money of the native Irish, who were but too credulous, and these associations sent to Ireland the men who were wicked enough to perform those horrible crimes. The members of the Non-Subscribing Association rejoiced to have an opportunity of testifying to their abhorrence of the crimes perpetrated, and their utter alienation from everyone who had tried to perpetrate or encourage the commission of those outrages. They were loyal to her Majesty; they were the advocates of civil and religious liberty; they were the friends of the Union, and by it they would stand, and they would put their foot on the system or on the men who attempted to crush them in their position as the upholders of law and order. The resolution enabled them to express their adherence to the great principles that joined them to the larger and better land, whose people were the greatest friends of liberty on God's earth—(applause).

The Rev. R. J. ORR proposed that, instead of issuing a circular as stated in the resolution, they should, at their conference that evening, unite in prayer for the objects contemplated by Mr. M'ALESTER.

The Rev. F. THOMAS seconded Mr. Orr's proposal.

Mr. WM. SPACKMAN thought that Mr. Orr's proposal and Mr. M'ALESTER's might both be adopted and carried out.

The previous question was then put, and lost by a majority of 14 to 8, and the original motion was then agreed to.

The report of the Theological Library Committee and the report of the Committee on Temperance were also disposed of.

CONFERENCE.

The Association met in the evening at eight o'clock, when a conference was held, the subject for consideration being "The Religious Needs of our Congregations." This was introduced in a paper read by the Rev. T. DUNKERLEY, of Comber. In the course of his address, he said that Non-Subscribing congregations occupied a peculiar position at the present time. In the intelligence and moral character of their members they were confessedly high, and it might well be supposed that, owing to the wider growth of enlightenment, which was leading men to break away from the old creed-bound Churches, and to seek a freer and more rational faith, the time of their Church had come. But they looked in vain for a progress adequate to reasonable expectation. The elder Churches exhibited signs of decay, some were even sensibly crumbling, yet their own Church did little more than hold its ground—men whose faith was too large to be confined in orthodox trammels, and whose souls longed for the free air of heaven, do not throng into their gates as into a refuge of peace and freedom. Why was this? The answer to the inquiry might enable them to put their house in order and await with confidence a more fruitful time. The first need was to make their worship productive of good to the member, and the chief aim to produce most good. To attain this high worship and its accompanying blessings there was need that a most earnest and most devout spirit on the part of pastor and people should be brought to their weekly gatherings. They could not shame or whip their souls into devotion; they must wait for the descent of the Spirit; but there was an attitude that repelled as well as one that drew. By co-operation, earnestness, and faithfulness, high results would be won.

The Rev. C. J. M'ALESTER also spoke on the subject.

The Rev. H. M. SCOTT suggested that they should introduce a liturgy into the worship of the Church.

The Rev. D. GORDON believed that a great work lay before Unitarians. They had to establish in the world an idea of God—that they should not approach Him with that sycophantic fear with which the heathen approached their gods, and which promoted in their souls more fear than love. If they wished to be a missionary Church their first object should be to stir up the zeal of their own congregations. He did not like this thing called liturgy. Why should they be the followers of fashion? and this seemed like following fashion.

Mr. WILLIAM SPACKMAN said that for fifty years he had been a Unitarian, and he knew that Unitarianism was making progress. If Unitarians were true to themselves, and did their duty to themselves, they would make more progress. He did not think the question of liturgy should trouble them at all, and he, for his part, could worship just as well without it. He believed it would be the greatest advantage possible that family worship should be extensively established, and he would be glad to see their clergymen introducing this matter whenever they could.

The Rev. A. GORDON also spoke.

The MODERATOR, in closing the conference, said that the desire underlying the discussion was that there should be greater zeal both on the part of lay and clerical members of the Church for the spiritual welfare of others.

After devotional exercise, the conference closed.

THURSDAY.

In connection with their annual meeting, the Association met at a public breakfast on Thursday in the Lombard Hall, for the purpose of a conference on temperance. The guests included several ladies. After breakfast, the chair was taken by Mr. JOHN SMYTH, M.A., of Banbridge, and the meeting was addressed by the Chairman, the Revs. C. J. M'ALESTER, J. POLLARD, J. MISKIMMON, A. M'KINLEY, J. A. CROZIER, D. THOMPSON, J. F. KENNARD; Mr. W. SPACKMAN, and Mr. JOHN PATON, lecturer for the United Kingdom Alliance.

THE ANNUAL MEETING.

The members of the Association reassembled in the first Presbyterian Meeting-house, Rosemary-street, shortly after the conference on temperance, and resumed the business of the annual meeting. The President, the Rev. J. A. CROZIER (Newry), occupied the chair.

REPORT OF THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL COMMITTEE.

The Rev. T. H. M. SCOTT (convener) read and moved the adoption of the Sunday-school Committee, which was a very interesting statement of the Sunday-school operations carried on during the year. The report was adopted, and a committee appointed to look after the Sunday-school work for the ensuing year.

THE SALVATION ARMY.

The Rev. D. THOMPSON read the report of the Missionary Committee.

The Rev. T. H. M. SCOTT, speaking to the report, urged the importance of missionary preaching to the people. He had refrained from introducing doctrinal points in his discourses, and had endeavoured to present the work as he found it in Christ. He rejoiced to see the progress which the Salvation Army was making, and he was glad to know that the leading Churches of the country had been giving the exponents of the Salvation Army their countenance and encouragement. Some persons might sneer at the Salvation Army, but he thought if the Non-Subscribing Association of Ministers threw themselves into the work, something after the manner of the Salvation Army, perhaps different and better results would be observable in their own Church.

The Rev. Mr. KELLY said they should rather make known the doctrines by which they themselves were prepared to stand, and should not be forbidden to use the name Unitarian, which they all held dear. He thought it would be a good thing if they had printed and ready for distribution leaflets of their position theologically, and then have them circulated as their orthodox friends did.

The Rev. JAMES KENNEDY said the people of Larne had amongst them a detachment of that class of fanatics which Mr. Scott had been commending, and during their stay in Larne it was a common thing to have the little boys and girls of the town using in the most irreverent manner names which the members of that association held most sacred. If the Salvation Army tactics were to be approved of he expected to find in the future generations a growth of the theories of religion and liberty such as those which were expressed in the French Revolution. He hoped he would never see the gymnastics of the Salvation Army made an example for the members of the Association to follow.

Mr. WM. SPACKMAN narrated his recent experiences of a Salvation Army meeting in London. He saw there a number of people, old and young, rising up in the hall where the proceedings took place and admitting that under the influence of the Army they had been converted and led to the adoption of a new life. He was of opinion that there could be no objection to such a movement as long as it did good. He thought the association should make some effort to provide services on Sundays for their people who were staying at Bangor during the season. He thought arrangements might be made for acquiring the use of the Orange Hall in Bangor on Sundays for the purpose of conducting services. It was desirable that their people should not have an excuse for going to other places of worship; there was a danger in allowing people to fall into such habits. As to the use of the word Unitarianism in their missionary teaching, it was not necessary to use it. It was a term used to distinguish them from Trinitarians; and, besides, as long as the teacher taught the truths of the Gospel, he must be teaching Unitarian principles.

The PRESIDENT thought it should not be forgotten that they were not there as a Unitarian Church; they were there as a Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church. He remembered on one occasion they refused a congregation that came to them with a letter of application in which they stated that they were to be considered as belonging to the Unitarian Church. Consequently the missionaries should preach Non-Subscribing principles.

Mr. J. SMYTH (Banbridge) said that they should not consider the objectionable parts of the Salvation Army, but have regard to the good it was able to effect. The better the movement, the more liable it was to be troubled with unworthy persons. He thought that as long as the Salvation Army people proved themselves able to reclaim people from lives of sin they should not turn their back upon them. He thought the laymen were not sufficiently active in this missionary work, and he also thought that that was partly the result of the fact that the clergymen did not encourage them.

The Rev. A. GORDON (hon. secretary) said that remarks had been made implying that they did not recognise a harmony between their position as Non-Subscribers and their position as Unitarians. Standing on the basis of accepted truths, as Non-Subscribers they were free to arrive at any results through the avenues by which God's truth comes to the human intelligence. They were Non-Subscribers in principle and Unitarian in fact. While there was nothing to prevent any Non-Subscriber from being a Trinitarian, at the same time there was nothing to prevent a Non-Subscriber as such throwing his whole heart into the work and the progress of any theology in which he believed. He approved highly of Mr. Kelly's suggestion in favour of circulating leaflets on which their principles were stated. They could state their foundation principles—that was their Non-Subscribing Presbyterian principles—and then they set forth the results at which they arrived from those principles.

The report was adopted, and a committee appointed to take charge of missionary work.

ADDRESS TO THE QUEEN.

The Rev. T. H. M. SCOTT moved:—"That an address be presented to the Queen expressing our loyalty and attachment to the Throne and the British constitution." If ever there was a time when that association required to stand forward resolutely and plainly and declare its attachment to the Throne it was the present time. If the country was not on the eve of a civil war it was not far removed from it. Their country seemed to be plunged in a dark abyss by hands that were trying to carry out their ends, not for the good of the country, but to further their own selfish purposes. They were all the more called on to present an address to the Queen because of one person who claimed to bear the name of Unitarian, and who had taken a prominent part in the revolutionary movement of this country. It was important that they should separate themselves from all connection with any person or persons who would promote any of the movements which showed disloyalty to the Throne of England. They had every reason to be highly satisfied with the present occupant of the Throne. Queen Victoria and her Court were pure, and her Majesty and her Court were in remarkably favourable contrast with former sovereigns and former royal courts.

The motion was seconded by Mr. J. SMYTH, and adopted.

THE OPIUM TRAFFIC.

On the motion of the Rev. T. M. SCOTT, seconded by the Rev. J. F. KENNARD, a resolution agreeing to petition the Government against the continuance of the opium trade in the East was adopted.

On the motion of the Rev. W. S. SMITH (Antrim), the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—"That the Synod of Munster, the several presbyteries, and the other Free Christian congregations shall have power each to nominate one of the ministers on the roll to fill the presidential chair. The names of only the persons thus nominated to be submitted for election, and all such nominations to be handed in in writing to the Secretary of the Association not later than the first Tuesday of June preceeding the election. The nominations to be circulated with the draft report."

It was resolved, on the motion of Mr. SMYTH, Banbridge, seconded by the Rev. D. THOMPSON—"That presbyteries be instructed to bring the matters contained in the reports on Sunday-schools, missionary work, and temperance before their congregations, and the General Purposes Committee are empowered to send forward reprints of the reports if they consider it practicable."

Resolutions thanking the minister and congregation for their allowing the use of the church to the association, and to the choir for the excellent rendering of music at the opening proceedings and the Conference on Wednesday night, were passed.

The President congratulated the association on having so admirable a secretary as Mr. Gordon was.

The annual meeting concluded with the benediction.

STANNINGTON.—On Tuesday last special meetings were held at Underbank Chapel, in connection with the local Sunday School Union, and a public welcome to the recently settled minister. The proceedings commenced at four o'clock, under the presidency of the Rev. R. Cowley Smith, when a paper was read by Mrs. Eli Fay, on "The Sunday School in Light of a Teacher's Experience." The paper contained some most admirable advice to teachers, and was listened to with marked attention. Warm eulogies were passed upon the completeness and ability displayed by the Revs. W. Blazebly and C. H. Osler among many other speakers, and a cordial vote of thanks was passed by acclamation to Mrs. Fay, to which the Rev. Eli Fay responded. An adjournment having been made for tea, which was provided in the school-room, the proceedings were resumed in the chapel, the evening meeting being presided over by Michael Hunter, Esq., (junr., Mayor of Sheffield), who expressed the pleasure it gave him to preside, not as Mayor of Sheffield, but as the acting trustee of that dear old chapel. The congregation, he said, had unfortunately had many changes lately, but he now trusted it would be the last time he would be called upon to preside at the induction of a minister—he would be glad to feel that the connection made between Mr. Smith and them should last his natural life.—Mr. Jonathan Revitt, in offering a welcome on behalf of the congregation, agreed with the chairman in the hope that they would not again for many years to come be called upon to welcome another minister. The Rev. Wm. Blazebly, B.A., on behalf of the ministers of the district, offered the right hand of fellowship, and alluded to the satisfaction generally felt at the settlement of Mr. Smith. It was, he thought, fortunate for such a congregation as that, requiring a double experience of country and town, that their minister came to them fitted by his past life to officiate as their pastor, and also to assist in any work he might be brought into contact with in the great town of Sheffield. Mr. Councillor Bramley joined in the expression of pleasure indulged in, and was glad of an opportunity as a trustee to join in the welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Smith. Mr. John Armitage, of Sheffield, referred to his previous acquaintance with Mr. Smith when the latter was employed in his office, and bore testimony to his excellent qualities. The Rev. R. Cowley Smith on rising to respond was received with hearty applause; labouring under strong emotion, he expressed his thanks to them. He could not look upon that meeting in any other light than of the most solemn description. He felt the grave responsibility of the charge he had accepted, and though the chairman and other speakers had all expressed themselves in such kindly terms, he was recalled to a sense of his position by the unexpected, but very touching allusion to the past by his friend Mr. Armitage. He could assure them he intended to settle down earnestly among them, he trusted, for years to come, and from what he had seen, the members of the congregation were desirous to help him in any good work. They had gone with him into the open air and assisted him in the proclamation of their glorious but simple religion. He could assure them he was determined, to the best of his ability, to extend the usefulness of their congregational life and carry outside the principles of their faith. The Rev. C. H. Osler gave the induction prayer, after which the charge of the congregation was delivered by the Rev. Eli Fay, who, in the course of an eloquent and impressive address, urged the congregation earnestly to remember that while their minister was expected to perform certain duties, there was implied also a conditional responsibility on their part, the first and most important of which was punctual and regular attendance at the services. He was glad to learn that the congregation were ready to listen to any suggestions of their minister, and if practicable assist him by carrying them out. The spirit of co-operation was necessary for the success of their cause, nor must they think the minister could do everything. The speaker concluded by expressing his good wishes, and earnestly imploring them to become living examples of their religious belief. On the motion of Mr. Jonathan Revitt, seconded by the Rev. R. C. Smith, thanks were given to the Mayor for presiding, and a most successful meeting was brought to a close. On Sunday evening a series of open air services was commenced, the first being held in a picturesque part of the neighbourhood; the subject chosen was "Why I believe in Unitarian Christianity." A number of strangers were present and at the close Mr. Smith was asked to repeat the discourse next Sunday evening in Woodlands-road.

WEST RIDING DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.—The fifteenth annual meeting of this Association was held on Saturday, June 24, at Lydgate, near Huddersfield. In addition to teachers and friends from Leeds, York, Dewsbury, Bradford, Halifax and Wakefield, there were present the Revs. Charles Hargrove, M.A., of Leeds; F. E. Millson, Halifax; Iden Payne, Holbeck; Andrew Chalmers, Wakefield; Benjamin Glover, Lydgate; and C. D. Badland, M.A.; J. S. Mathers, Esq., President; Darnton Lupton, Esq., Hon. Treasurer; the Rev. J. M. Pilkington, Secretary. After partaking of tea in the schoolroom the company adjourned to the chapel, where a public meeting was held, the President, J. S. Mathers, Esq., in the chair. The Committee reported that much good work had been quietly done in connection with the affiliated schools, though during the year some had been placed in very trying circumstances, more especially the school at Morton, which had lost an earnest worker by the death of the minister, the Rev. J. Wilson. There was a marked improvement in the examination papers sent in this year.—Darnton Lupton, Esq., the Hon. Treasurer, read his financial statement, which showed that more regularity was wanted in transmitting the amounts owing by the various schools for Teacher's Notes.—The Chairman said he considered the time had arrived when we should more closely examine our work as Sunday-school teachers than we had done in the past, so as to ascertain whether we were doing all that could or ought to be done. He said that unless we were really in earnest about our work it would certainly languish. He felt that our young people must be drawn to our schools by the bonds of affection rather than compelled to attend. The teachers, too, must endeavour to impart to the children the actual belief which they as Unitarians hold (not in a dogmatic spirit, but with loving earnestness), for if this were not done, others outside our ranks would cultivate the soil we had neglected, and the young people would either drift away from us, or, if remaining, would be unable to give a ready answer to those doctrinal questions which were sure to be put to them at one time or another. Mr. Mathers further said that seeing we were social beings it was necessary that the natural instincts of the young people should be carefully watched, so that when leading them in an unhealthy direction they might be guided by the teachers into their proper channel.—The Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., said he saw evidences of the commencement of a new epoch for their society since the stirring words of their President had shown them the necessity for improvement. Self-satisfaction too largely developed was always detrimental to improvement. In reference to the examination this year, as one of the examiners he was glad to bear testimony to the improvement in the papers sent in to him, and no doubt the other examiners could say the same.—The appointment of officers for the ensuing year was made, and it was decided that the next annual meeting be held at Dewsbury.—The Rev. Andrew Chalmers, of Wakefield, moved: "That a cordial welcome be given to Mr. John Reynolds, the representative of the Manchester District Sunday School Association, also to Mr. Flint, of Sheffield, who represented the North Midland Association."—Mr. John Reynolds, in acknowledging the kind reception given to the representatives, said he always felt such meetings to be a great encouragement to us as labourers in a common cause to work unitedly with hand and heart.—Mr. Flint said he came rather as a learner, so that he might take some information back with him. He might, however, just mention that their Association were contemplating the adoption of a Liturgical Service for the use of the schools, and would be glad of the co-operation of other Associations in the matter. He begged to thank them for their kind reception.—Darnton Lupton, Esq., moved: "That an Examination Committee be added to the General Committee," which was agreed to.—The Chairman called on the Rev. F. E. Millson to read his paper on "The Guild System, Adopted in many Church of England Schools, Worth Considering by our Schools." The July part of Teachers' Notes contains several of Mr. Millson's arguments, which are well worth the attention of both teachers and scholars. Mr. Millson's paper was listened to with great attention, and at the close a hearty vote of thanks was passed to him for his suggestive and interesting paper. A vote of thanks to the ladies for providing the tea having been passed the meeting terminated.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—On Sunday, June 25, the Annual Sunday-school Flower Services were held in the Church of the Divine Unity, and proved in every way a greater success than ever before. The church was very beautifully decorated with choice greenhouse plants, ferns and cut flowers, the whole of the communion space being occupied with a very tasteful arrangement thereof. The children were placed in the galleries behind and on each side of the pulpit, and sang a well-prepared selection of hymns of a suitable character, to the great pleasure and gratification of the very large congregations which assembled for the worship. The preacher on the occasion was the Rev. Alfred Payne (Pastor of the Church), who spoke in the morning on "Jacob's prayer for the sons of Joseph," and in the evening on "The Lessons of the Flowers." On Wednesday, June 28, on the occasion of the North of England Temperance Demonstration, a Free Tea (with entertainments) was given to between 1,000 and 1,100 of the newspaper children and street Arabs of Newcastle by the following members of the Church of the Divine Unity: Mrs. Clark, Councillors Barker-Ellis and Joseph Ellis, and Messrs. Faber, Laidler and Tom Southern. This large undertaking had required considerable preparation, which had been conducted by the Pastor, a committee of ladies and gentlemen belonging to the church, and about fifty of the young people of both sexes, who acted as "helpers." The result was satisfactory in every point. At one o'clock the children assembled in the Corn Market, where they were marshalled four abreast, and a medal was hung round the neck of each, bearing an inscription and the names of the donors; thence, preceded by the band of the "Abbot Memorial [Schools]" and a banner prepared specially for the occasion by Mr. Laidler, the whole company went in procession to the Town Moor, where an enclosure, intended for a new public park, had been kindly lent by the Mayor and Corporation of the Town, in which had been erected two large marquees. Assembled in one of these the children were addressed by Rev. Alfred Payne, and Mrs. Joseph Ellis, and were presented with a bun and orange cake. Various games of competition were then indulged in, for which about 500 prizes had been provided, which continued till tea time, when each child received a pint of tea and an eight ounce cake. After these had been consumed, the games were continued till seven o'clock, when a final distribution of buns took place and the children were dismissed. The day was exceedingly fine, and the event will be doubtless long remembered by the poor children, whose thin faces and eager eyes told plainly of the hard lot to which they are subject, but whose happy smiles and mirthful doings showed that for that day at least a ray of sunshine had fallen upon their dreary lives.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Weakening weather.—The sultry summer days strain the nerves of the feeble and decrepit, and disease may eventuate unless some restorative, such as these purifying Pills, be found to correct the disordering tendency. Holloway's medicine gives potency to the nervous system, which is the source of all vital movements, and presides over every action which maintains the growth and well-being of the body. No one can over-estimate the necessity of keeping the nerves well strung, or the ease with which these Pills accomplish that end. They are the most unfailing antidotes to indigestion, irregular circulation, palpitation, sick headache, and costiveness, and have therefore attained the largest sale and highest reputation.

The Liberal Pulpit.

CONFIRMATION ADDRESS.

At the confirmation service held at Kidderminster on Sunday, the 25th ult., the following address was delivered by the Rev. Dr. Sadler, following his sermon from John viii. 20 on "Test Hours":—

My young friends, who are about to be confirmed, it seemed to me that in no better way could I exemplify the nature and importance of the step you are taking than by directing your thoughts to those test hours, which will surely come to you all, and which will show what your life has been—what your preparation, what your endeavours. Not from a sudden impulse, but after serious thought with the counsel and instruction of your minister you are, in this service of consecration, about to make a beginning which, I need hardly say to you, has my heartfelt sympathy.

For reasons, into which I need not enter, I have latterly confined my ministrations almost entirely to my own congregation, but my warm interest in this service has led me to break through my rule on the present occasion. It seems to me a most desirable thing that when our young people are opening into manhood and womanhood they should be led to consider more than they usually do what should be their great aim in life, and by what means they may hope to attain it. This is a matter in which I think they should not leave themselves or be left to drift whithersoever they may. And by this service you express your conviction that by allegiance to Christ you will, with the Divine blessing, be best enabled to live the life of a true child of God, and not be found wanting when your hour shall come.

The apostolic practice of baptism was doubtless symbolic of the desire to offer a pure soul to the influence of the Father of our spirits. The observance, confined at first to those who were old enough to make a profession of their own, became after a time divided into two. The heads of Christian homes wished for a service in which, as each fresh spirit was given them to nurture for immortality, they might express their thankfulness for so precious a charge, and seek the consecrating touch of special prayer in the fulfilment of their parental duties. And when the child reached an age at which he could feel his own responsibility, he confirmed for himself the desire which his father and mother had testified in so solemn a manner in regard to him when he was too young to understand what they were doing.

It is, then, my young friends, to this service of confirmation that I rejoice to welcome you to-day.

But in addition to what has been said of your discipleship to him, who is the Revealer of the Christian faith and our pattern from the heavens, you may reasonably expect that I should say something as to the aids by which, to borrow the words of Chrysostom, there may be in you "a due proportion between the interior source of virtue and the external practice of it."

That you may be inwardly renewed from day to day, you will require suitable opportunities—seasons of quiet. They need not be long, but you cannot dispense with them. However busy you may be in your worldly occupation, however much there may be going on around you, let nothing prevent your being sometimes for a little while and at not unfrequent intervals apart alone, with a view to feeding your spirits.

A chief object of such seasons is communion with the Infinite Fountain of light and life to whom the Master leads us as his Father and our Father. You will seek God that you may have more of his spirit. You will let your wants and your cares, your weaknesses and your faults, your past and your future, your whole life, your inmost thoughts and feelings, your joys and sorrows, your hopes and fears and aspirations lie for a little while each day in the light of his countenance. This is prayer. Like little children go to your heavenly Father and commit yourselves into his hands, and ask him to teach you his will, and to help you in doing it.

Another object of these quiet seasons will be to become acquainted with the best that has been said or written to guide and strengthen you, and especially in that richest book of spiritual wisdom and devoutness, which for what it has done for mankind is well entitled "The Bible," The Book. You will, further, seek the companionship of those who for their deeds and character, and for the virtue that comes out of them, may worthily be enrolled in your "Calendar of Saints." In the contemplation of embodied goodness and piety, the affections are called forth, the spirit is touched, and the beauty of holiness is realised as they cannot be by any mere precepts.

And, I would say, hang not loosely to your church, but be living members of it, taking real part in it. Be in your places on the Sunday with those with whom you may keep holy-day, that while having the divine side of life brought before you in prayer and sermon, you may have with others the support and kindling joy of sympathy and fellowship. Cherish all your better moments, whether they come to you by such means as I have pointed out, or in ways less under your own control; do not regard the high hopes and aspirations which come to you in such moments as beautiful dreams, they really represent your true self, they are a heavenly vision of what God intended you to be. I have spoken of these things as necessary to us to keep our aims pure and lofty, and for the worth we shall find in them when our hour comes, but if we enter into them in a right spirit they will be attractive to us for their own sake, for what can be so delightful as converse with higher beings, to breathe the atmosphere which they breathe, and to look forth from their glorious and inspiring point of view!

On the other hand, however, be not discouraged if there should be times when your devotional feelings seem to lose their sweetness and their force, and the life within you seems to be without any elasticity. It was, if I recollect aright, Thomas à Kempis who said that he never knew any man so holy and devout as not to have had experience of such times. Meanwhile go on steadily with your duties, be particularly on your guard that you fail not in any good work, and wait patiently till the fresh gales of the spirit blow on you again, as they surely will.

And this leads me to the only other point on which I have a few words to offer. I have no faith in any efforts for improvement which do not improve the welfare of others, and the ability to be of service to them. It is one of the characteristic teachings of the Master, that the greatest in the kingdom of heaven are those which are most devoted to the service of others. To live, for mere self-culture, though it be of an elevated kind, is not to live in accordance with the religion of love to God, and love to man. Of nothing am I more certain than that no life can be satisfactory or healthy the central spring of which is in self. Think, my young friends, not only how you may yourselves become better, but also what you can do for others, and begin to do something at once according to your ability.

And now "I commend you to God, and to the word of his grace, which is able to build you up, and to give you an inheritance among all them that are sanctified." Amen.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON.—On Saturday last the following awards were signified as the decision of the several Examiners for the Session of 1882. Andrews Entrance Prizes of £20 each.—English and other languages: H. R. Norris, London. Science: Charles Platts, London. Andrews Prizes, First Year's Students.—£30, Charles Platts, London; £30, H. R. Norris, London; £20, F. W. Oliver, of Kew. Jews' Commemoration Scholarship, £15 per annum for two years, Charles Platts, London. It will thus be seen that two young students took first and second prizes in all the above, but in addition to this Mr. Charles Platts is awarded first prize in Latin, and divides the second honours in Greek. The competition between him and Mr. H. R. Norris, who was formerly a pupil of University College School, was exceedingly keen. The Rothschild Exhibition in Mathematics of £60 was awarded to C. M. Jessop, of Cheshunt. The Tuffnell Scholarship, General Chemistry, £100 per annum for two years.—W. P. May, of Blackheath. Gilchrist Scholarship, £80. C. H. Lawson, formerly a pupil of University College School, Ricardo Scholarship in Political Economy, £20 per annum for three years.—D. S. MacColl, London. Slade Fine Art Scholarship, £50 per annum for three years: Sara C. Harrison, London—Harrington Manor, London.—These were the principal money prizes awarded, but it was a noticeable fact that whenever lady competitors appeared they took rather more than their share of the prizes. In the examination on Philosophy of Mind and Logic, before Professor G. Croome Robertson, M.A. (Dean of Science), Mary L. G. Petrie, London, took first prize, and the second was divided equally between Edith M. Thompson, Edith B. Williams, of London, and P. Mukerji, of Dacca; whilst four other ladies were highly commended. The ladies were also first and second in composition examinations.

DEAN CLOSE died on Sunday, in his eighty-fifth year. The Dean, who was well known through his strong ecclesiastical opinions, resigned the Deanery of Carlisle about a year ago, and retired to Malvern, whence he went to Penzance.

Our Calendar.

SUNDAY, JULY 9.

LONDON.

Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, at Little Portland-street Chapel, at 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M.
Rev. CHAS. VOYSEY, at Langham-hall, 43, Great Portland-street, 11.15 A.M.
Rev. A. P. PEABODY, at the Free Christian Church, Clarence-road, Kentish-town, in the Morning. The Rev. P. W. CLAYDEN in the Evening.

 Notices of Sunday Services are inserted in this Calendar at 6d. a line, and of other Meetings and Service gratis, provided a detailed Advertisement appears.

SELECTED BOOKS.

Adams's (C. K.) Manual of Historical Literature, 12/6
Dickens's (C.) Plays and Poems, with a few Miscellanies in Prose now first Collected, edited, &c., by R. H. Shepherd, 2 vols. 21/
Kuenen's (A.) National Religions and Universal Religions, 10/6
Leech's (T.) Life's Pathway, and other Poems, 4/6
Longfellow (H. W.), Home Life of, by Blanche R. Tucker Macchetta, 7/6
Saint (A.) among Saints, a Sketch of the Life of St. Emmelia, by S. M.S., 3/6
Shelley's (P. B.) Poetical Works, edited by H. B. Forman, 2 vols. 16/
Swinburne's (A. C.) Tristram of Lyonesse, and other Poems, 9/

MR. WALTER MAWER, Sunday School Association Office, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C., will supply any of the above-named new books and new editions, at the prices named, carriage free, on receipt of Post-office Order, payable at the East Strand Post-office.

MARRIAGES.

BROCKLEHURST—WEBB—On the 29th ult., at Upton Church, Berks, by the Rev. Canon Cornish, Rector, and brother of the bride, assisted by the Rev. R. B. Somerset, of Cambridge, Charles Brocklehurst, of the Fence, Macclesfield, to Frances Catherine, widow of John Webb, of Castletown, Loehe, Ireland.

MITCHELL—FROANE—On the 6th inst., at Portland-street Church, Southport, by the Rev. T. Holland, B.A., William Mitchell, Carlton Hill, St. John's Wood, London, to Jessie, third daughter of W. Froane, Beach House, Birkdale, Southport.

VERSCHOYLE—WILLIAMS—On the 6th inst., at St. John's Church, Hampstead, by the Rev. Prebendary Richard Verschoyle, Rector of Derryvallen, Co. Fermanagh (father of the bridegroom), assisted by the Rev. Sherrard Beaumont Burnaby, Rector of the parish, John Hamilton Verschoyle, 2nd Batt. Duke of Cornwall's Lt. Infantry, to Florence Lyla, only daughter of Thomas Williams, Esq., Yarth House, Hampstead.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE XIXTH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY,
ADELAIDE-PLACE, LONDON-BRIDGE, E.C.
SHARES £10, Payable in one Sum or by Periodical Payments.

Directors—Henry Waldemar Lawrence, Mark H. Judge, F. H. A. Hardcastle, Eliza Orme, George Palmer, M.P., Mary E. Richardson, and Henry Rutt.

This Society affords the means of investing money in large or small sums with complete safety at good interest. Interest on Shares 5 per cent. per annum, paid half-yearly. Deposits received at 4 per cent. Withdrawals up to £10 at three days' notice. Prospectus free of FREDERICK LONG, Manager and Secretary.

FOR SALE, at a moderate price, the last eight volumes (unbound, but clean) of the INQUIRER.—W. MAWER, INQUIRER Office.

WANTED, a LADY as HOUSEKEEPER and COMPANION to Two Ladies. Address, by letter, to Miss Hall, Beechwood, Bowdon.

Quarterly, Price 2s. 6d.

THE MODERN REVIEW.

CONTENTS FOR JULY.

The Book of Wisdom. By REGINALD LANE POOLE, M.A., Ph.D.
 Tennyson's "Despair." By CHARLES SHAKESPEARE, M.A.
 The Religious Situation in France. By ERNEST FONTANES.
 Charles Darwin: his Life and Work. By Dr. W. B. CARPENTER, F.R.S.
 Wordsworth's Two Styles. By R. H. HUTTON, M.A.

Elizabeth Stuart, Queen of Bohemia. II. By H. SCHUTZ WILSON.
 Justin and the Fourth Gospel. I. By Dr. EDWIN A. ABBOTT.
 The Temple of Sorrow. A Poem. By the Hon. RODEN NOEL.
 Notes and Discussions. By T. TYLER, M.A., and C. C. COE, F.R.G.S.
 Notices of Books.

Published for the Proprietors by

JAMES CLARKE AND CO., 13 AND 14, FLEET-STREET, LONDON.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

WORK OF UNITARIANS IN THE PAST AND THE FUTURE. The Sermon Preached at the Annual Meeting, May 31, in Unity Church, Islington, by the Rev. Dr. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE. Price One Penny. Fifty copies will be sent, carriage free, for 3s.; one hundred for 5s. A large edition having been printed with a view to the widest possible circulation.

SERMONS, by ROBERT COLLYER. Cheap Issue. Price 2s.

POSITIVE ASPECTS OF UNITARIAN THOUGHT AND DOCTRINE. Cheap Edition, 1s.

TEXTS AND MARGINS of the REVISED NEW TESTAMENT. By Dr. G. VANCE SMITH, 1s.

A Cheap Edition of this work is now issued, price 3d.

Address, Miss C. PHILPOT, Bookroom, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London.

Just published, 8vo., price 10s. 6d., cloth,

PROFESSOR KUENEN'S HIBBERT LECTURES, 1882, on NATIONAL RELIGIONS AND UNIVERSAL RELIGIONS. Delivered in Oxford and London, in April and May, 1882. By A. KUENEN, LL.D., D.D., Professor of Theology at Leyden.

PROFESSOR KUENEN'S GREAT WORK.

THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL TO THE FALL OF THE JEWISH STATE. By Dr. A. KUENEN, Professor of Theology at the University, Leyden. Translated from the Dutch by A. H. MAY.

3 vols., 8vo., cloth, price 31s. 6d.

The previous Hibbert Lectures—

1881.—T. W. RHYS DAVIDS. On the Origin and Growth of Religion, as illustrated by some points in the History of Indian Buddhism.

1880.—M. ERNEST RENAN. On the Influence of the Institutions, Thought and Culture of Rome on Christianity, and the Development of the Catholic Church. Translated into English by the Rev. CHARLES BEARD, of Liverpool.

1879.—P. LE PAGE RENOUF. Lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion, as illustrated by the Religion of Ancient Egypt.

1878.—Professor MAX MÜLLER's Lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion, as illustrated by the Religions of India.

May be had at 10s. 6d. each volume.

WILLIAMS and NORGATE, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London; and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

Just published, 8vo., cloth, 10s. 6d.

A SHORT PROTESTANT COMMENTARY on the Books of the NEW TESTAMENT: with general and special Introductions. Edited by Professors P. W. SCHMIDT and F. VON HOLZENDORFF. Translated from the Third German Edition, by the Rev. F. H. JONES, B.A. (in 2 vols.). Vol. I., Matthew to Acts.

Vol. II. will be published in the Autumn.

Subscribers to the THEOLOGICAL TRANSLATION FUND LIBRARY receive this Volume for 7s. Prospectus with Contents of the Series post free on application.

WILLIAMS and NORGATE, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London; and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

Fourth Edition, 487 pp. 8vo. cloth, price 7s. 6d.

SAMUEL SHARPE'S HISTORY OF THE HEBREW NATION and its LITERATURE. With an Appendix on the Hebrew Chronology. By SAMUEL SHARPE, Author of the "History of Egypt."

WILLIAMS and NORGATE, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London; and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK.—Current Accounts opened according to the usual practice of other Banks, and Interest allowed on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £25. No commission charged for keeping Accounts.

The Bank also receives money on Deposit at Three per cent. Interest, repayable on demand.

The Bank undertakes, for its Customers, free of charge, the custody of Deeds, Writings, and other Securities and Valuables; the collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the purchase and sale of Stocks and Shares.

Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued.

A Pamphlet, with full particulars, on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane.

THE BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY'S ANNUAL RECEIPTS EXCEED FOUR MILLIONS.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH, with Immediate Possession, and no Rent to pay. Apply at the Office of the BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH, with Immediate Possession, either for Building or Gardening purposes. Apply at the Office of the BIRKBECK FREE HOLD LAND SOCIETY.

A Pamphlet, with full particulars, on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane.

DIXON'S IRON CHAPELS, SCHOOLS, &c.

ARE tasteful in Design, Economical, Durable, made of the Best Materials, and erected in the most careful manner. Can be taken down, removed, and re-erected at small cost.

Careful comparison of Specifications, Structural and Architectural details, Materials and Workmanship are invited before placing orders. IRON CHURCHES, &c., usually on hand or in progress at the Works.

IRON BUILDINGS for all purposes and all Climates. Catalogues, Designs, Estimates, and all information on application.

ISAAC DIXON, Windsor Iron Works, Liverpool.

SEASONABLE DELICACY.

BROWN & POLSON'S CORN FLOUR

As Blanc-Mange, Custard, Baked Pudding, &c.

WITH

STEWED FRUIT

OF ANY KIND.

AVONDALE - ROAD CHAPEL

PECKHAM, LONDON.

Minister—Rev. GEORGE CARTER.

Subscriptions to Building Fund.	Amount acknowledged March 18 ...	£1538 0 0
A. Z. (2nd sub.) ...	3 0 0
Mr. John T. Brunner, Northwich ...	5 0 0
Mr. Alfred J. Waterlow, Reigate ...	5 0 0
Miss Elizabeth Reid, Hampstead ...	1 1 0
Prof. H. Morley, University College ...	1 1 0
Mr. F. H. Stevenson ...	10 10 0
Mr. F. W. Schreiber (2nd sub.) ...	1 1 0
Rev. W. M. Ainsworth (2nd sub.) ...	3 3 0
Mr. John C. Glover ...	0 10 0
C. J. ...	0 5 0

Further subscriptions are earnestly requested, and will be acknowledged in the Inquirer.

HAHNEMANN EPPS, Treasurer,
9, Eliot Bank, Sydenham-hill, S.E.

FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, CLARENCE-ROAD, KENTISH-TOWN.

Anniversary Services will be held in the above Church on Sunday Next, July 9. The Rev. A. P. PEABODY, D.D., LL.D., Plummer Professor of Christian Morals and Preacher to Harvard University, Massachusetts, will Preach in the Morning. The Rev. P. W. CLAYDEN in the Evening.

Collections in aid of the Funds of the Church at both services.

HEATH BROW SCHOOL FOR YOUNG BOYS AND GIRLS.

Principal, Mrs. CASE.

Teachers for the Session, 1882-83:—The Misses CASE and Miss E. F. SQUIRE, J. G. FRANK, B.A., Lond. (Classics and English); JOHN BRIDGE, M.A., Lond. (Mathematics); Mr. ARCH. BALANTYNE (History and Literature); Mr. JOHN GUPPY (Chemistry); Mr. W. H. FRISK (Drawing); Miss C. SQUIRE, R.A.M. (Music); Mr. WINTERBOTTOM (Gymnastics); and Miss MARY BIRCH (Dancing).

The NEXT TERM begins SEPTEMBER 20.

Heath Brow, Hampstead, London.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Mrs. H. HOOD will be pleased to receive a few GIRLS to board and educate. Special arrangements made for delicate girls during the winter months.—Address, care of the Rev. ALFRED HOOD, Bournemouth.

HIGH SCHOOL, STOKE GREEN, NEAR COVENTRY, established (1865) by the Rev. G. HEAVISIDE, B.A., of University and Manchester New Colleges, London, promotes a Liberal Education at a moderate cost.

BRENTWOOD, WORSLEY, near MANCHESTER.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal ... MRS. F. SHAWCROSS,

late of Brook House, Knutsford.

The NEXT TERM begins MONDAY, May 8.

For prospectus, apply to the Principal.

"THE FORT, MARGATE."—APARTMENTS in a well-furnished house, facing the sea, on moderate terms. Address, Mrs. Stabback, Lansdowne Lodge, the Fort Margate.

BRIGHTON.—Apartments, with or without Board, at Miss Wood's, 12, Lower Rock Gardens. Three minutes from Madeira-walk and the Chain Pier.

LAW.—To article CLERKS intending to spend their last year in London. A Graduate of London, B.A., LL.B., admitted in 1864, will be glad to receive a gentleman for the last year or whole time of his articles. Personal assistance, if desired, for the Final Pass or Honours' Examination. Facilities can also be given for acquiring a good knowledge of short hand and English composition.—Address, K. Y. Z., care of W. Mawer, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C.

SWITZERLAND.—A Gentleman, who has made eight walking tours in Switzerland, would be willing to take charge of two young gentlemen whose parents may desire to give them such a holiday under careful and experienced guidance.—For particulars, address before Aug. 1, Rev. S. Farrington, 7, Acomb-street, Manchester.

LONDON.—WEST-CENTRAL TEMPERANCE HOTEL, 97, 99, 101, Southampton-row, Russell-square.—Patronised and highly commended by the Rev. D. S. Govett, M.A., English Chaplain, Gibraltar; Rev. H. M. Holden, M.A., St. Bartholomew's, Bradford, Yorkshire; Rev. Canon French, M.A., Killaloe, Ireland, &c. Central, quiet, exceptionally clean, moderate in charges. Visitors' Drawing Room. Breakfast or Tea, 1s. 3d. Beds from 1s. 6d. Printed Tariff Card on application.

FREDERIC SMITH, Proprietor.

Printed by WOODFALL and KINDER, of Millford-lane, Strand W.C.; and Published for the Proprietors by WALTER MAWER, at the Offices of the SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London, W.C.—Saturday, July 8, 1882

The Inquirer.

A Religious, Political, & Literary Newspaper, & Record of Reberent Free Thought.

[REGISTERED AT THE GENERAL POST-OFFICE AS A NEWSPAPER.]

No. 2090.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 15, 1882.

[PRICE 5D.]

CONTENTS.

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:—
Religion and Recreation	453
Law Physical and Moral	453
The Latest American Heretic	455
The Science of Ethics	455
OPEN COUNCIL:—
Creeds—their Uses and Abuses	457
OCCASIONAL NOTES
457
REVIEWS:—
The Doctrine of the Cross	459
A New Commentary on the Gospel accord- ing to Matthew	459
"The Modern Review"	459
The "Nineteenth Century"	460
The "Contemporary Review"	460
Short Notices	461
The Magazines	461
Literary Notes	461
OUR CONTEMPORARIES
462
CORRESPONDENCE:—
The Theologischer Jahrsbericht	463
Agnosticism	463
Sophia and Sophrosyne	464
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE:—
Presbytery of Munster	465

RELIGION AND RECREATION.

THE method of the Salvation Army is to present what its leaders consider religion in the exciting and amusing way which we described in a former article. The plan is based upon two suppositions, each of which is separately true. The classes the Salvationists desire to act upon want, in the sense of being deficient in, both religion and amusement. But because two things are lacking, it does not follow that the best mode of supplying them is in the state of mixture. No one who appreciates the spiritual character of the higher forms of religion could consent to administer such a compound of coarse mythology and secular jollification as the Salvationists prepare. The unfortunate people who are in a very low condition of intellectual and moral development cannot, we may admit, be attracted by any proceedings that are not powerfully exciting, and past attempts to rouse the masses by theological revivals have been associated with doctrines and practices that could neither be sanctioned by intelligence nor tolerated by good taste. Strong excitement is necessary to move multitudes, and the history of religions shows that while there are times in which amusement is altogether discarded there are others in which it is in vigorous demand. Great struggles of world-wide significance like that of LUTHER, or of the Puritans, which are full of danger, summon forth a stern feeling that will tolerate no recreation; whoso feels merry can then express his emotion by singing psalms, but in quieter times religious festivals bear the character of secular rejoicings. It was so with the old Greeks and Romans, and is still so with the Roman and with the Eastern Church. In the Middle Ages there were no scruples against amusing the masses by proceedings which the Papal authorities would not now tolerate, although they still go beyond the line Protestants draw. The spirit of the old practice in the "Ages of Faith" is well-displayed in the specimens of miracle play and preaching LONG-FELLOW has introduced in his "Golden Legend." They show the religion of the time mixed up with humour and coarse fun, which the Salvation Army would shrink from imitating. Later on the famous Autos Sacramentales of CALDERON presented the theology of the Romish Church in dramas of so high a poetical merit that their popularity can only be accounted for by crediting the Spaniards of the seventeenth century with no small amount of literary culture. The association of intellectual recreation with religious teaching reached its culmination in these plays. Protestantism has never attempted to interest the people in its theology by such a combination of plot, character and poetry, though a few oratorios are dramatic in parts. Taking the word amusement to mean something lower than recreation, it is quite impossible for any one impressed with the deeper thoughts of feelings of religion to attempt to make it amusing for the sake of attracting converts, but judicious selections of oratorio music performed gratuitously appear from recent experiments to be more readily appreciated by the uncultivated than most folks supposed. There is also no sound reason why the oratorio should not become more dramatic, and the chief incidents of what is called sacred history can be made generally interesting, and therefore recreative, if presented as properly belonging to human history, and not as standing apart and requiring to be treated in a dull way. But on the side of the Salvationists it is said that masses of people will accept religion as they present it, or not at all. If this be so, there comes the question of whether the effort to raise them should not first consist in preparing them for religious instruction, rather than in offering them the Evangelical theology spiced with the amusement condiment. The rich folks who contribute their thousands for this religion made jolly act upon the notion that the eternal weal or woe depends upon the acceptance of the scheme of salvation, and if this were true, no kind of instruction or cultivation could compare in importance with teaching it, and the saving dogma should be compounded to suit all tastes and degrees of barbarism. The rich men who do not share these opinions seldom give their money for wiser experiments. If a neighbourhood plainly lacks innocent amusement, and on that account mischievous kinds are resorted to, why not try to supply the need? The temperance music-hall experiment is good in its way, but it is not exciting enough. Why not try cheap theatres with good plays, beginning and ending at hours convenient for the working class? Of course such a plan must be carried on at a considerable expenditure, with no prospect of money return. In that respect it would be like the "Salvation Army" proceedings. The working classes of the higher grade would thoroughly enjoy good plays at small prices; the rougher sort would applaud those which made stirring incidents contribute to a good moral catastrophe. It is only the fashionable world that wants its jaded appetite tickled with theatrical suggestions of vice.

Enlightened Protestants might, without compromise of principle or offence to taste, make some of their services more lively and recreative. Many topics ancillary to religion, but not specially theological, would not dishonour any church or chapel, and hymns need not always be confined to dogma in rhyme, or direct expressions of worship. Moral aspiration rhythmically expressed is not discordant with any reasonable theology, and the recent practice of rejecting flowing melody for stiff tunes might be advantageously discarded. Let the thirst for amusement be gratified by things that can properly be made amusing, and, while placing religion upon much higher ground, let numerous points of contact with topics that admit of recreative treatment, in the sense in which we use the term, not be lost sight of.

There is much to be learnt from the Salvation Army and its success. It calls strong attention to wants and needs that will be met somehow, and though an orgy of degraded theology is better than a drunken revel, the two things should not be regarded as necessary alternatives. It would be absurd to expect the cultured and the uncultured, refined natures and coarse ones to think and feel alike upon religion, or upon any other matter; but we cannot conceive it to be other than a grave error when religion is lowered to suit the meanest capacity, instead of being held aloft as the highest to which man aspires.

LAW PHYSICAL AND MORAL.

THE Bishop of CARLISLE contributes an article to the current number of the Contemporary on this subject, or rather under this heading, for he concerns himself much more with the distinction between what he terms objective and subjective law than with a discussion of law in its physical and moral aspects. Those who know anything of Dr. GOODWIN'S philosophical power will hardly need to be told that the article is a very able one, being candid in tone and comprehensive and subtle in thought. No one, indeed, capable of appreciating and entering into the spirit of such an argument can do other than conclude that the article will be of great service as a set-off against many of the shallow utterances which are quite the order of the day among would be thinkers and philosophers of the modern school. Even though the reader may gain no new views of truth he will hardly fail to be strengthened and exhilarated in spirit by the masterly power displayed in this essay.

The Bishop begins with a quotation from the Duke of ARGYLL'S "Reign of Law," to the effect that words which should be the servants of thought are too often its masters, and that there are very few words which are used more ambiguously and therefore more injuriously than the word "law." He then proceeds to state the five different senses in which, according to the author in question, the word law is used, the first and the only one that enters largely into the discussion being—"Law as applied simply to an observed Order of facts." With this he contrasts the conception of law to which HOOKER gives expression in the following passage, which occurs at the beginning of his great work on Ecclesiastical Polity: "All things that are have some operation not violent or casual. Neither doth anything ever begin to exercise the same without some pre-conceived end for which it worketh. And the end which it worketh for is not obtained unless the work be also fit to obtain it by. For unto every end every operation will not serve. That which doth assign unto each thing the kind, that which doth appoint the form and measure of working the same we call a law." Now it will be readily seen, as our author remarks, that the conception of law which presented itself to HOOKER was not so much the order of sequence in any series of events as that which causes the order—"That which doth appoint the form and measure of working," it having been already assumed that all things possess some such relation as that expressed by the word law when it stands for an observed order of facts. Taking into consideration these opposite senses of the word the Bishop tells his readers that "the man who observes the order, and the man who discovers the cause of the order may equally claim the discovery of a law, and the two only need a definition of the term used to prevent them from quarrelling over their spoils." In illustration of the possibility of misunderstanding here he refers to the well-known quarrel between NEWTON and FLAMSTEED. The latter had made a series of observations on the moon, which the former wished to borrow to confirm his theory of that body. FLAMSTEED taking, we are told, the word "theory" to stand for an "observed order of facts," instead of as the "cause which appointed the form and measure of its working," the sense in which NEWTON used it, grudged the use of his observations, and declared them worthless for the purpose in question, which led to the difference between the two philosophers.

To avoid the possibility of mistakes of a similar kind at the present day the Bishop suggests the desirability of distinguishing between objective and subjective law. This distinction, he says, would be analogous to that which is recognised between Plane and Physical Astronomy or between Geometrical and Physical Optics. "In the one case we are concerned with orders of facts, in the other with that which lies beneath such orders." These subjective laws "may be indefinitely numerous, one law depending upon that immediately below it and upon another still lower, and so on, indefinitely like geological strata." A rather rough illustration of this truth is drawn from a supposed similarity of design elevation and the like in the houses of a town or district which may be considered as traceable first to the builder's contract, then to the instructions of the architect, and lastly to the will of the owner of the land upon which the whole is built. The Bishop tells us, however, that there are two distinct orders of facts with which science makes us familiar; the mathematical and the physical. The former, unlike the facts of observed science, rest upon no subjective laws, but are complete in themselves. Thus all the relations of space and number are objective laws and nothing else. In the law of right-angled triangles for instance, or in the fact that the difference between the squares of two numbers is divisible by either their sum or their difference, we come "to axiom not volition, to what must be true and cannot be otherwise, not to something which is because a will has ordained that so it shall be." Hence, whenever a law can be reduced to an axiom we get rid of volition, we remain in the sphere of necessity which is always the case in space and number, where there is no volitional or free activity. When physical laws, however, are brought under our notice we find ourselves in a new region. Here after an objective law has presented itself and been accepted as established, the mind seeks the subjective law upon which the former depends.

The fundamental difference between these two conceptions is well illustrated by a reference to KEPLER'S three laws, which, though not accurately true in or with the actual constitution of the solar system, "would be accurately true if a single planet, regarded as a particle, moved round the sun, regarded as fixed." These laws, which are probably familiar to our readers, were to KEPLER himself, says our author, simply objective, and, so far as he was concerned, might have remained so. It was in the hands of NEWTON they ceased to be objective, and that the subjective causes beneath them revealed themselves. KEPLER never even proposed to himself the problem which NEWTON propounded and solved; he was satisfied with the discovery of facts. All three laws, continues the Bishop, involve the condition of a central force, but the second differs from the first and third in this respect, that it involves this condition and nothing more—the law according to which the force works in describing areas proportional to the time required to describe them, admitting of either attraction or repulsion of action either regularly, discontinuously, or by jerks. Laws one and three, on the other hand, which refer to the elliptical orbits of the planets, and the fact that the squares of the periodic times of revolution are proportional to the cubes of the mean distances, also involve a central force, but one of a particular kind—it must be attraction, and must vary inversely as the square of the distance of the planet from the sun's centre. Thus KEPLER'S three laws are merely the expression of an "observed order of facts" which rest upon three subjective laws which NEWTON discovered: that the sun acts upon the planets, having for its direction a line joining each planet with the sun's centre; that this force is attraction; and that the intensity of the force varies inversely as the square of the distance. A further generalisation has shown, we are rightly told, that an attractive force of the kind is inherent in every part of the material universe, that the attraction is not solar, but universal gravitation—"a law which appears to belong to matter as matter in every form and under all conditions."

When, however, this ultimate physical conception is reached it is natural to ask: "Can we push our law further still? What is the meaning of those laws being inherent in matter? Do the laws express something which like the laws of space and number could not have been otherwise? Do they carry us to the expression of a Supreme Will?

Our author's answer is, that if future investigation should even show that these astronomical laws are of a necessary order like those of mathematics, we shall still have the force itself. "The laws according to which it acts may be proved to be necessary laws, that is to say, if there is to be force at all, it is conceivable that it must be such a force as that which exists. But need force exist? Does the existence of matter imply the existence of force among its particles? If so, we have pushed back force to the existence of matter; but is that existence necessary? If so, it must be necessary, in consequence of the existence of some other law, the nature of which it puzzles the mind even to imagine." It will be seen that the Bishop is not an idealist, that he does not regard matter with JOHN STUART MILL merely as "a permanent possibility of sensation," and that he does not accept the doctrine promulgated by BOSCOVICH, and at least partially adopted by FARADAY, that matter is resolvable into centres of force. Anyhow, we cordially agree with him that "the result is to point to a Supreme Will as the mainspring of all," and that the human mind imperatively demands the existence of such a will as the original source of the laws which are manifested in the material world.

A curious instance of the obscure relation between objective and subjective laws is adduced by the Bishop in the occurrence of Easter-day, and the varying length of the Epiphany season. He gives a diagram to illustrate his meaning in each case. That referring to Easter-day extends from 1854 to 1884, and the dots marking the occurrence of the day range from the 23rd of March to the 24th of April. No one studying this diagram, he says, could detect any law behind the facts, for though there is a tendency of the dots to run in straight lines and at equal distances, any inference from this seeming relation would be "absolutely fallacious." So unrelated are the occurrences of the day, he continues, that "it would be safe to wager almost any odds" (we hope the Bishop is not a betting man, or Sir WILFRID LAWSON must feel specially scandalised), that after a complete study of the diagram the most ingenious person could not predict the date of Easter-day in 1885. And yet the subjective law giving rise to the occurrence of the day admits of the simplest enunciation; "Easter-day is the first Sunday after the full moon which happens upon or next after the 21st day of March, and if the full moon happens upon a Sunday Easter-day is the Sunday after." This should show us, we are told, how complex an order of facts may flow from a simple law; how an order of facts may be connected with a formal law, itself the expression of a law-giving will; how difficult it is to detect the subjective law which underlies an order of facts of a complex kind; that supposing the laws of nature to be the outcome of an infinite mind and will they may be conceived in that mind in what may be described as a simple manner, though extremely complex when exhibited in an order of natural phenomena; and that a law laid down by original volition may admit of subsequent change without any break of continuity in the action of that law, since the Reform of the Calendar by POPE GREGORY XIII. is seen not to have interfered with the occurrence of Easter-day. The inference drawn from this last fact is that on the Theistic theory of the Universe it would be rash to predicate absolute uniformity in the laws of nature from eternity to eternity. The tendency to confound orderly sequence with its cause is justly rebuked by our author, who endeavours to show by a series of algebraic symbols how science is able to trace two or three links in the chain of causation, and discover a few interacting subjective laws, in some cases, but never reaches the ultimate law upon which all the others rest. This can only be found by the mind in divine volition.

It is to be noted that the Bishop draws a clear line of distinction between the action of law in the material and moral worlds. "In Physics," he says, "consequences follow laws; in Morals they ought to follow them," but do not always do so because of the free volition of man. In morals the purpose, plan and law or laws are the known quantities, while the resulting order of facts are unknown. In Physics it is will or purpose which is obscure or scientifically undiscoverable; there is no doubt often about the facts or of a series of links in the chain of causation. Still, says the Right Rev. Prelate, with a candour and moderation his philosophical opponents should admire, "It would seem to be the reverse of unphilosophical to conclude that the basis of physical and moral law is the same, and to resolve both the one and the other into the ultimate conception of an eternal and all-powerful will." A reference to HOOKER'S death-bed meditation, in which he spoke of angels as bound by the chain of necessity on the one hand and saw in them the potentiality of the disobedience which belongs to rational creatures, brings this able and suggestive paper to a close. According to the author of the "Ecclesiastical Polity," the higher beings whom we speak of under the generic term of angels are a complete realisation of what law ought to be—"law the expression of the Supreme Will followed by a complete voluntary submission to that will is right and good." The thought is a beautiful one, in the light of it the poor struggling and tempted child of earth is able to picture to himself how the denizens of heaven may have risen by successive moral conquests, as he is called upon to do, till at length they could live the prayer "Thy will be done," and thus enjoy eternal felicity.

THE LATEST AMERICAN HERETIC.

We have called attention to the heresy case of Dr. Newman Smyth, the proscrit of the Andover School of Theology in America, and not long ago we reviewed his book, "Old Faiths in a New Light," which has been republished in this country. The current number of the Contemporary Review refers to his case at some length in an article entitled "The War of Creeds in America," by "A Non-resident American." It is so clear and valuable an account of a controversy which has excited much attention on both sides of the Atlantic that a summary of it will no doubt interest most of our readers.

It was remarked with surprise at the Pan-Presbyterian Conference, held not long ago in Philadelphia, that the American delegates were far more orthodox than the Scotch. It is generally true, says this writer, of the Churches of America that they adhere more closely to the old standards than those of Europe. "All forms of belief and unbelief are represented there in and out of the churches, and the opponents of Orthodoxy manage to attract no little attention, but they have excited no such influence as in England." The changes that have taken place have thus far, we are told, been rather negative than positive. "There have been no changes of creed, no new standards adopted by the Churches, but ministers have ceased preaching many of the distinctive doctrines of Calvinism. Their preaching has become more practical and less doctrinal. There has undoubtedly been a more or less general feeling that, when men were attacking the very foundations of religion, it was more important to prove that Christianity was a living power which could redeem the race than it was to prove the superiority of this or that Sectarian creed."

A conflict on the question of creeds has been threatening for several years in the Congregational Churches of New England and the West, which more than any other represent the old Puritan faith and tradition of the Pilgrim Fathers, and demand the acceptance of an elaborate creed as a condition of membership. We hear with surprise that even children are required to subscribe to it, and that it is kept always before the minds of the laity as well as the clergy. But creeds, however carefully framed and jealously guarded, are no security against the invasion of heresy, and the movements of free and progressive thought. In spite of all precautions, a conflict has recently broken out where it was least expected, at the Theological School of Andover, next to Yale, the most famous connected with the Congregationalists of America.

Andover is a small country town about twenty miles from Boston, and is chiefly famous for its theological school. Some of its professors, Drs. Words, Moses Stuart, Park, Shedd, and others are known far beyond their own country, from their valuable contributions to Biblical learning and Homiletics, and their tone has never been ultra-conservative, or opposed to progress. Some of these divines are well known in connection with the Unitarian controversy which agitated the Churches of New England sixty years ago. Andover is still regarded as the fountain-head of Orthodoxy in New England. Its professors are required when appointed to subscribe to a creed established by the founders, and to repeat this subscription at stated intervals. On the resignation of Professor Park, the trustees, with the full approval of the faculty or whole body of professors, unanimously elected Dr. Newman Smyth to the vacant professorship. Like his namesake in Scotland, he is a young man, and is pastor of a large Presbyterian church in the State of Illinois. He has published several works on theological subjects, notably, in addition to the work above mentioned, a course of popular lectures on "The Orthodox Theology of To-day." The leading congregational paper of New England, true to the instincts of Orthodoxy, sounded the alarm, raised the cry of heresy, and denounced the appointment. A violent controversy ensued, the result of which is that the nomination of Dr. Smyth was finally vetoed by the Board of Visitors representing the original founders of the school. They ingeniously, and possibly ingenuously, declare that their action is not based upon any doubt as to his orthodoxy or personal character, but solely upon "the illogical and poetical character of his mind, which must unfit him to teach dogmatic theology." But it is an obvious remark that as the public discussion has all turned upon the question of orthodoxy, it will be difficult to persuade the Churches that "an illogical and poetical mind" is not after all a euphemism for heresy.

The old question of creed-subscription is of course the main principle involved in this controversy. The discussion in the press and pulpit waxed hot over the question whether Dr. Smyth, whose belief unquestionably differs from that of the founders of the Andover School, could honestly subscribe to a creed every article of which the founders declare "shall for ever remain entirely and identically the same, without the least alteration, addition, or diminution;" whether he had the "right to interpret this creed in a sense unknown to them." The faculty of the school defend his right to subscribe, on the ground that "the founders could never have intended to prevent progress in theology and the development of larger views—of a more free but not less reverent and Christian spirit." They especially repudiate the idea that "the school is anchored immovably to a particular phase of orthodoxy in the past, so that it cannot participate in the general progress of orthodox theology." They claim that great progress has already been made, and an interesting catalogue of repudiated dogmas comprising most of the five points of Calvinism. They claim that "Dr. Smyth's position is a natural development of principles which the New England theology has especially cultivated—the Universality of the Atonement, and the necessity of personal choice in order to the existence of either guilt or virtue." These doctrines, it will be seen, sap the very foundations of orthodoxy, and are, as the writer says, "surprising revelations, which must have an important influence upon the faith of the Congregational Churches of America." He adds that "the faculty of this old orthodox school appear to hold that a man may subscribe to a creed when he does not believe what it says nor what it intended to say, provided he thinks that his belief is an historical outgrowth from this creed, and the result of additional light thrown upon it by the progress of human thought, or the further study of the Scriptures."

The general influence of the whole controversy will be to discredit all elaborate creeds. Dr. Newman Smyth, of Andover, like Dr. Robertson Smith, of Aberdeen, is no sceptic or Materialist. He has a Christian faith which he holds dearer than life. But he also believes in progressive theology. He believes that "it has made progress in its idea of God and the relation of the natural to the supernatural; in its conception of the person and work of Christ and its view of the future life; in its methods and in its language." He believes in God's universal love, which has always been the light of the world; that Christ was Love's own atonement for the sin of the world, and that salvation is not dependent upon belief in intellectual creeds, but upon a going out of the heart and life toward the love of God. He believes that there is to be a final triumph of good over evil in the universe, an end of sin, although he rejects the theories of annihilation and restoration. He believes that every soul will have a full probation somewhere, and on these doctrines of the last things generally he follows in the main the teaching of Dr. Dörner. These are not new or strange doctrines to our readers, but they are certainly very different from the hard, mechanical dogmas of the old orthodox theology.

The writer, to whom we are indebted for a very clear account of a most interesting and important controversy, sums up in a few pregnant words, to which nothing need be added:—"The controversy over Dr. Smyth will not be a vain one if it teaches the churches the nature and necessity of progress in the comprehension and the methods of the presentation of divine truth. It is far more important to gain this knowledge than it is to decide whether a certain presentation of the doctrine of the Atonement is logical or nebulous and poetical. In fact, the whole history of Christianity is a history of progress in theology. We may at least learn that where there is life there will be progress. Spiritual life and progress in theology go together."

Are there not some of our own friends who need this lesson? And even in our own Free Churches are we never to learn the uselessness of creeds in securing uniformity of thought, and their mischievousness as a barrier to theological progress?

THE SCIENCE OF ETHICS.—II.

"The history of ethical speculation," says Mr. Leslie Stephen*, "confronts us with a fact which, were it not so familiar, might appear to be anomalous." The fact to which he alludes in thus opening up his valuable inquiry is that whereas while moralists are almost unanimous in pronouncing certain classes of conduct to be right and the opposite wrong, when they come to ask, what is the essence of right and wrong? how do we know right from wrong? why should we seek the right and eschew the wrong?—we are presented with the most contradictory answers. This is a phenomenon which requires to be taken into serious account. Broadly speaking, the world of thinkers is divided on the subject into two principal schools, corresponding very closely with the two great schools of metaphysicians commonly known as the Common Sense or Common Consciousness School, and the Sensational School. By the one party it is contended that morality is a set of laws prescribed for mankind by an authority external to the race, and by the other that it is a code which has had not only its development but also its origin within the great social body. It is needless to say here that the latter opinion is the only one which is consistent with the system of philosophy that, born twenty-five years ago, has already radically changed the course of every department of thought. Mr. Stephen points out that it is not sufficient to refute an opponent; we are also bound to explain him. He recognises as a criterion of successful speculation that it should explain not only the phenomena considered, but the illusions due to a partial view of the phenomena. "The fact that the Ptolemaic system of astronomy can be fitted into the Copernican system as representing an imperfect view of the facts, whilst the relation cannot be reversed, is itself part of the evidence on behalf of the more comprehensive system." Is this true of the new moral science—that which proceeds upon the lines of Evolution? Does it find an element of truth in the older teachings which it can assimilate? and is it able to explain the rest? We shall see. There is this distinction, however, between Mr. Stephen's exposition of the subject and that of Mr. Herbert Spencer. Mr. Spencer has worked out an encyclopædic system, of which ethics is the crown and completion; Mr. Stephen has started from the old ethical theories and "tried to bring them into harmony with the scientific principles which he takes for granted," he surveys the province from within. He is not so presumptuous as to suppose that he has arrived at a final settlement of ethical inquiry—he has no doubt that ethical problems will be debated long after he is dead and forgotten, and he believes our hopes of a perfect conciliation between moralists must be adjourned till that infinitely distant millennium when all metaphysical problems will have been solved, for "ethical controversies spring from the ultimate problems of all thought." But he asks if we may not discover propositions about the relations of men to each other and the internal relations of the individual human being which will be independent of metaphysical disputes? The geometrician proceeds without troubling himself about such argumentations. It is fortunate, Mr. Stephen says, that this is possible, for otherwise we should have no knowledge until we had reached the ultimate goal of knowledge. "The follower of Hegel means in all probability the same thing as the followers of Hume when he says that a mother loves her child; though when they come to reflect upon certain ulterior imports of the phrases used, they may come to opposite conclusions."

* Science of Ethics. Smith, Elder and Co. 1882.

Mr. Stephen declines to enter upon a controversy concerning Free Will. It is to him only relevant so far as it affects the universal postulate, because "unless we assume that identical inferences can be made from identical facts we are simply unable to reason at all; the alternative to making the assumption is not to admit some other possibility, but to cease to think." If two men act differently there must be some corresponding difference in the character or circumstances, as if two bodies produce different reactions there must be some corresponding difference in their chemical composition. If free will be inconsistent with this theory, Mr. Stephen rejects it; if it be consistent, he has nothing more to say about it at this juncture.

The existence of a moral science does not imply a contradiction in terms, notwithstanding that perfection in it be unattainable, for all science is similarly situated. "We can be sure of an experiment in the laboratory, but our knowledge in regard to any series of events not voluntarily prepared is limited by the constant possibility of the interference of conditions which we have not foreseen, or are unable to appreciate." Will Caesar cross the Rubicon? The problem is as determinate as the problem Will a projectile fall on the hither or further bank? The problem of human conduct is a very difficult one, no doubt; for "character" is "the name of an undecipherable mass of sensibilities, inherited and acquired habits of reasoning and feeling, changing from day to day, baffling all calculations, and deluding the shrewdest observer." It is impossible to say whether Caesar will or will not cross the Rubicon. It may be possible to say that most men would or would not cross; or, again, to say that Caesar will cross under certain conditions, which again may correspond to the conditions most commonly fulfilled, and which may therefore give a certain degree of very useful knowledge. The difficulty is further increased by the fact that men do not always act from conscious motives. In a large part of our lives we are mere automata. "A man would act in one way if the results of action were present to his mind, but he acts in another way, simply because it is easiest for him to act to-day as he happened to act yesterday."

We are therefore unable to infer conduct from character unless we know what are those accidental chains by which it is bound. "A man gives money, or says his prayers, not because he is charitable or devout, but because he has been brought up to do so." The conduct of a man is dependent upon his moral and mental organisation as much as the various reactions of a body upon its chemical composition, hence a tenable psychology is needed; but the psychological armoury is scantily provided. Passing, then, to sociology, do we find there more effective weapons? "I need not say how short-sighted are the ablest statesmen, and how constantly that which happens is precisely the one thing which nobody foresaw, but which, after the event, appears to be just what every one should have foreseen."

These are some of the difficulties of a science of ethics; but do we not in fact possess a considerable degree of knowledge of our fellow creatures? "A confidence that our neighbours will act in accordance with certain anticipations is essential to almost every part of our conduct." Though the shrewdest of statesmen, courtiers, solicitors, or confessors, is liable to innumerable blunders, the very capacity of reasoning upon such matters implies that there is some such knowledge. This knowledge does not differ in kind from scientific knowledge. There is, in truth, only one kind of knowledge; and knowledge gradually passes into the scientific state as it becomes more definite and articulate. "My certainty that a boat into which I am about to step will support my weight is not greater than my certainty that a mother will try to save her child from drowning." Yet there are such things as "unnatural" mothers, and "we cannot say what innate sensibilities or what subsequent culture are required in order to develop the more normal intensity of feeling." For many practical purposes the conclusion that "most" mothers love their children is amply sufficient, and for its logical justification the author refers to works upon the theory of induction. In any case it represents one of those beliefs upon which we are in daily and hourly reliance. And our provisions as to human conduct are not simply statements of averages; for while the statistical method only proves what in this work is all along taken for granted, viz.: the doctrine of the uniformity of nature, and not that a given proportion is always observed, whatever the social condition in other respects; the fatalistic theory fails also because it is not asserted that the number, say, of murders is constant, whatever the social state. The social body is no more liable to arbitrary changes than the individual body, and whilst this is so there will be an approximately constant number of persons in the same bodily and mental state.

Society is not a mere aggregate, but an organism; hence there must be discoverable laws of social growth which are essentially relevant to this investigation, but which previous methods of inquiry have tended to ignore. "Vast importance has been given to many apparently trifling facts by the theory of evolution, as applied to all the sciences which have to do with organised beings. What was formerly set down as a freak of nature, or dismissed from the sphere of the explicable by some verbal reference to a special creation, turns out to be an important link in the chain of evidence as to past conditions of organic life. . . . I am now enabled to see that a statement which seemed only to describe the average mode of behaviour of independent beings has really a vast significance when considered as describing a quality of a persistent organism." The difficulty in the problem before us—to discover the scientific form of morality—was the apparently arbitrary and fluctuating nature of all human instinct. But when we consider human beings to be the product of a long series of processes of adaptation or adjustment, acting either upon the individual or the social organism, we may hope to discern that any given set of instincts corresponds to certain permanent conditions, and how one part of the organism implies another, or how the whole being given, the relation between its facts follows, and thus how the general system hangs together. Thus the variation in moral beliefs must be a part of the problem to be solved. "The evolution of opinion is part of the whole evolution." In following chapters the author gives precision to these remarks, deferring the consideration of "those moral principles which are, or profess to be deduced from transcendental considerations or from pure logic independent of any particular fact." He has to do in the first place with facts of observation. M.

WESTGATE CHAPEL, WAKEFIELD.—The memorial stone of the new building intended to be used as a vestry and committee-room was laid on Saturday last by Miss Marriott, of Sandal Grange. This annexe is situated behind the chapel, facing the chapel-keeper's house and the garden in front of the school. It comprises a large cellar for heating purposes and other requirements, a vestry large enough to accommodate week evening meetings or Bible classes, and a small room to be fitted up as a lavatory. From the vestibule a door leads conveniently into the chapel, close to the foot of the pulpit stair. The old building now undergoing extensive alterations was cleared out for the preliminary proceedings, as the weather was unsettled, and at four o'clock about a hundred and fifty people had gathered to witness the ceremony. An opening hymn, announced by the Rev. A. Chalmers, having been sung, and prayer offered by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, of Leeds, the architect, Mr. J. W. Connon, presented Miss Marriott with a beautiful silver trowel, with ivory handle, and bearing a suitable inscription. Mr. Chalmers then presented her with a mallet, made of old oak from the chapel gallery, and bearing the monogram, and the inscription, "A memorial of Westgate Chapel restoration, 1882," on a silver plate. Thus equipped, she proceeded to lay the memorial block, which forms the apex of the west gable of the new building. On the company reassembling in the chapel, a cordial vote of thanks to Miss Marriott was proposed by Mr. Backshell and seconded by Mr. Sam. Wood, two of the trustees, and enthusiastically carried. A similar vote to the architect, who has taken a very warm interest in the work, was proposed by Mr. Theedam, seconded by Mr. Shawcross, and carried by acclamation. The following resolution was then proposed by Mr. Walter Wood, seconded by Councillor Sharpley, and carried amid much applause:—"That we express our gratitude to W. T. Marriott, Esq., J.P., for his munificent help in the restoration of the chapel, and for his careful supervision of the work, and also congratulate him on his recent enrolment among the West Riding magistrates, and rejoice that his personal worth and public spirit are so highly appreciated." In responding, Mr. Marriott proposed a vote of thanks to his son-in-law, Mr. Chalmers, for his assistance in promoting and carrying out the restoration scheme. After a closing hymn and prayer, nearly all present adjourned to the school, when tea was served by the members of the Ladies' Sewing Society. The alteration of the chapel has been in progress a little over two months, but as there is still much to do, it is scarcely expected to be ready for re-opening before the beginning of October.

DUDLEY.—The annual examinations of Parsons' Boys' and Girls' Schools, connected with the Unitarian church, were conducted by the Rev. M. Gibson on Wednesday and Thursday, the 5th and 6th inst., occupying just under seven hours, and the result in both schools was in every respect most satisfactory. Forty-six class prizes were given at the close of the examination on Thursday to the boys and girls, and seventy-one perfect attendance prizes to those, out of the 155 in the schools, who had not been absent for twelve months either morning or afternoon. The average attendance had been extraordinarily good; in the girls' school ninety-nine out of one hundred; and in the boys' fifty-four out of fifty-five. Mr. Gibson congratulated Mr. and Mrs. Lewis, the master and mistress, on the great success of their most earnest, conscientious and persevering labours; and remarked upon the excellent discipline of the schools, and the good behaviour of the children. All were present on the occasion, and about sixty visitors, many of whom showed special interest in the sewing and knitting of the girls, which were considered particularly good. At the present time there are on the list of applicants for admission in the boys' school ninety-four, and in the girls' 144. Nothing can show more impressively how greatly these schools are appreciated. A full report of the proceedings, with a list of those who obtained prizes, was given in both the Dudley newspapers last week.

Open Council.

CREEDS—THEIR USES AND ABUSES.

Dr. Newman Smyth, in his "Orthodox Theology of To-day," acknowledges that ignorant, impetuous, and superstitious adherence to creeds has often fettered the pre-action of Churches and proved the parent of error. He sees that creeds must be modified to suit the exigencies of time and race, and that the to-day of a thousand years ago is not and cannot be our to-day. He makes his protest against dead creeds by coining the word Orthodoxism—an attitude of mind which he condemns. "Orthodoxism is an orthodoxy which has ceased to grow. . . . It offers a crust to dogma left over from another century. It fails to receive the daily bread for which we are told this day to pray." It might be thought therefore that he would go a step further, and give his assent to that which is frequently urged now-a-days, that creeds are a stumbling-block in the way of Christianity. Far from it; he thinks that a Church without a creed is a Church without a mission. Christianity has never "come to its kingdom in any one of them." And, indeed, it would seem paradoxical to assert that a proselytising Church without a creed could make much mark in its generation.

But to the writer it appears to be not so much a question between a creed or no creed, as between a formal or an informal creed. No doubt if the question was between a creed or no creed, in such unhappy case he would stand up for creed, even the stiffest—anything short of the Athanasian Creed. But his contention is, that though Christianity is impossible (or, indeed, any religion) without a creed, yet that an informal creed is, at least in these days, better than a formal creed, and that that man is wisest who takes his stand upon, and gives his adhesion to the "unwritten law" of his Church. Practically, none of the "Orthodox Dissenters" have a hard and fast creed. Though I was born and bred a Dissenter, I am ignorant whether a creed be preserved in the archives of dissenting literature. Certainly, none was ever taught dogmatically. When, as a young man, I was baptised, no questions that could be called ecclesiastical or dogmatic were asked me. It was a question of life, of emotion, of desire, of purpose, of God's grace. Though it be true, therefore, that no religion is possible without a creed, it is also true that churches may live and flourish—when each individual member of a Church if set down to formulate the creed of his Church would express it with different propositions and in different words. If an average Orthodox Dissenter, fairly thoughtful, were set down for the first time before the Prayer-book of the Church of England, and asked whether he could give his assent to the Apostles' or the Nicene Creed, he would answer impatiently—"Of course, of course! What is there to deny? The Trinity, God Almighty, and so on. It goes without saying. But what is the use of it? Of what object is it for me to repeat that Jesus is the son of the Virgin Mary, that he rose the third day, that he was crucified under Pontius Pilate? You have left out all the important points. Justification by faith. The doctrine of substitution. The whole scheme of salvation as developed by Paul. And what have we in the place of these? A few historical facts, which nobody doubts, instead of the life-giving words of the New Testament. Truly this is the show of wisdom without the power!"

I certainly do not mean here to assert that the Dissenter would be right. I do not mean to assert that he might not be more wilful and imperious, more self-sufficient, more prejudiced, more narrow than the Church of England man. Nor do I mean that he would be indifferent to error, and that he would not say that he clung to "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." But the history of Dissent proves that a deep, strong, religious, corporate life may exist without being supported by a formal creed.

Let us take a case from analogy. Men are built upon the foundation of a backbone. Thereupon they work, and move. Thereby they are able to direct their energies. The backbone is not seen, but it is none the less the governor of all their actions. It may be diseased, and then the man is deformed. But without a backbone the life of man is impossible. There is a lower order of life—that of the crustacea. In this order, the skeleton is outside, and the life goes on within. In a healthy condition, when the animal gets too large for its shell, it casts it, and builds itself a more commodious one. But sometimes the vital conditions are not favourable to the formation of a fresh shell, or are not sufficiently vigorous to enable the animal to cast its old one. Then the animal dies.

A creed is to a Church as such a support is to an animal. In animals the lower and earlier condition is that of the crustacea, the higher development is that of the vertebrata. As in the churches, in earlier times, the internal creed was the necessary condition of religious life, the out-worn creed being replaced in the healthy church by a new one better adapted to the then conditions of life. This is exemplified in the history of the Coptic Greek, Roman and English Churches. But in times of higher development arose other Churches in which life was as vigorous, and where the creed informed the Church from within. No doubt protests are and will continue to be heard from the older and well established Churches. But they will be in vain.

It would be a grievous error to assert that the writer and others like him are running a tilt against creeds. Nothing is further from the truth. The contention is not to do away with creed, but with the formal expression of obsolete creed. The contention is that the internal creed is a lower development of life. The contention is that unseen things (as seed in the ground) grow best. In George Ebu's "Emperor," Nadrian is made to exclaim: "Day is the present merely, and the future is evolved out of darkness; the corn grows from the clouds of the field; the rain falls from the distant clouds; a new generation is born from the mother's womb; the limbs recover their vigour in sleep." Again, the contention is that life working within the creed (instead of the creed within the life) may become dwarfed and stagnant, and rest content with that which was once its support, and now has become its prison. The contention is that the life within, perceiving the crushing and benumbing influence of the internal creed, may fear to cast away old associations, may fear to creep away in nakedness and darkness while awaiting the growth of the new dogma; may not have the courage and tenacity of purpose requisite to create a new condition of things. It is well to "nail one's colours to the mast." Yes! But what if, in the ignorance and darkness of the night, the captain nails the colours of the enemy to the mast? H. CANDLER.

LEICESTER.—At a meeting of the Committee of the Leicester Domestic Mission, held July 7, the following resolution was unanimously and heartily passed:—"That Mr. Russell's resignation of his office as missionary be regretfully accepted, and that while thanking him for his faithful services in connection with the mission, the committee on behalf of the subscribers wish him all success in his new work."

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION FOR WOMEN.—The Vice-Chancellor's certificate of the University of Cambridge has just been gained by five lady students in the Crystal Palace School of Art, Science, and Literature, viz., Miss Edith Banbury, Mrs. Alice Howse, Miss M. A. Lyle, Miss Alice Lisle Manley, and Miss Mary Sheffield. These certificates testify not only to success in examination, but to three years' study under the Professors appointed by the University at the Palace School, and that the students have passed through a course of study approved by the Syndicate. This is, we are informed, the only University-teaching centre near London where the Vice-Chancellor's certificate can be worked for.

THROAT IRRITATION.—Soreness and dryness, tickling and irritation, inducing cough and affecting the voice. For these symptoms use Epps's Glycerine Jujubes. Glycerine, in these agreeable confections, being in proximity to the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of speaking, becomes actively healing. Sold only in boxes, 7½d. and 1s. 1½d., labelled, "JAMES EPPS and Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." A letter received:—"Gentlemen,—It may, perhaps, interest you to know that, after an extended trial, I have found your Glycerine Jujubes of considerable benefit (with or without medical treatment) in almost all forms of throat disease. They soften and clear the voice.—Yours faithfully, GORDON HOLMES, L.R.C.P.E., Senior Physician to the Municipal Throat and Ear Infirmary."

Occasional Notes.

DENOMINATIONALISM may be a very excellent thing in its way, but it may be carried too far. In the United States it is said that the leading religious denominations support their own hospitals, and that the Methodists are to have one in Brooklyn at a cost of £100,000. Are the doctors and other attendants in these hospitals compelled to submit to some theological test of medical fitness before their appointment? What becomes, too, of the unfortunate men and women who belong to no denomination? Is the Baptist hospital an hydropathic establishment? Is confirmation a requisite before a patient can be attended to in an Episcopalian hospital? Have the Jumpers an establishment, and would they regard a man with a broken leg as an incurable case? These questions come naturally to an inquiring mind, especially when the advantage of this sort of denominationalism is not quite apparent.

A NEW sect is reported to have been formed in New York, called the Unsectarian Church of Divine Gifts. Dr. Monck, the pastor, claims to cure disease by the laying on of hands. Was not there a person of that name, who, hailing from the other side of the Atlantic, got into trouble of a "spiritualistic" nature here, and had to have hands laid on him—the hands of the law we mean?

THE last words of Longfellow—that is, the last written words, the last of his messages to the world that loves poetry, and believes it to be the melodious wedding of beautiful thoughts and beautiful words—are probably in a poem, "The Bells of San Blas," written so shortly before his death as the 15th of last March. In it he says:—

Out of the shadows of night
The world rolls into light.
It is daybreak everywhere.

AFTER reading "Cosmic Philosophy," Darwin wrote to the author, John Fiske, as follows:—"You must allow me to thank you for the great interest with which I have slowly read the whole of your work. I have long wished to read something about the views of the many great men whose doctrines you give. I never in my life read so lucid an expositor (and therefore thinker) as you are; and I think I understand nearly the whole, though perhaps less clearly about cosmic theism and causation than other parts. It is hopeless, out of so much, to specify what has interested me most; and probably you would not care to hear. It pleased me to find here and there I had arrived, from my own crude thoughts, at some of the same conclusions with you, though I could seldom or never have given my reasons for such conclusions."

THE medical officer of the State Board of Health of San Francisco, who, we suppose, speaks with authority on the subject, in a recent report on the sanitary condition of that city, says of the much reviled Chinese: "They eat to live, and do not live to eat. They are clean in their habits, and they drink no whisky. I have never seen a drunken Chinaman in my life; they keep themselves and their clothes clean. The death rate is greater with adult white people than with adult Chinese."

SOME weeks ago one of our London ministers, the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, M.A., feeling deeply the reality of the want of devotional fervour with which the freer forms of religious faith are charged, called together a number of his brethren to consult on the best means for securing improvement. After due deliberation they decided to summon a conference of ministers and laymen to devise some practical scheme of action. This conference was held in due course, and was numerously attended by persons who represented nearly all the congregations of the metropolis, and resulted in the formation of a committee to carry out the scheme which was decided upon. This committee has met several times, and is arranging for three meetings to be held in different chapels in London during the next season, the first of which will take place in Little Portland-street Chapel on October 26

These meetings are to be conducted somewhat after the plan adopted at the devotional meeting held during the sittings of the Liverpool Conference. It is hoped that they will help to foster the religious life of our people, and will serve as a means of mutual religious fellowship to the different congregations. Also, that they will help to induce and encourage our laymen to take more part in public worship, and will awaken in the separate congregations more desire for such meetings as an integral part of congregational life. And it is hoped that our churches in the provinces, if they see that these meetings are useful and pleasant to the London churches, may be led to adopt some similar plan, that we may all be comforted and helped together by our mutual faith.

Those of our readers who wish to have a clear and full historical account of Sir Thomas Bodley and the Bodleian Library should read the four admirable papers on that subject, just contributed to All The Year Round by our friend Miss Janett Humphreys. There has never been a detailed account of Bodley's life before, and the labour of collecting facts has been very great, involving diligent search and study at Oxford, in the Library of Lambeth Palace, and in the Public Record Office and the British Museum. We hope that these articles, with some other of Miss Humphrey's contributions, will be reprinted in a permanent form.

WE learn that, in addition to a number of legacies to relatives and friends, the late Mr. W. G. H. Ord, of Manchester, has made the following additional bequests for public objects:—The Dispensary at Alnwick, £1,000; The National Lifeboat Association, £250; The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, £250; The British and Foreign Unitarian Association, £1,000; the trustees of the Unitarian Chapel, Hale, £500; the trustees of the Unitarian Chapel, Altrincham, £250. In the two latter cases the interest accruing is to be devoted to the augmentation of the salaries of the ministers. The bequest to the Alnwick Dispensary is a memento of Mr. Ord's early connection with Alnwick, where he resided during his youth and early manhood.

AN octogenarian minister writes to us that our correspondent of last week, Mr. T. Edwards, was not correct in his statement respecting the religious opinions of Mr. Benjamin Flower and his two accomplished daughters, Eliza Flower and Mrs. Sarah Flower Adams. "When Mr. Flower resided in London he was an avowed Unitarian, and his daughters regularly attended Unitarian places of worship, generally at the Gravel-pit Chapel, Hackney. Their father was warmly interested in Mr. W. J. Fox's lectures, and when the new chapel at South-place was erected, his daughters were regular attendants on his ministry, and were regarded by all who conversed with them as advanced Unitarians. They never joined the Baptists, nor even attended their ministry. Their father was never baptised, but attended the worship of the General Baptists because they were Anti-Trinitarian."

ON Sunday last the venerable Rev. Dr. Peabody occupied Mr. Clayden's pulpit at the Free Christian Church, Kentish-town, and to-morrow the Rev. Dr. Edward Everett Hale will preach in the same place in the morning. Dr. Peabody's discourse was a vigorous statement of the doctrine of Forgiveness. We hope our friends who are able to do so will avail themselves of the opportunity, probably the only one, of hearing Dr. Hale. It may interest some of our readers to know that his daughter is an exhibitor in this year's Academy, and that she has a portrait "on the line" in the principal room.

THE Roman Catholics of this country are agitating for being relieved from paying the School Board rates. They argue that School Boards and Roman Catholics stand much in the same relation to each other as Church rates and Dissenters formerly did. Dr. Vaughan, the Bishop of Salford, preaching at Liverpool last Sunday, took this view, adding that Dissenters thought it a great hardship that they should have to contribute to a Church which they did not use; yet we had now a system—established principally by the action of Dissenters—by which Catholics, who did not use board-schools, but maintained their own, had to pay for both. The argument is more specious than sound. It may be a very good one for justifying Catholics in withholding support from their own schools, but it does not justify them in being relieved from supporting the schools of the nation. The Church was not a national one; the people had no voice in its management; it had exclusive privileges, and only persons of one creed had rights within it. The case is different in the schools; all forms of belief are capable of being represented, Catholics as well as Protestants.

A RECENT convert to Unitarianism in the United States, a Mr. Wilson, has been preaching a sermon in which he called Paul "the Barnum of Christianity." For this the Christian Register very properly takes him to task, and expresses a wish that "converts from Orthodoxy would take a thorough course at Cambridge or Meadville, and thus become well acquainted with the Unitarian method before taking positions in Unitarian pulpits." We cordially echo this desire, and believe that for minister and congregation much bitterness of feeling and misunderstanding might be avoided if, in this country, congregations would make it a sine qua non that their ministers should have had some previous training in Unitarian thought and culture before election to the responsible duties cast upon them. It is a matter which rests entirely with the congregations. In many cases the desire to be broad and liberal leads them into mistakes, the results of which are not easily set right.

IN "Natural Religion" the author of "Ecce Homo" tells a story to the effect "that the theophilanthropist, Larevellerè-Lepeaux, once confided to Talleyrand his disappointment at the ill-success of his attempt to bring into vogue a sort of improved Christianity, a benevolent rationalism which he had invented to meet the wants of a sceptical age. "His propaganda made no way," he said. "What was he to do?" he asked. The ex-bishop politely condescended with him, feared it was a difficult task to found a new religion, more difficult than could be imagined, so difficult that he hardly knew what to advise! "Still"—so he went on after a moment's reflection—"there is one plan which you might at least try; I should recommend you to be crucified and to rise again the third day."

TO-MORROW there is to be held what used to be called the aggregate meeting of the London Sunday-schools. Instead, however, of the gathering being in one place it is to be held in three different centres, Hampstead, Essex-street, and Stepney. This is a great pity. The main object and purpose of these meetings was to bring together into one focus all the London schools, so as to give the encouragement that meeting en masse naturally excites. A tripartite gathering is not the same thing at all. It is said that there is not one of our chapels large enough to hold all the children; that may be a reason for not taking all the little ones, but not for division. We have heard it said that a suggestion that the gathering should take place at a central chapel or institute, in which on former occasions very large gatherings have been held, was declared against on the ground that the weekly services usually conducted there do not meet with the approval of some Unitarians. If this be so, we can only say that such an objection is the quintessence of silliness, to use no stronger term. The information comes to us on good authority, but we hope that far more utilitarian considerations prevailed when the decision was made. In any event we wish the day may be a fine one for those who attend what we fear must now be called the Disintegrated Meeting of Sunday Schools.

THE Bishop of Lincoln, writing to the Mayor of Grimsby on the temperance question, says the temperance pledge is not Scriptural. "It undermines the Godhead of Christ, and he who takes the pledge and breaks it weakens the bands of society. Tender consciences fear to break it, thus often sacrificing their health and entailing a burden upon others. The pledge is both unscriptural and heretical, and it is a deadly sin to sign it." It is not always easy to understand what a Bishop means by his oracular Episcopal utterances. The temperance pledge is "not scriptural." Well, railways and steamboats and the electric telegraph are not scriptural, but we presume that the good bishop occasionally avails himself of these and other advantages of modern civilisation. "Tender consciences fear to break the pledge," and so often sacrifice their health, and entail a burden upon others—we presume in the shape of doctors' bills and the other expenses of the imaginary illnesses occasioned, as the bishop seems to imply, by a scrupulous observance of the laws of temperance. It would have been more to the purpose if the Bishop had dwelt upon the fearful misery and ruin brought not only upon individuals, but upon families and society by the demon of intemperance; but dealing with the argument on its own ground, the bishop seems to have forgotten that the Temperance pledge is not an irrevocable vow, and that under medical advice alcohol may be taken as a powerful medicine, if not as food. We were at a loss to understand at first how the pledge can undermine the godhead of Christ, and be "heretical" as well as unscriptural. On further reflection we remember that the Bishop is a High Churchman of the most pronounced character. The bread and wine administered in the Eucharistical sacrifice are to him veritably and in deed the body and blood of the incarnate God. Those who object to receiving the wine are therefore "denying the Lord who bought them." It is clear as the light of noon-day; the Temperance pledge not only "weakens the bands of society," but "undermines the godhead of Christ." It must be so, because a bishop says so; but then, on the other hand, what says the Bishop of Exeter, who is a pledged abstainer? While the Licensed Victuallers pass a vote of thanks to the Bishop of Lincoln for his encouraging protest, we beg leave to suggest that if there is any "deadly sin" in the matter it is not in signing the pledge, but in opposing a movement which is conferring so great a benefit on every class of society.

University Intelligence.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.

The following are the list of Candidates who have passed the recent Examinations:—

M.A. EXAMINATION.

BRANCH I.—Classics.

- Wallis, J. E. P. (Gold Medal).—St. Cuthbert's College, Ushaw.
- Adler, E. N.—University College.
- Dixon, H. N.—Christ's College, Cambridge.
- Walker, S. S.—Corpus Christi, Cambridge, and Private study.

BRANCH III.—Mental and Moral Science, Political Philosophy, History of Philosophy, and Political Economy.

- Evans, D. T.—New and University Colleges.
- Le Tall, B. B.—University College.
- Todhunter, W. A.—University College and Private study.
- Shakespeare, J. H.—University and Regent's Park Colleges.
- Stephenson, J.—Richmond College and Private study.
- Brown, F. H.—University College.
- Heather, W.—Cheshunt and University Colleges.
- Rawlings, H.—University College.

D.Sc. EXAMINATION.

BRANCH V.—Organic Chemistry.

- Rennie, E. H.—M.A. Sydney, Royal College of Chemistry and Private study.
- Thresh, J. C.—Private study.

BRANCH VI.—Electricity.

- Treated Experimentally.
- Barfield, S. G. H.—Private study.

BRANCH X.—Comparative Anatomy.

- Tovey, A. E.—University College.

BRANCH XIII.—Systematic Botany.

- Hartog, M. M.—University College, London, and Trinity College, Cambridge.

INTERMEDIATE LITERATURE EXAMINATION.

- Nicolle, W., M.A.—New College and Private study.

N.B.—The bracket denotes equality of merit.

Reviews.

The Doctrine of the Cross. By the Rev. E. S. Scrymgeour. London: George Bell and Sons. 1882.

After reading a chapter or two of this book we found that he who would understand it must possess metaphysical tastes, habits, attitudes and endowments almost equal to those of the writer, which are very considerable; and feeling ourselves very inferior to him in these particulars we hesitated to go on lest we should misapprehend him in some points or other. We think it very likely that we have unwittingly done so; for in addition to the inherent difficulties of the subject matter there are the difficulties of the author's style, which is a little pedantic and fashioned with a view to elegance rather than clearness. His sentences are not long and twisted, and his grammar (if one supplies a few wanting commas) is not confused. There is a condensation and compactness in his aphoristic expressions which make them look round and neat; but they are as hard as stones, and sometimes almost as opaque. It would be a relief to the reader to have a little of the common earth of language mixed with this granite. Now and then, however, it must be confessed that the granite sparkles with beauty; wisdom shines out of the obscurity. The title of the book "Doctrine of the Cross" is applicable to only a small portion of it near the end. More than half the volume contains no reference whatever to Christianity or the Cross. It is an elaborate subtle metaphysical inquiry into the immanence, controlling and creative power of ideas, purpose, law, organic adaptation, conflict of ideas, community of consciousness, ascent to the idea of a Creator, &c.; and it is not until we get beyond the one hundredth page into the fifth chapter that we have any mention of Christ and Christianity at all. To us it seems that the doctrine of the Cross, which is only a symbol of sorrow and suffering in general, inflicted and endured for a holy and generous purpose, is not so very mysterious a matter as to require to be preceded by all this elaborate metaphysical inquiry into the origin and function of ideas.

Our author, if we understand him rightly, is emphatically an Idealist, and not a Materialist. He seems to accept evolution so far as relates to outward changes effected by transforming law; but higher than evolution he places development, which affects inwardly what the other affects outwardly. There must be a movement of idea before there can be a change of form. This, in some respects, is not unlike the philosophy of Hegel, who resolved everything into a process of thought, and considered ideas as much concrete realities as anything else; and in the last chapters of the book which represent Christ as the highest standard of reference there is some little resemblance to Schleiermacher. If the real in nature be studied with the full energy of the whole mind, it will, we think, ere long, suggest the ideal. The natural will lead in time to the recognition of the spiritual or supernatural. The merit of the Baconian method is not in its completeness and sufficiency, but in its beginning in adaptation to human capacity at the right end. It advances from the little to the great, from the near to the remote, from the seen and temporal to the unseen and eternal. In the Creator's method we suppose that ideas preceded facts or concrete forms and were not generated out of them; but in all human inquiries as to the divine methods it is safer, we think, to begin with the facts and outward forms; to probe and analyse them and to find out if possible the divine ideas behind them. For ourselves, though believing in the priority and superiority of ideas over substance—of spirit over matter; we do not quite approve of matter being regarded as unreal and spirit as alone real. Why not regard both as real, assigning, however, the higher rank to spirit, and the subordinate rank to matter? Could not a perfect heavenly reality create a less perfect earthly reality? an eternal reality a temporary one? a changeless reality an evanescent one? Are not our frail bodies in which our souls work realities in their kind and degree? And does not the mysterious and awful discipline of human life consist as much in the pressure and influence of the lower realities on the higher as of the higher on the lower? Do not our bodies in their varying conditions of health and disease largely contribute to the formation of character for good or for evil? The spirit is not only often "subdued by what it works in," but sometimes turned aside in the direction of its activities, and made to fall downward for a while instead of rising up. In this struggle victory at last will remain with the higher realities, but meanwhile the lower have their dangerous work to do. Action and reaction, give and take, blow for blow, influence for influence—such is the struggle of human life—such the means by which we are disciplined for life in a higher world. Shall we say that the nobler elements in this conflict are real and the meaner elements unreal? Are they not both real?

In his apparent tendency of mind to regard all souls as parts of an ultimate one and destined to realise what he calls a "community of consciousness," which we suppose means a mingling of all the waves of life in one sea, our author seems to doubt (if we understand him rightly) whether there can be a plurality of separable beings in the spiritual world. But why not? All souls are nourished, educated, expanded, uplifted, beautified by one great Spirit who is over all supreme. He is perfect; but all other spirits may possibly retain their differences and distinctions and remain perhaps through all eternity progressive and happy though incomplete and unfinished in endowments and power. To our thinking it seems necessary for harmony in the spiritual world that one star should differ from another star in glory, though all may be glorious. In the Father's house are many mansions and probably not all alike. On earth we find that people with very close similarities of capacity, taste and temperament, do not coalesce into the happiest and most permanent friendships. They do not refresh each other by variety. But in the after-abode of our spirits, if there is to be a real "communion of saints" there must be a variety of them. Truth and beauty, however, must characterise them every one.

The main purpose of the metaphysical and philosophical part of this book is, as we understand it, to show that thought is really distinct from the outward world of life, and that thought is the common property of humanity and the ruling power of all outward things. But in the ideal world as in the natural and material, there is, according to this writer, strife and conflict, no one idea, as we apprehend it, thoroughly harmonising in all respects with other ideas. To transcend this antagonism one must ascend from the bondage of the temporal to the freedom of the Eternal. We must reach to views of such breadth and altitude that they shall embrace all smaller views. We must recognise a common over-ruling spiritual purpose in all the variations of life. This central dominant authority is the Ethical Idea. Its purpose is to maintain the unity of spiritual life, to establish the universal and to recognise the sympathetic action and reaction between all living things—a general elementary consciousness. In this view it would seem that everything is conscious, all nature is conscious. This idea, then, of spiritual community is supposed to be the calming, moderating power over the conflict which we observe when standing on less elevated regions of thought. Having reached this all-embracing idea of unity we come into communion with God the Father of spirits, and escape the limitation of lower ideas.

The conception of God the Father leads the mind of the writer to Jesus Christ, whom he regards, in common with many others, as the first and only being in human form who held such close communion with God as to enable him to perceive an essential unity, and to say, "I and my Father are one." We have not a word of objection to all or any of the terms of honour, reverence, gratitude, and love bestowed on Jesus of Nazareth. He deserves them all. We only say that, in our view, the author substitutes imagination for proof when he asserts that this one glorious and beautiful specimen of a holy man, dedicated to heavenly things, was the first and the last and only one that ever revealed the love of God in a divine message to this erring world, and brought life and immortality to light. There have been many Christs in the history of humanity—a few conspicuous, many obscure. They have not all been equal in purity and elevation of character, or extent of influence, or amount of endowment, but all have helped, under God, to spiritualise mankind in some degree, and to diminish the sins of the world. The redeeming influence of spirituality and holiness came into the world thousands of years before Christ, and will come through various media thousands of years after. It is a "rain that raineth every day." We do not see any necessary logical connection between these two chapters about Christ and the previous metaphysical reasonings of this volume. The expression of Jesus, "I and my Father are one," may indeed be made to harmonise with that idea of "community of consciousness" about which the author has been arguing; but beyond this single phrase, we do not see one word of necessary connection between the Christianity of the last chapters and the philosophy of the preceding ones. At the same time, there is no antagonism.

We hope some of our readers will procure and study this volume. They will have very hard work; but we think there will be found something in the end to make it worth while. The author is a vigorous, earnest thinker, and a highly cultivated scholar. The "dust of the schools" unfortunately hangs about his style, but by-and-by, probably, this will be brushed away, and we shall then have from his capable pen something clear as well as profound.

E. A.

A New Commentary on the Gospel According to Matthew. By Edward Byron Nicholson, M.A. London: C. Kegan Paul. 1881.

Writers on theological subjects are very much given to declaring that their works are "written in the interest of no particular sect or party," but so far as we know it has been reserved for Mr. Nicholson to urge it as a recommendation to a commentary on part of the Bible that it is characterised by "the strictest avoidance of all expression or implication of any theological opinion." As Mr. Nicholson evidently regards the main questions of the higher criticism as matter of theological opinion, it is obvious that the limitation by which he seeks to make his book "deserving of acceptance to students of the most diverse views" requires that he should expound a book without "expressing or implying" any opinion as to the mode or purpose of its composition, the relation in which it stands to history, the truth of its several statements, or the meaning of its most important and characteristic passages. Within the limits he has thus imposed upon himself Mr. Nicholson has done some careful and useful work. Readers who have not access to Lightfoot, Schoettgen, &c., will find a fair amount of illustrative matter from Jewish sources collected in Mr. Nicholson's notes, and his practice of inserting the approximate date of every Rabbi to whose sayings he refers cannot be too highly commended. Simple and obvious as this duty is, it has hitherto (for traditional reasons which explain but do not justify the fact) been almost universally neglected. Disputed readings are discussed with care; and a fairly successful attempt is made to lay the main principles of textual criticism clearly before the mind of the unlearned reader.

The merits of the work, however, are necessarily overbalanced by the defects of its initial conception; and in the passages we have consulted we have found no such exceptional master within the narrowed field to which the author has confined himself as would be needed to secure a permanent place to his work amongst the popular aids to the study of the Bible.

P. H. W.

The Modern Review. James Clarke and Co.

The July number of this valuable Quarterly well keeps up the reputation it has gained. The articles are written by men of high reputation in their respective departments, only one of whom is connected with the body of Liberal Nonconformists, by whom the Review is mainly supported.

Dr. Reginald Lane Poole opens with a critical paper on "The Book of Wisdom," the most valuable and interesting of apocryphal books, all of which have been unduly neglected by Protestant narrowness. This particular book is especially valuable as illustrating the growth of the logos idea and the subsequent personification of the Word.

Tennyson's "Despair" is the subject of a fine essay by the Rev. Charles Shakespeare, a well-known Broad Churchman, who points out that two extreme types of belief are presented in this "dramatic monologue," Calvinism and Agnosticism, extremes which "exist in their naked horror, although the true character of each, and of Calvinism in particular, is veiled in these latter days." The Essayist well points out that the Calvinistic dogma predisposes men to welcome any philosophy which clears it out of the way, and that men like Hume and the two Mills, like the late Professor Clifford, and even so calm a thinker as Herbert Spencer, betray the repellent influence of those misconceptions of God and of Christ which have rendered their attitude towards religious faith studiously neutral, when not overtly hostile.

M. Ernest Fontané, the eminent liberal pastor of Havre, in a long and able article on "The Religious Situation of France," shows that that situation is a threatening one. "A deadly struggle has been entered into between Catholicism on the one hand, which has gone bodily over to Ultramontanism, and the most thorough-going free thought on the other." M. Fontané allows what we have more than once remarked, that the Protestant Church in France has not exercised any powerful attraction on that part of the public which Catholicism has repelled. The French mind has no sympathy with Bibliolatry or Puritanism. It needs more colour, life and warmth than Protestantism, and for our own part we do not hesitate to avow the conviction that if the natives of the South generally are to be saved from a desolating unbelief, it will be by a reformed Catholicism, retaining all the elements of artistic beauty and universality in the old religion and worship, and not by any of the ordinary forms of Protestantism. Liberal Christianity, were it not for its unfortunate traditional connection in France with the Huguenots, and in England with the Puritans and Dissenters, might have supplied all that the higher spiritual thought and intelligence of the age are vaguely longing for.

"Charles Darwin, his Life and Work," is a most interesting summary of the great naturalist's remarkable career, by Dr. W. B. Carpenter, who writes from intimate personal knowledge, and, of course, entire scientific sympathy with the now accepted doctrine of Development. Referring to the atheistic character which "Orthodox" theologians were fond of attributing to Darwin's views, Dr. Carpenter reminds us that the outcry they raised "afforded another proof of the narrowing and perverting influence of any dogmatic systems which men pledge themselves to uphold," and he adds that "the melancholy story of the slanderous attacks which were made on the greatest interpreter of the 'Order of Organic Nature' who has ever stood between its Author and Man, ought to be remembered as a lesson to the Theologians for the future. No one has now ventured to throw a stone at Darwin's grave; since for any one to do so would bring down upon him general condemnation. The revolution in the public feeling of this country, which has been silently and almost insensibly going on, but of which his departure from among us has brought out the manifestation, has been a surprise no less to his friends than it must have been to his former opponents." Referring to his personal character, Dr. Carpenter says:—"Those who knew Charles Darwin most intimately are unanimous in their appreciation of the unsurpassed nobility and beauty of his whole character. In him there was no 'other side.' Not only was he the Philosopher who has wrought a greater revolution in human thought within a quarter of a century than any man of our time—or perhaps of any time—and has given what is proving the death-blow to Theological systems which had been clinging yet more tenaciously about men's shoulders because of the efforts made to shake them off; but as a Man he exemplified in his own life that true religion which is deeper, wider, and loftier than any Theology."

We must pass rapidly over the remaining articles. Wordsworth's "Two Styles" is a fine piece of literary criticism, by Mr. R. H. Hutton, who points out, and illustrates his thesis by copious quotations, that "Wordsworth had two distinct styles, the style of his youth and the style of his age. The elastic style of fresh energy, born of his long devotion to Nature's own rhythms, and the style of gracious and stately feeling, born of his benignity, of his deep-set, calm sympathy with human feeling—the style of 'The Solitary Reaper,' and the style of 'Devotional Incitements.'" Mr. H. Schütz Wilson brings to a conclusion his charming sketch in the bye-ways of history of "Elizabeth Stuart, Queen of Bohemia," the greatest of whose many misfortunes was that she was born of the worthless Stuart family, and that her brother, the sainted martyr, Charles I., was as incapable as his father of clear and noble action. The romance of history still regards with interest the melancholy story of the lives and misfortunes of Elizabeth and her weaker husband, Frederick, the Elector Palatine. Dr. E. A. Abbott follows with the first part of an elaborate dissertation on "Justin's Use of the Fourth Gospel," which maintains, in reply to the general conclusion of Orthodox Theologians, that there is not only no evidence that Justin regarded the Fourth Gospel as on the same level with the Synoptic Gospels, but that there is ample evidence that he placed it on a lower level, and did not accept it as authoritative and apostolical. It is interesting to observe that Dr. Abbott makes considerable use of treatises on the Fourth Gospel by Professor James Drummond, of Manchester New College, and Ezra Abbott, of Harvard College, and also of Norton's "Genuineness of the Gospels." Finally we have a fine but too long poem by the Hon. Roden Noel on "The Temple of Sorrow," suggested by the recent disaster in the Ring Theatre, Vienna; and "Notes and Discussions," comprising valuable essays on "The Law of Parsimony and the Argument of Design," by the Rev. C. C. Coe, in reply to an article in Nature by Dr. Romanes, and "The Origin of the Name Jehovah," by the Rev. T. Tyler. The "Notices of Books," always a full and valuable feature, are by the Revs. T. Tyler, Estlin Carpenter, C. B. Upton, E. M. Geldart, H. Shaen Solly, P. H. Wicksteed, R. B. Drummond, J. E. Odgers, Mr. H. M. Baynes, and the Editor.

The Nineteenth Century. Kegan Paul and Co. The Contemporary Review. Strahan and Co.

The two monthlies between them have five articles bearing on the question of Home Rule in its various aspects, a fact which shows that, whether we like it or not, this question will have to be taken into account in the practical politics of the near future. In the Nineteenth Century Professor Goldwin Smith strongly denounces the "Home Rule Fallacy," and exposes what he regards as a mischievous interpretation of the example of the Canadian Confederation. The Earl of Belmore, in an article entitled "Fair Play to Landlords," does not make out a very strong case on behalf of that suffering class who have had their inns for several centuries, and have been the main cause of all the evils with which Ireland is afflicted, ruling her in the spirit of a dominant caste seeking their own selfish advantage only, and as a necessary consequence, losing the very thing which they sought. "With the Emigrants" is a graphic and often pathetic account by Mr. J. H. Tuke of the benevolent labours he has undertaken in Connemara as the administrator of a fund raised by an influential committee in London. It is noteworthy that his article, although written without any partisan purpose, indirectly shows that most of the calamities he describes are traceable to the dominant landlordism in the form in which it has hitherto existed. In the Contemporary we have "Home Rule From an English Point of View," by Albert V. Dicey, the object of which is to show, in reply to Mr. Justin McCarthy, that any system of Home Rule or Federalism is at least as much opposed to the interests of Great Britain as would be the natural independence of Ireland; and "The Financial Aspect of Home Rule," a pithy article by the economist, Mr. M. G. Mulhall, who shows in a formidable array of figures that if we grant the Irish people Home Rule it will not cost us more than a penny in the income-tax, and that the incidence of taxation in Ireland is double what it is in Great Britain, and must be lightened. The other political articles in the Nineteenth Century are, "the Caucus and its Critics," a vigorous reply by Mr. F. Schnadhorst to Mr. Marriott's unwise article in the previous number, "Theory of Political Epithets," a characteristic paper by Mr. G. J. Holyoake, bearing upon Parliamentary manners of the present day as well as upon the ethics of controversy generally; and "Civil Service Examinations," by Mr. W. B. Scoones, relating rather to the machinery of political Government than to party politics. In the Contemporary we find no other political article, unless the paper on "South Africa," by Sir D. Wedderburn, M.P., can be classed under that head. It is an interesting sketch of scenery, travel, and social life, and only incidentally bears upon vexed questions of politics.

Theology is not strongly represented in either number. In the Nineteenth Century the chief article is the very valuable paper by Professor Monier Williams on "Muhammad and His Teaching," which in a brief space gives a great amount of most interesting information, and is characterised by a liberal spirit towards the greatest of the non-Christian religions. The writer comes to the conclusion that "a vast moral chasm must ever separate Muhammadanism and Christianity—an impassable gulf which is never likely to be bridged over." Singularly enough, he adds that "a strict Trinitarian Christian would at the present time have less difficulty in coming to terms with Hinduism than with the religion of Muhammad." The reason is obvious. Notwithstanding "the monstrosities of Hinduism" and "its hideous idolatry," he "might find under its broad, all-receptive roof doctrines not out of harmony with his own fundamental dogmas of a Trinity in Unity and of divine Incarnation and Atonement." There is no reason to suppose that the learned Oxford professor is indulging in sarcasm at the expense of the most sacred dogmas of his Church, but it looks very much like it. The curious "Apologue" by J. H. Shorthouse, founded upon the chances of a game of cards, is a little difficult of comprehension, but its apparent object is to show that there is a power above the world by which Law is abrogated, and the apparent cause of its iron necessity is changed; but that it is after all an insoluble problem "whether Law is the result of Intellect, or Intellect of Law. In the Contemporary the Bishop of Carlisle contributes an elaborate paper on "Law, Physical and Moral," which we have analysed elsewhere. Professor Blackie discusses "The Greek Article in the Revised Version," maintaining that the translation is "largely disfigured by want of sense and want of taste," while it has done good service by bringing prominently before the public some dozen passages which were either liable to be misunderstood or whose force was weakened and obscured in the Authorised Version. In the article on "The War of Creeds in America," a non-resident American gives a rapid sketch of the controversy created by the appointment of Dr. Newman Smyth—the Robertson Smith of America—to the vacant theological chair of the eminently orthodox school of Andover. The American controversy, like the Scotch, as the writer well reminds us, "will not be a vain one if it teaches the churches the nature and necessity of progress in the comprehension and the methods of the presentation of divine truths," and he adds:—"It is far more important to gain this knowledge than it is to decide whether a certain presentation of the doctrine of the Atonement is logical or nebulous and poetical." Under the same heading we may group "The Pilgrimage to Kevlaar," a graceful poem by Emily Pfeiffer, suggested by an incident related by Heine; and, on account of its moral and social bearings, the useful paper by Ellice Hopkins on "The Industrial Training of Pauper and Neglected Girls." The remaining articles in the Contemporary are "Æsthetic Poetry—Dante Gabriel Rossetti," an appreciative criticism of the recent poet-painter, by Principal Shairp; "On the Conservation and Dissipation of Energy," a scientific essay by Professor Balfour Stewart; "The Turning Point of the Middle Ages," the first part of an historical essay by W. S. Lilly; and "Contemporary Life and Thought in France," by G. Monod, who holds in a tolerably even balance the pessimist and the optimist views.

The remaining articles in the Nineteenth Cen- ture are "The Proposed University of Music," a brief paper by Sir Julius Benedict, who begins with the gratifying observation that "there is no reason why, with certain favourable conditions, and a proper amount of energy, England should not become the first musical, as it is the first political, country in the world;" "The Climate of Town and Country," by Professor Frankland, who commands our entire sympathy in the warfare he is waging against the twin Smoke and Fog fiends; "Electric Light and Force," a scientific essay by Viscount Bury, who reports in a very striking way the latest achievements of the marvellous science of electricity; and finally, "A Note on Thought Reading," by Professor Donkin, an article which in comparison with the others seems to us but shallow trifling with a subject which has not even the merit of being amusing, and borders closely on the confines of mischievous folly.

Both the Reviews this month seem to be of very equal interest and value.

Short Notices.

The Entire Evidence of Evangelists and Apostles on Future Punishment and Immortal Life; with Critical Notices of Purgatory. Those who Sleep in Jesus, Gospel for the Dead, and Universal Restoration. By W. Griffith. (Eliot Stock, 1882).—This is the lengthy title of the second edition of a book not at all of the scholarly kind, the chief merit of which is that it strongly opposes the old dogma of Eternal Punishment, while advocating the theory of Conditional Immortality, and annihilation of the impenitent with which the names of the Rev. Edward White, R. W. Dale, S. Minton, and many other once orthodox divines are now associated. The second edition is greatly enlarged, and based on the Revised Version of the New Testament.

Beauties and Frights. By Sarah Tytler. (London: T. Fisher Unwin).—This is a second edition of a book of sketches of girls' lives, which we have already favourably noticed in these columns.

Bonnes Bouches; a Collection of Recipes of Choice Dishes of various Nationalities. By One who has Tasted Them. (London: Remington and Co., 1882).—This is a collection of receipts, collected in many countries, for the preparation of dishes, &c., of rather more recherché character than found in ordinary "cookery books. A clever cook could glean much from it, and, with ample material, could not fail to please the most fastidious. Perhaps the most useful portion of the book is a chapter on nursing, with special recipes adapted to the preparation of food, &c., for invalids.

The Magazines.

Frazer's Magazine continues the capital story of adventure on the sea, entitled "The Lady Maud." Principal Shairp brings to a conclusion his valuable historical sketch of St. Andrew's, under the title of "The Earliest Scottish University." There is a pleasant story of Italian life, entitled "Goneril;" and the veteran poet, R. H. Horne, contributes a long and powerful poem, entitled "Soliloquium Fratrís Rogeri Baconis." "Apollo the Fiddler" is a delightful paper, by Vernon Lee, on artistic anachronism apropos to Raphael's well-known picture. "Athenston; a Northern Sketch," is a pleasant description of rural life and scenery of the class made so popular by Mr. Richard Jefferies. The only remaining papers, which are of a graver character, are "The Lord of the World," a description of the Juggernaut worship, by Mr. W. Simpson, with illustrations of the hideous idol; and "The Irish Difficulty," by a foreign Liberal, who reasons strongly against repeal of the Union.

The Sunday Magazine has for its frontispiece, under the heading "Our Principal Contributors," a fine photograph of the Rev. J. G. Wood, the well-known naturalist and popular lecturer and essayist. George Macdonald continues his popular story "Weighed and Wanting," and Sarah Doudney begins a new story, entitled "What's in a Name?" which looks attractive. Among other contributions are "A Thieves' Supper," a striking account by Hesba Stretton of a recent meeting in Drury-lane; "Dr. John Brown," a pleasant sketch of the genial author of "Rab and his Friends," by the Rev. W. Dorling; and the always interesting "Sunday Evenings with the Children," by the Revs. Dr. A. MacLeod and B. Waugh.

The Magazine of Art has for its frontispiece "Prince Charlie's Parliament," the striking picture by Mr. W. B. Hole, A.R.S.A., exhibited at the Royal Scottish Academy this year. "The English Claude" is an illustrated sketch with a fine portrait of Richard Wilson, with two engravings. Among the other articles, all of which are exceedingly well illustrated, are "Canterbury Cathedral," by the Rev. Professor Bonney; "The Portraits of Francis I.," by Richard Heath; "An Ancient Picture Gallery," by A. S. Murray, who gives illustrations from vases, gems, and frescoes; "The Thames and its Poetry," by Andrew Lang; "Byways of Book Illustration: Jacob Oats," by Austin Dobson; and "Current Art," with engravings of some of the principal works in the Academy this year.

Good Words continues the two serial stories, "The Golden Shaft," by Charles Gibbon—a tale of Scotch life—and "Kept in the Dark," one of Anthony Trollope's wire-drawn love stories. Dr. Walter C. Smith gives a delightful sketch of "Dr. John Brown," with a good portrait. Mr. A. J. C. Hare continues his pleasant sketches of travel under the heading "Sicilian Days," describing Palermo and its neighbourhood. "Social Plagues" is an almost too life-like sketch by Professor Nichol of the multifarious correspondents who worry a busy man of letters. Among the remaining articles are two on different branches of popular science, "Recent Advances in Photography," and "Raindrops, Hailstones, Snowflakes," by Professor Osborne Reynolds. The recent numbers of this excellent periodical are hardly quite equal to the average.

Journal of the National Indian Association is noteworthy for the contributions from native writers. In the present number we have interesting and valuable articles entitled "An Explanatory View of Hindoo Customs," by J. N. Mitra; "The Spoilt Boy," a tale of Indian life by Tekchand Thakur; "A Legend of a Learned Hindoo Lady," translated from the Bengali; and "The Chandrat, or the New Moon Evening," by Rustum Ranina.

The Field Naturalist and Scientific Student. July. Manchester: Abel Heywood.—This is the second number of yet another addition to the now numerous magazines devoted to natural history, and one likely to compete excellently with those already in the field. On the whole, its contents are attractive to young naturalists, but the editor will do well to guard against occupying his space with dry-as-dust matter. The articles on pages 28-29 suggest the caution. We notice that the Rev. E. M. Geldart has contributed sparkling little bits to this and the first numbers.

Cassell's Family Magazine continues the two serial tales "No Proof," and "Was it Wise to Change?" Among other papers, all readable and instructive, are "The Englishman at Home in Paris," by a late resident; "Collecting Butterflies and Moths;" "Rowing for Girls," which is strongly recommended; "How to Pronounce Welsh Names," which gives a useful lesson for tourists in Wales on the apparently unpronounceable; "Vegetables as Health Preservatives," by the Family Doctor; "A Summer Camp Meeting in America," by Catherine Owen; and "An Egyptian Watering-place," by M. L. Whately, who cannot persuade us to go there just at present.

We have also received from Messrs. Cassell:—The Bible Educator, edited by Dean Plumptre, Part IV.

The New Testament Commentary for English Readers, edited by Bishop Ellicott, Part XXVIII. Cassell's Illustrated Universal History, Part X. The Family Physician, Part XXX.; and Foxe's Book of Martyrs, Part I. of a reissue of the handsome illustrated edition of an unhistorical and sectarian work.

Literary Notes.

A POLITICAL journal in the Arabic language has been started in Paris. Its title is Kubek-el Cherg (the Morning Star).

Dr. W. G. WARD, formerly of Oxford University, and the author of the "Ideal of a Christian Church," died on Thursday week at Hampstead.

ARRANGEMENTS have recently been made by the Holy Synod of the Russian Church for the translation of the whole Bible and of several service-books into the Lettish and Esthonian languages by competent scholars.

THE death is announced of Dr. Ernst Anton Max Haas, Assistant in the Department of Printed Books at the British Museum. Dr. Haas, who was only in his forty-eighth year, was Professor of Sanskrit at University College.

We learn from the Unitarian Chronicle and Index of Belfast that a gratifying tribute has been paid to a minister of our body, the Rev. George Hill, late Librarian of the Queen's College, editor of the "Montgomery Manuscripts," and author of "The MacDonnells of Antrim" and "The Plantation of Ulster." Mr. Gladstone, in recognition of his literary services, has requested, in the most flattering terms, his acceptance of £200 from the Royal Bounty Fund. The communication is esteemed by the reverend and learned gentleman as conferring a higher honour, owing to the gracious manner in which it was made than the intrinsic value of the gift, unexpected as it was.

MESSRS. TRUBNER have just issued a new edition of Professor F. W. Newman's "The Soul: its Sorrows and its Aspirations," which first appeared in 1849.

An exhibition is now opened at Buda-Pesth, in the Academy of Science, of ancient Hungarian books and MSS. Here is to be seen the oldest known specimen of Hungarian writing, a "prayer for the dead," preserved in a Latin codex of the thirteenth century. Among the books are sixty-three from the celebrated library of Matthias Corvinus, including those restored by the late Sultan.

MR. PAUL TULANE, of Princetown, New Jersey, who made a fortune in business at New Orleans, has given £400,000 for the erection and endowment of a college in that city for teaching languages, literature, science, and art. Its benefits are to be confined to the white race.

PROFESSOR MONIER WILLIAMS has been elected an honorary member of the American Oriental Society.

MR. WALTER BESANT is stated to be the author of the clever novel, "The Revolt of Man," which was published some short time ago.

MR. SWINBURNE's new volume poem, "Tristram of Lyonesse, and other Poems," has just been published. The Academy says that it is dedicated, in a very touching sonnet, to Mr. Theodore Watts, written on the third anniversary of the day when the two went to live together at Putney. In his Songs to and about Children the poet strikes a new note which will, we venture to say, win back to him those early admirers who have not been able to follow him in all his later work.

DR. FORCHHAMMER, the son of the celebrated German Orientalist, has in the press at Rangoon a work on the old Talaing inscriptions. This work will be an important contribution to the history of the writings and spread of civilisation in ultra-India.

THE Parkes Museum is about to be removed from University College to premises more suited for the purposes of display and instruction.

OUR friend Miss Janet Humphreys is contributing a series of four interesting papers to All the Year Round on Thomas Bodley and the Bodleian Library.

BIRMINGHAM.—Mr. E. T. Russell, at present minister to the Leicester Domestic Mission, has been appointed to the post of Minister of the Church of the Messiah Mission to the Poor, Lawrence-street, in this town, vacated by the death of the Rev. John Wilson.

SUNDERLAND.—On Sunday, July 2, the annual sermons were preached by the Rev. W. H. Channing, B.A., who attracted large audiences to hear him, the chapel being well filled both morning and evening. Many were present from other churches in the town, and readily gave expression to the delight with which they had listened to the inspiring discourses. On Monday the annual tea and sale of work were held in the Mart, when a much larger company than was expected sat down to tea. At seven o'clock a public meeting was held in the chapel, but the attendance was discouragingly small. Mr. Channing was unable to remain for this meeting, but an excellent address was delivered by Mr. G. Lucas, of Darlington, on the works and influence of Dr. Channing. Resolutions of thanks to the preacher on the occasion, to visitors, to the ladies for their valuable services in connection with the tea and sale of work, to the choir, led by Miss Hemsley, and to Mr. Elliott, the chairman, were spoken to by Messrs. Councillor T. Johnston, J. Fothergill, G. S. Stirling, J. Street, J. Metcalf, James Watson, W. Potts, F. Brown and W. Hemsley. The certain result of these meetings will be to soften or remove prejudices against Unitarianism and to relieve the congregation from all debt.

Our Contemporaries.

THE SALVATION ARMY.

The Spectator, referring to the discussion in the Canterbury Diocesan Conference last week as to the possibility of co-operating with the "Salvation Army," writes:

Nothing seems to us more dangerous, or dubious in its moral character, than the attempt artificially to adapt the religious convictions and modes of expression which are most natural and appropriate to our own minds and natures, to the supposed, or even to the real, needs of multitudes in a very different state of mind. Where reserve is natural and fitting, the resolve to break through that reserve deliberately in order to become more useful, is far too apt to end in artificial mannerisms and even in insincere melodrama. May not the question what can it profit a man to gain the whole world and lose his own life, be appropriately so inverted in relation to this subject as to put it thus,—Whether it be possible for a man who loses in any degree the sincerity and simplicity of his own religious life, to gain either the whole world, or any substantial part of the world, to true religion, by that sacrifice of sincerity and simplicity? Can a man whose nature revolts against rant and religious parade, as something altogether incompatible with what is most spiritual, force himself, even for the good of others, to organise rant and religious parade, to really good effect? Is not the sacrifice of instinctive delicacy in these matters fatal to the genuine religious influence of those who do force themselves to sacrifice it? Must not ostentatious sensationalism in religion be left to those to whom it is, in some sense, really natural,—in whom it involves no sacrifice of instinctive delicacy? The false key-note soon makes itself audible, even to the multitude.

THE LORDS AND THE OATH.

Alluding to the debate in the House of Lords on the Duke of Argyll's Bill, the Times says that unbelievers—not, perhaps, of the aggressive type to which Mr. Bradlaugh belongs, but of that which is mildly called "agnostic," are not by any means so rare as the Archbishop of Canterbury seems to believe. If any such should be returned to a future Parliament they are not at all unlikely to make it a point of honour or of conscience to raise the question which the House of Lords has now done its best to force to a decisive issue. If the matter had been allowed to rest, they might have been content to take the oath in their own sense and say nothing about it, so long as no questions were asked. But now that they are told, on the authority of the House of Lords, that the oath is meant to exclude them, they will almost feel bound to protest against it. The constituencies, indeed, will probably force them to do so, not, of course, because the constituencies have any love for infidels as such, but because, as Lord Shaftesbury frankly said in the debate on Lord Redesdale's Bill, they have a growing dislike for tests and for all authority in matters of opinion. Thus the whole question is a good deal wider and more important than anything which merely concerns Mr. Bradlaugh. But even if it concerned Mr. Bradlaugh alone it would not be one to be lightly treated. It cannot be left in its present state. It is at least as inconvenient that the law should exclude a particular individual—which is all that it does or can do at present—as that it should be altered in order to admit a particular individual. No constituency will be deterred from electing an infidel for its representative by the fact that Mr. Bradlaugh is not allowed to take his seat. What the House of Lords has really done, therefore, is to demonstrate the futility of any attempt to remove by legislation the difficulty created by Mr. Bradlaugh.

NATURAL RELIGION.

The Literary World, reviewing the new work by the author of "Ecce Homo," writes:—

Science—this is the drift of the book before us—has disproved the supernatural. Existing creeds, therefore, and the Bible itself, have become "archaic in form." They remain true only in "substance or as presenting grand outlines of truth." But science might be reconciled to them if the necessary modification were made in the mode of their acceptance.

"Both the Old Testament and the New," says the author, "lose that appearance of obsolescence which ecclesiastical formalism has given them, and stand out as true sacred books and classics of mankind, so soon as in the former Nature is written for God, and in the latter Humanity for Christ." We are hardly entitled to say that the author for himself, and as an expression of his own belief, would substitute Nature for Jehovah, and Mr. Harrison's elaborately extolled Humanity for Christ. On this point we decline to pronounce. What admits of no dispute is that he believes science to insist upon such concessions, and that he thinks them not too high a price to be paid to induce men of science to co-operate in establishing the Church of Civilization. Here, then, we take our stand. The obstacle at which we have arrived is formidable enough to defeat the whole scheme. Not only the clergy of all denominations, but the entire body of those who worship God in England, would shrink with positive horror from the alterations proposed. They do not worship nature, but God; they do not worship humanity, but Christ. If it were conceivable that such a Church as this author dreams of should be set up in our island, the first result would be an exodus therefrom of every religious man, woman, and child in England. How many Comtists and men of science would remain in it we shall not undertake to say, but our firm persuasion is that they could cross the Channel in a very small ship. The whole project melts away like the fabric of a vision.

But many of the suggestions contained in this volume may be of use to religious persons, and especially to the ministers of our various denominations, as enabling them to realise the position in which they stand to men of scientific culture, and to apprehend what it is in the knowledge and experience of the age that may be advantageously combined with the religion they preach. The author insists much upon what we acknowledge to be a highly important truth—namely, that religion is not an inorganic thing, crystallised or congealed once for all, and henceforward immutable, but a living thing and a growing thing. "If the Eternal revealed Himself," he says, "between Moses and Christ, surely He has not ceased to reveal Himself since the time of Christ." Certainly not. The Christianity of the present day ought to be wider than the Christianity of the early ages. But we maintain that Christianity and religion can never develop, can never genuinely grow, into a denial that God is alive, into a belief that Christ has passed into annihilation. Such a development is like that of very old and dying trees. They put forth a few green leaves, they have bark that seems to cover solid trunks; but they are hollow, they have no pith; when the wind blows strongly, they fall and reveal the deception.

WILLIAM GEORGE WARD.

The Spectator writes:—

On Thursday, July 6, there died at Hampstead one of the most notable of the Anglican seceders who followed Dr. Newman to Rome,—one who was degraded by the University of Oxford for his Romanising views, and whose book, on "The Ideal of a Christian Church," was formally condemned there. "Ideal Ward" was, consequently, his Oxford nickname; "Squire Ward" was his title in the Isle of Wight, where he had estates; "Dr. Ward" was the description by which he was best known to the Catholic theologians; while his friends knew him simply as Mr. Ward. Oddly enough, each of the names applied to him by comparative strangers represented something really characteristic in him, and something also that was almost the very antithesis of that characteristic. There was an ideal element in him, but much more that was in the strongest sense real, not to say realistic. There was something in him of the bluff and sturdy manner of the English Squire, and yet nothing was more alien to him than hunters, hounds, partridges, and stubble fields. There was a good deal in him of the theologian and the doctor, but yet any one expecting to find the rarified atmosphere of philosophical and theological subtlety would have been astonished to find how substantial, not to say solid, theological and philosophical propositions became in his hands.

For many of the latter years of his life Mr. Ward had the opportunity of comparing his own deepest convictions with the convictions, or no-convictions, of many of the ablest doubters of the age. He was one of the founders of the now deceased Metaphysical Society, where he met Anglican Bishops, Unitarians, sceptics, physicists, journalists, all sorts of thinkers, on perfectly equal terms; and probably no one among them knew what he thought so well, and made it so distinct to his brother metaphysicians, as Mr. Ward. There, indeed, he was "Dr." Ward, and his position as a Doctor of Theology, with a degree conferred by Pio Nino, gave him a position hardly inferior in professional weight as an authoritative Catholic divine to that of Cardinal Manning himself. And no man in the Society was more universally liked. The clearness, force, and candour of his argument made his papers welcome to all,—for in that Society nebulosity was almost the rule, weakness chronic, and inability to understand an opponent's position, rather than want of candour, exceedingly common. The present writer well remembers the dismay Dr. Ward caused amongst the Experience School of philosophy by a paper on "Memory," in which he maintained that unless you had at least one intuitive faculty, unless you had an absolutely intuitive certainty that the absolute asseverations of memory were indisputably true asseverations, not only the experimental philosophy, but all philosophy, all coherent thought, becomes impossible at once:—"You are hearing at this moment," he said, "the last word of the sentence, but how do you know the other words of which it is composed? Simply by remembering them." "Unless you assume that memory is to be trusted, you cannot understand the meaning of a single sentence which is uttered; nay, you cannot so much as apprehend its external, bodily sound." That fell like a bombshell among the antagonists of intuitive certainty. And yet no one took more pains to understand the school of Mr. John Stuart Mill, or received more full recognition from that school, as meeting their philosophy fairly, and face to face, than Mr. Ward. From the time, indeed, that he ceased to become a regular attendant at the Metaphysical Society, the Metaphysical Society began to lose its interest, and to drop into decay. Such was the attractive power of at least one strong and definite philosophical creed.

It is well known that Mr. Ward, though an ardent disciple of Dr. Newman's, did not in his later years belong to the same school of ecclesiastical thought. Indeed, he was amongst the strongest of the so-called Vaticanists, as it was natural he should be; while Cardinal Newman belonged to the school which dreaded premature definition, not to say even over-definition. But it would be a great mistake to suppose that Mr. Ward did not up to the last cherish the deepest admiration for his old leader, which, whether in public or in private, he hardly found enough opportunity to express. His mind, indeed, was one of the most modest, as well as of the most grateful to those from whom he had learned anything, with which the present writer ever came in contact; and to Cardinal Newman Mr. Ward always seemed to feel that he owed his intellectual life. To represent him as in any sense estranged in spirit from his old master by his ecclesiastical differences of opinion, is one of the greatest blunders which have ever been current in the theological world. His friendships were unusually deep and tender, and the tenderness of his love for Dr. Newman is a matter of which all his friends had the fullest and the most absolute knowledge. To not a few in various communions his friendship will be a very great and keenly-felt loss. For ourselves, we cannot but wonder whether Mr. Ward's theological beliefs are more or less definite now than they were a few days ago. We suspect less definite.

THE HIBBERT LECTURES.

The Jewish Chronicle writes:—

The publication last week of Professor Kuenen's Hibbert Lectures may be almost said to mark a development in the general religious tone of educated society in England. The Professor, as our readers will remember, presides over the theological faculty of Leyden University, and represents a school of students who apply to religion and its history the rigid laws of scientific criticism. The subject selected for the course that has just been published was the development of Judaism, with an introductory lecture on Islam, and concluding ones on Christianity and Buddhism. The scientific temper of the volume, although it may not prove satisfactory to the orthodox, will in itself be no matter for surprise to any person acquainted with the progress made of late years by Continental professors of theology. Another fact to which attention is called on the title-page of the new book must, however, have been regarded with astonishment by many of our readers when it was first brought to their notice some months ago. The lectures were delivered for the first time not in London, but at Oxford, where, in spite of some scattered evidence to the contrary, religious orthodoxy still maintains its ancient hold. The singular fact admits of but one inference. It shows that a truce, which may perhaps be the preliminary of a permanent peace, has for the time been made in that ancient seminary of learning between the representatives of science and religion. And the lesson thus taught ought not to be lost upon us. Whoever amongst us takes the cowardly view that religion is really endangered by scientific investigation must admit that Judaism, together with Christianity, is placed just now in a perilous position. But the truly pious can never take such a view. They know that science is incapable of weakening their faith, and to offer her resistance when she claims to subject religion to her scrutiny is to endow her with the fictitious strength that constant opposition is sure to evoke in even the weakest foe. Oxford is determined not to fall a victim to any craven fears, and has thus evinced a wisdom which we should feel satisfied to see followed universally.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Some time ago we recorded the withdrawal of the Rev. O. B. Frothingham from the presidency of this American association. The Christian Register now mentions the withdrawal of his successor in the following terms:—

The withdrawal of Dr. Felix Adler from the presidency of the Free Religious Association, and the reasons assigned for it, were not surprising to those who know Dr. Adler's enthusiasm for practical ethical work. He has outgrown his interest in an association which exists rather for the discussion of theoretical problems than for the settlement of practical ones. It is interesting to observe the different angles at which Mr. Frothingham and Dr. Adler took their departure from this organisation. Mr. Frothingham was profoundly engrossed by the religious questions, and, while he maintained his presidency, emphasised the religious aspect of the association's work. Professor Adler, on the other hand, sought to lay the emphasis entirely on the ethical basis—a position which we judge would not wholly have satisfied Mr. Frothingham. And now Dr. Adler withdraws, because he finds no answer to the question, "What living thing has emanated from the Free Religious ranks of this city for the past twenty years?" "Our religion," continues Dr. Adler, "must be a religion of life, and not of death. It must enter on some great work of benevolence, to show the spirit of religion." Dr. Adler's requirement is a very reasonable one. While we may differ from him concerning the value of religious discussion and religious ideas, we believe the test he has proposed is one which may well be applied to all religious organisations, Christian or non-Christian—not as the measure of their absolute value, but as the best practical criterion of their success. It is a test which was applied at the very beginning of Christianity, and which it has accepted with more or less fidelity ever since. Whenever it has departed from this philanthropic ideal, it has laid itself open to merited reproach. It is a healthful sign of the direction which religious development is taking in our time that unprofitable dogmatic tests are yielding to those which are spiritual and practical. It is demanded to-day that every church shall be good for something. A hearty union in working for the elevation of humanity is the broadest plank in that platform of fellowship which is independent of all creeds. While we feel confident that no philanthropic work which rests on a purely ethical basis can be as helpful as that which is united to an inspiring religious faith, we cannot fail to recognise the excellent practical work which Dr. Adler's society is doing in New York—a work which should provoke every languid, selfish Christian society unto similar good deeds.

"NATURAL RELIGION."

The Spectator, in an article suggested by the new work on "Natural Religion," by the author of "Ecce Homo," writes:—

The object of his new effort is to show that, apart from what he means by "supernatural religion," apart from all emotions excited by the belief in a God above and beyond Nature, apart from the emotions with which those who accept it regard miracle, apart from the emotions with which an immortal life for the individual after death is contemplated by the believer in that life, there exists a large class of constraining religious emotions which may be so powerfully excited by purely natural objects as to exert a very potent influence on life—a class of emotions, indeed, on the recognition and careful discipline of which the well-being of the human race practically depends. Nay, the author of "Ecce Homo" goes beyond this. He holds that there is something which may be properly called natural Christianity, as distinguished from the supernatural Christianity of the disciples of Christ; and he means by natural Christianity, the emotions with which men regard an ideal humanity, when they shape themselves, and endeavour to make their brother-men shape themselves, to a human ideal that is far above the rules and standards of any external law. The author of "Ecce Homo" is deeply convinced that not only do we throw away a very great reserve of power by branding as Atheists all those who do not confess a personal God communicating with men and hearing their prayers, but that we waste power by not admitting as distinctively Christian those who are always eager to enlarge and elevate the human ideal of character, and to judge human action rather by the sympathy of genius than by the cut-and-dried code of authoritative custom. It will be seen, then, that there is much in common between this able writer's position, so far as he expounds it in his new essay, and that of Mr. Frederic Harrison and the Positivists, who appear to mean very much the same by the religion of humanity as the author of "Ecce Homo" means by "natural religion" and "natural Christianity." Only, of course, to a writer who still asserts for himself the right to believe in a God beyond Nature, and in a life beyond this life, and in a Christ who, so far as this essay goes, may really be believed by its author to have risen from the dead, "natural religion" and "natural Christianity" represent only a minimum of belief which he may hope and expect to see growing into something larger, whereas the Positivists place it before us as the most of a faith which human nature can possibly attain, and quite as much as it ought to desire. Now, the author of the book on natural religion does not follow them in this. He evidently realises to the full how wide is the difference between natural and supernatural religion, and so far as we can judge, recognises to the full the superiority of the latter, though he thinks that it often falls into grave errors to which the former is not liable. Still, so far as the Positivist goes, the author of "Ecce Homo" goes with the Positivist. With the Positivist, he maintains that there is something which amply deserves the name of a religion in the emotions which may be excited, and ought to be excited, by the spectacle of the universe around us, even as viewed by one who finds in it no excuse for passing on through Nature to One higher than Nature, or for passing on through mortal life to an immortal life behind the veil, or for passing on through humanity to a realised ideal of humanity. The author of "Ecce Homo" seems to us content to find a natural religion in that which is neither natural nor religious—not natural, because, in spite of the paradox, it is in the highest sense natural to man to lean on something beyond Nature; not religious, because religion means something which is binding, something which we cannot in our hearts defy; and we can in our hearts defy any power which only threatens us with extinction, and does not threaten us with inextinguishable remorse.

WEST OF ENGLAND PRESBYTERIAN DIVINES (1665).—The 227th annual assembly of this body took place at George's Meeting, Exeter, on Wednesday week. The religious service was conducted by the Revs. W. E. Mellone, of Devonport, and W. Sharman, of Plymouth; the latter preaching the sermon from Ps. cccxxv. The usual business was then transacted and the funds distributed. It was also resolved to petition Parliament in favour of the "Oaths Bill." Mr. W. S. Mortimer was elected treasurer in the room of his late father, and the following resolution was, with much feeling, passed unanimously:—"That this assembly desire to record their deep sense of their loss through the death of their esteemed and highly honoured treasurer, Mr. W. Mortimer, and their vivid and affectionate remembrance of his bright talents, his keen and noble enthusiasm, his warmth and generosity of heart, his devotion to their interests as an assembly, and his devotion to reason and freedom in religion, his refusal by word or deed to contradict the clear conviction of his mind." Some conversation arose as to the means to be used for rendering the assembly more useful in future.

Correspondence.

THE THEOLOGISCHER JAHRESBERICHT.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Will you permit me, through your columns, to call the attention of our liberal theologians to what promises to be a useful undertaking, which has just been commenced here in their service? I refer to the Theologischer Jahresbericht, the first number of which has just appeared, edited by Professor Pünjer, of this University. The work is intended to supply a complete annual survey of all the principle theological works that have anywhere appeared during each year. In the Bericht before me for 1881 the whole of the literature reviewed has been divided into eleven sections, and each section has been assigned to a distinguished expert in his department. The names of a few of these reviewers sufficiently indicate the value of their notices, as well as supply a guarantee of the thorough independence of their position. Professor Siegfried reviews the Old Testament literature of the year, Professor Lipsius the dogmatic literature, and Professor Pünjer the philosophical literature connected with Theology, all three Jena professors, and men who have a name and fame in their respective departments. The literature of the New Testament is treated by Professor Holtzmann, and Church history has been divided into three periods, the first period having been allotted by Professor Paul Böhringer, the second to Professor Benrath, and the third to Dr. August Werner. Each expert not only gives a general account of the principal books he notices, but indicates the precise service to his branch of theological study which, in his opinion, it has or has not rendered. This is the special value of such an annual survey, by Fachmänner, which the student of Theology will be particularly thankful for. Of course, English theological works find their place in the Review, but as the undertaking is new there are naturally many omissions, which will, however, be filled up in future numbers. I have been glad to meet with a richly deserved incidental commendation of our friend Alexander Gordon's "excellent articles on the Socini in the Theological Review for 1879," by Professor Benrath. I may add that the price of the Review (pp. 389) is eight shillings.

J. FRED. SMITH.

Jena, July 4.

AGNOSTICISM.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Mr. Jeffery's letter in reference to Mr. Moncreu Conway conducting services appears totally irrelevant to Mr. Dalby's remarks.

Mr. Conway conducts services in the interest of humanity, and does not pretend, with the self-sufficiency of some who preach and write on such subjects, to know all about the unseen, nor does he make pretence of influencing a power supposed to be all good; to obtain fine weather for the harvest, good health for those who neglect Nature's laws, or moral strength for those who will not use the powers entrusted to them. Mr. Jeffery places great confidence in the efficacy of prayer; but is he aware that the average of life with sovereigns who are continually prayed for is of less duration than any other class of people? and the clergy who are constantly praying, and are supposed to lead holy and healthy life, do not appear to be—from statistics—specially protected.

When will men recognise true religion in the life rather than in words, and aspiration for purer thoughts far more valuable than any petition for extraneous aid?

July 10.

AN AGNOSTIC.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I was glad to see Mr. Jeffery's letter last week. If I did not mistake the drift of Mr. Dalby's letter, or what might certainly be taken to be the drift of it, it appeared to be quite right that his letter should be challenged. The question is none of charity or courtesy, but one of simple fact; and it would be altogether misleading to pretend to ignore the difference between Mr. Conway's position and our own. The Index writer saw this, and rightly noted it as a fact. We "call no man master," not even Dr. Martineau; but I have been recently re-reading the work, "Hours of Thought," vol. ii., which, whilst it is one of the latest, appears to me at any rate to be also one of the ripest in wisdom, of the writings coming from that gifted mind; and I have been again impressed by what I must regard as its pronounced conservatism. Especially would I, in regard to the matter in hand, refer to the discourses, "Christ the Divine Word," and "The Prayer of Faith:" the last so peculiarly valuable in an age of scientific dogmatism like this. And this volume might, I presume, be taken as somewhat representative of the general faith of the Unitarian Church. There is simply a great gulf separating the writer of it from the agnostic. Whilst recognising that we have an advanced party, it is, on the other hand, impossible not to recognise, as it appears to me the late Dr. Raleigh did recognise, the growing sympathy between at least a section of us and the more liberal wing of the Evangelical Churches. The Index writer got unreasonably angry, but he at least accepted facts as such.

Hastings, July 12.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—My letter to the Inquirer, to which Mr. Jeffery refers, was merely a statement of facts tending to show that Mr. Conway is admired, esteemed, and sought as a co-worker by many Unitarians in this country. These facts Mr. Jeffery does not dispute, and I fail to perceive the relevancy of the theoretical questions which they appear to have suggested to him. However, as the questions are put to me, I can only say in reply, that as Mr. Conway has conducted religious services in several Unitarian chapels in the provinces, and I have only heard him in one, I am not in a position to say what the general character of those services was. On that one occasion the service was similar to that which Mr. Conway conducts in South-place Chapel, and which Mr. Jeffery, who resides in London, has an opportunity (which many provincial Unitarians envy him) of attending any Sunday morning. On the few occasions when I have attended that service I have not observed any substantial difference between it and the services conducted in the same chapel by Mr. W. J. Fox thirty or forty years ago; and the soundness of that gentleman's Unitarianism is attested by the Rev. Robert Spears, whose interesting "Record of Unitarian Worthies" contains a highly eulogistic notice of Mr. Fox, a short extract from which may gratify some of your readers. It is not more appreciative than other parts of the article, but is chosen as having some bearing on the questions under consideration. The author of the "Record" says of Mr. Fox:—"The language of hope and aspiration—which neither hatred nor slander could stifle—was always on his lips. In his chapel public spirit and every manly aspiration were associated with religious duty, and taught us part of its principles. The down-trodden found in him a man who cared nothing for power or wealth, or church etiquette (the italics are mine)—but only that wrong-doing should be boldly confronted and justice done. To the anxious inquirer after truth he spoke no word of bitterness, but bade him be of good cheer and live manfully."

I beg to commend to Mr. Jeffery's attention the biographical sketch from which these words are taken, and the impartial testimony which it affords to the excellences of that phase of Unitarianism formerly represented by Mr. Fox and now by Mr. Conway.

G. B. DALBY.

July 10.

SOPHIA AND SOPHROSYNE.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—While fully in accord with the spirit of my friend Mr. Gordon's excellent address to the students of the Home Missionary Board, I can hardly agree with him if he is correctly reported as saying that "sophia (wisdom) is not altogether either, etymologically or practically, distinct from sophrosynē (self-control). Practically, no doubt, there is a close connection and mutual dependence between them, but etymologically, sōphron, of which sōphrosynē is the substantive, is compounded of the elements sao (whence soōs for saoos safe, sōzō, I save, &c.), kin to the sou of sound the sa of sanus, &c., and phron, the form assumed in composition by phren the midriff, and hence by association, the mind. Sōphrosynē therefore means "soundness of mind." Sophia and sophos on the other hand are kin to the Latin sapiens, and lead us to the root sap, of which the primitive meaning appears to have been "taste or 'relish.'" I do not see how the two meanings are to be brought together, nor are the former sufficiently close to tempt one to identify them. I cannot help thinking Mr. Gordon must have been inaccurately reported, for his personal accuracy on minutest points of scholarship is proverbial.

E. M. Geldart.

3, Denbigh-villas, Lower Addiscombe-road, Croydon, July 12.

CARDINAL NEWMAN AT HOME.

(From the Article in the Century by Mr. Kegan Paul.)

Above the dingy streets of Birmingham, and within short distance of the open, still wild and beautiful country, spread the broad roads of Edgbaston, with their wide gardens and villas, their shrubberies which sift the smoke, and in spring, at least, are bright with lilac and laburnum. The Oratory fronting one of these roads, within sight of thickets and sound of singing birds, is an imposing brick building, with spacious corridors and well-proportioned rooms within. Each Father has his own comfortable room, library, and bedroom in one, the bed within a screen, the crucifix above, and the prized personal little fittings on the walls. The library is full of valuable books, many of them once the private property of Dr. Newman, now forming the nucleus of a stately collection for the use of the community. The quiet men who share this home come and go about their several businesses—the care of the school, whose buildings join, but are separate from the Oratory proper, the work in the church, in hearing confessions, saying Masses, and preaching. In the house the long soutane and biretta are worn; to go abroad they wear the usual dress of the clergy in England. Perhaps it is the dinner hour, and the silent figures pass along the galleries to the refectory, a lofty room with many small tables, and a pulpit at one end opposite the tables. At one of these sits the superior alone, clad like the rest, save the red lines of his biretta, which mark his Cardinal's rank. But among his children, and in his home, he is still more the superior and the father than a prince of the Church. At a table near him may perhaps be a guest, and at others the members of the community, two and two. The meal is served by two of the Fathers, who take this office in turn, and it is only of late that Dr. Newman has himself ceased to take his part in this brotherly service, owing to his advanced years. During the meal a novice reads from the pulpit a chapter of the Bible, then a short passage from the life of St. Philip Neri, and then from some book, religious or secular, of general interest. The silence is otherwise unbroken save for the words needful in serving the meal. Toward the end, one of the Fathers proposes two questions for discussion, or rather for utterance of opinion. On one day there was a point of Biblical criticism proposed, and one of ecclesiastical etiquette (if the word may be allowed), whether, if a priest called in haste to administer extreme unction did so inadvertently with the sacred oil set apart for another purpose instead of that for Unction, the act were gravely irregular. Each gave his opinion on one or other of these questions, the Cardinal on the first, gravely, and in well chosen words. Yet it seemed to the observer that while he no doubt recognised that such a point must be decided and might have its importance, there was a certain impatience in the manner in which he passed by the ritual question and fastened on that proposed from Scripture. After this short religious exercise the company passed into another room for a frugal dessert and glass of wine, since the day chanced to be a feast, and there was much to remind an Oxford man of an Oxford common room, the excellent talk sometimes to be heard there, and the dignified unbending for a while from serious thought.

Dr. Newman once took great delight in the violin, which he played with considerable skill. Even now the Fathers hear occasionally the tones awakened by the old man's hand ring down the long gallery near his room, and know that he has not lost the art he loved, while he calms a mind excited from without, or rests from strenuous labour in the creation of sweet sound. He is still a very early riser, punctual as the sun, still preaches often with what may be best described in words he has applied to St. Philip, "thy deep simplicity."

The Cardinal has of late been engaged on a careful revision, in the light of modern researches, of his translation of St. Athanasius, with notes of some treatises of St. Athanasius against the Arians. He regards this as the end of his life's work—a life which is now appreciated and honoured not only by his spiritual sons, but by all fair-minded men of English speech.

May he long remain in the possession of bodily ease and intellectual vigour! Long may it be before any life of him has to be written! Till that day comes, when his loving friends shall gather such private letters and memoranda as he may have desired should be given to the world, he who would speak of Cardinal Newman is bound, whatever his sources of information, to trench but little on any but published matter. One paper, however, may be given which has not yet seen the light. The following memorandum was written in answer to an inquirer, who wished to know the Catholic view on certain subjects, not in themselves the most important, but which were at the time of interest to him, and each of which answered incidentally several other questions of the same sort. With these few words of explanation the following paper explains itself:—

"Very little has been formally determined by the Church on the subject of the authority of Scripture further than this, that it is one of the two channels given to us by which the salutaris veritas and the morum disciplina (in the words of the Council of Trent), which our Lord and His Apostles taught, are carried down from age to age to the end of the world. In this sense Scripture is the 'Word of God'—i.e., the written Word.

"There has been no formal definition on the part of the Church that Scripture is inspired.

"It is defined that Almighty God is auctor utriusque Testamenti. I do not know of any definition that He is auctor omnium librorum which belong to each Testament.

"But it is not to be supposed that, because there is no definition on the part of the Church that Scripture is inspired, therefore we are at liberty at once to deny it.

"1. First, St. Paul's words cannot be passed over omnis scriptura divinitus inspirata.

"2. Next, the very strong opinion on the subject of the early Fathers must be taken into account.

"3. Thirdly, the universal feeling, or φρόνημα, of the Church in every age down to the present time.

"4. The consent of all divines, which, whatever their differences on the subject in detail, is clear so far as this—viz., that Scripture is true. This, when analysed, I consider to signify this, viz.—'Truth in the sense in which the inspired writer, or, at least, the Holy Ghost, meant it, and means to convey it to us.'

"Thus, though it be not proposed to 'us by the Church de fide that we should accept the doctrine of the inspiration of Scripture, only that we must accept all the Church teaches us to be in Scripture and teaches us out of Scripture, yet it is a matter of duty, for the first reasons I have given, not to encourage, to spread, or to defend doubts about its inspiration.

"As to the extent of its inspiration, I do not see that the Council of Trent speaks of it as the authoritative channel of doctrine in other matters than faith and morals; but here, besides the four considerations above set down, I would observe that it is often a most hazardous process to attempt to enunciate faith and morals out of the sacred text which contains them. It is not a work for individuals. At last it has been felt and understood that faith and morals are not involved in a doctrine which Scripture seems to teach, that the earth is fixed and the sun moves over it. The time was necessary to ascertain the fact—viz., that the earth does move, and therefore that the Divine Spirit did not dictate these expressions of Scripture which imply that it does not, rather that He did not mean to convey that notion by these expressions.

"As to the questions you put to me, I do not see anything in the text of Scripture which obliges us, or even leads us, to consider the six days of Genesis i. to be literal days.

"The literal accuracy of the history of Jonah, or that of Elisha, rests upon a different principle—viz., whether miracles are possible, and to be expected. I see no difficulty in believing that iron, on a particular occasion, had the lightness of wood, if it is the will of God in any case to work miracles

—i.e., to do something contrary to general experience. And while I say the same of Jonah and the whale, I feel the additional grave and awful hazard how to attempt to deny the history without irreverence toward the express teaching of the incarnate God."

It would ill become me to dare to pronounce a critical judgment on Dr. Newman, except so far as such judgment is involved in any account of the man and his works. The scales of comparison at the disposal of the writer are too small to weigh and judge so great an intellect, such deep learning, such subtle literary skill, as is possessed by Cardinal Newman. I can only say that during the last few months I have re-read a very large part of what he has written, always with fresh admiration, and even wonder.

One word, however, may be permitted of Cardinal Newman, considered as a poet, in addition to what comes out incidentally in the foregoing sketch. If I have said nothing hitherto of his poetry, it is not that I am not unmindful of it. Who can forget that the lyric "Lead, Kindly Light," has found its way into almost every hymnal? Who can ignore the wonderful "Dream of Gerontius," in which the peaceful and beautiful side of the doctrine of purgatory is presented to all who can receive it? His poetry, however, is to be found chiefly in the beautiful thoughts scattered through his prose rather than in the form of verses. These have been the lighter flowers of his literature, and, graceful as they are, are not those by which he is to be judged.

We suspect, however, that few who know the gravity and greatness of such a mind would have been prepared for the flower of religious fancy which broke forth in his "Valentine to a Little Girl":—

"Little maiden, dost thou pine
For a faithful Valentine?
Art thou scanning timidly
Every face that meets thine eye?
Art thou fancying there may be
Fairer face than thou dost see?
Little maiden, scholar mine,
Wouldst thou have a Valentine?

Go and ask, my little child,
Ask the Mother undefiled:
Ask, for she will draw thee near,
And will whisper in thine ear:
'Valentine! the name is good;
For it comes of lineage high,
And a famous family:
And it tells of gentle blood,
Noble blood,—and nobler still,
For its owner freely poured
Every drop there was to spill
In the quarrel of his Lord.
Valentine! I know the name;
Many martyrs bear the same,
And they stand in glittering ring
Round their warrior God and King,—
Who before and for them bled,—
With their robes of ruby red
And their swords with cherub flame.'

Yes! there is plenty there,
Knights without reproach or fear,—
Such St. Denys, such St. George,
Martin, Maurice, Theodore,
And a hundred thousand more,
Guerdon gained and warfare o'er
By that sea without a surge.

And beneath the eternal sky,
And the beauteous Sun
In Jerusalem above,
Valentine is every one;
Choose from out that company
Whom to serve, and whom to love."

THE pulpit of the Stockton-on-Tees Chapel will be vacant at the end of September, the Rev. Hubert Clarke having resigned.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Weary of life. Derangement of the liver is one of the most efficient causes of dangerous diseases and the most prolific of those melancholy forebodings which are worse than death itself. A few doses of these noted Pills act magically in dispelling low spirits and repelling the covert attacks made on the nerves by excessive heat, impure atmospheres, over-indulgence, or exhausting excitement. The most shattered constitution may derive benefit from Holloway's Pills, which will regulate disordered action, brace the nerves, increase the energy of the intellectual faculties, and revive the failing memory. By attentively studying the instructions for taking these Pills, and obediently putting them in practice, the most dependent will soon feel confident of a perfect recovery.

Religious Intelligence.

PRESBYTERY OF MUNSTER.

The annual meeting of the United Presbytery (or Synod) of Munster was held on the 5th inst., at Stephen's-green, Dublin. The religious service was introduced by the Rev. D. D. JEREMY, M.A., and the sermon was preached by the Rev. W. WHITELEGGE, M.A., of Cork, from John iv. 24, "God is a Spirit, &c." The concluding portion of the sermon, having an historical reference, may be interesting to our readers, and which we therefore subjoin:—

This, then, I take to be in religion the one thing needful to worship God the Spirit in Spirit, and this, too, I claim to be, and to have been for generations, the leading feature of our Non-subscribing Churches. True it is we have not in this our little group of congregations been in the popular sense successful. We now number far fewer members than we did two or three generations ago, and so far as statistical tables can prove it we have gone down and our glory is departed. But there are some facts impervious to statistics and of infinitely deeper moment than arithmetic can reach. What these are I need not recapitulate after having dwelt so long on the subject of my text. Who can number the hearts which the spirit has touched and kindled into flame with a live coal from the altar? And who can number the hearts which, though outwardly belonging to the Church, the Spirit of God has failed effectually to reach, and which remain as cold and hard—as worldly, and as narrow in their sympathies and antipathies—as remote from the spirit as mere formalists and lip-worshippers can possibly be? No man can! And therefore the value, the vitality, the real success of a church cannot be gauged in the figures of arithmetic—they cannot be estimated by mortal man—they can be known only to Him who searcheth the heart, and from whom no secret is hidden. The influences, too, flowing from our Free Churches in this land must be looked for not exclusively within the walls or the immediate locality of those buildings. If we should seek to form an estimate of our free teaching of Christianity—which I repeat defies arithmetic—we should take into our calculation the vast numbers, who, in the course of successive generations, having been spiritually trained in our little communities, emigrated in early manhood to remote quarters of the globe—bearing with them the precious seed of the word and sowing beside many waters. This we all know to have been frequently the fact in our own day and in our own congregations.

What it has been in the generations gone by may be inferred from the following little episode—long familiar to myself—of which I was reminded a few weeks ago by the gifted representative of American Unitarianism—the Rev. Dr. James Freeman Clarke. In the introduction to his sermon, preached before the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in London, he said:—"When I was a boy I had the range of an old library in a country house near Boston, in the United States. . . . The library belonged to my grandfather, James Freeman, the first openly avowed Unitarian minister in the United States. He was an unordained reader in the King's Chapel, Boston, the first Episcopal church established in New England. He was converted to Unitarianism chiefly by intercourse with Mr. Haslitt, an English Unitarian minister who paid a visit to the United States, bringing with him a bright eyed boy, afterwards so well known as the essayist. James Freeman announced his new convictions to the proprietors of King's Chapel, of whom the most orthodox, being Tories, had left the country during the Revolution, and those who remained agreed to reform their Liturgy by leaving out all allusion to the Trinity. Thus the first Episcopal church in New England became the first Unitarian church in the United States, and it has continued to be Unitarian down to this day.

Now, to apply this interesting statement and to show its relation to my subject—the Mr. Hazlitt described by Dr. Clarke as an English Unitarian Minister was, more accurately speaking, an Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Minister, born at Shronehill, co. Tipperary, in the year 1737. He graduated in arts at the University of Glasgow, and after some years' ministry in England settled at Bandon, co. Cork, in 1780, and became a member of the Presbytery of Munster. During his stay at Bandon he exerted himself on behalf of some American prisoners confined in the neighbouring town of Kinsale, and his manly and vigorous remonstrance against the cruelties exercised towards them by the English soldiers produced a marked improvement in their condition. His own condition meanwhile among the rampant Tories of Bandon was rendered extremely unpleasant. The consequence was that at the close of the war he emigrated to New York. His humanity had preceded him, and he was received with enthusiasm. The Assembly of the States General sent a deputation to invite him to preach before them. He stayed at Philadelphia fifteen months, and delivered a course of lectures on the "Evidences of Christianity" in the college. His heterodox opinions prevented his settlement at Boston as a minister, but in a short time he was instrumental in forming the First Unitarian Church in that town. During his stay of four or five years he published various tracts in support of Unitarian principles, and prepared the way for the shortly subsequent exertions of the banished patriot, Dr. Joseph Priestley.

Now, here we have exemplified, in a very noteworthy instance, the influence put forth by our small body, the Presbytery of Munster. As clearly as cause and effect can be traced in the physical world—as clearly as any historical consequent can be evoked to its antecedent—so undoubtedly can the Presbytery of Munster lay claim to have been, in the person of William Hazlitt, the Tipperary boy, the Bandon minister, the Missionary Church to America, a century ago. And when we contemplate the results of that first planting of Unitarianism in the United States—when we call to mind the splendid galaxy of preachers, poets, philosophers and philanthropists bearing the Unitarian name—when we recall the names of Freeman, Ware, Tuckerman, Channing, Dewey, Bellows, Parker and Freeman Clarke, of Longfellow and Whittier, of Lowell, Everett and Emerson—we may be allowed to thank God and take courage, feeling that we are allied in historical as well as in doctrinal fraternity with a vast and growing Unitarian Church, whose roots are now deeply bedded in the free and fertile soil of America, and whose branches spread far and wide through all the English-speaking regions of the world.

LEIPZIG UNIVERSITY.

BY BISHOP JOHN F. HURST.

Within the last ten years Leipzig has gone well to the front again. As recently as 1860 it was in the far background. It was the central hearthstone of the highest and driest Lutheranism. But, through some strange force, it began, in the seventies, to enlarge its scope, to draw away strong minds from other universities, to throw off its rigid confessionalism, and to establish itself on the broad basis of general theological culture. So today it is, in theology, far ahead of Heidelberg and Tübingen, in the south. It throws Erlangen into the provincial ranks. It eclipses its nearest neighbour—dark, muddy, crooked, cobble-paved Halle; and, now that the elder giants of Berlin are gone, it is in advance of even that youngest and proudest of the great German schools. Three years ago, when the summer semester was drawing to a close, it was my opportunity to linger awhile about the precincts of the quaint main building and to drop in as a guest at now one and then another lecture-room, and spend an enchanted hour in listening to some of the newer men, who are making Leipzig the great thing it now is. One could not fail, however, to hear Kahnis, Luthardt, and some of the other men who stuck firmly to the old school before its transfusion of new life, and who themselves have been blessed with fresh youth by the touch of the latest men.

The old quadrangle is a busy place in the fifteen minutes' interval between the lectures. Every lecture begins a quarter of an hour after the even hours and continues three-quarters of an hour. So, when the clock strikes ten, or eleven, or any even hour, the doors fly open; the students and professors crowd out, pass each other rapidly, and spend the time, each in his own way, until the clock strikes the ended quarter hour, and then begins the lecturing of one hundred and sixty professors to the three thousand students. You cannot well resist the impulse to go up to the roster and see the last announcement. One is to this effect: "Herr Studiosus Friedrich Muth will deliver a lecture on Mark Twain. Place: the university cellar, Ritterstrasse, 43, I. Guests are welcome and need no introduction." Close by is a lunch stall—steaming coffee, many a link of literary sausage, beer in abundance, sandwiches, fruit, and whatever else can be caught up and eaten or drunk n a few hasty minutes. Even those sprightly swallows and sparrows come out of their little hiding-places in the nooks of the gables, and fly about in multitudes, as if no place on this broad earth were so dear to them as the gargoyles about those dusky Kreuzgänge of the old Leipzig University. I cannot think of their cheerful chatter and fickle wings without applying to them the words of the sad Jane Carlyle to a "Swallow Building Under our Eaves," now first brought out of her portfolio by Froude, and a picture withal of her long martyrdom:

Thou too hast travelled, little fluttering thing—
Hast seen the world, and now thy weary wing
Thou too must rest.

But much, my little bird, could'st thou but tell,
I'd give to know why here thou lik'st so well
To build thy nest.

For thou hast passed fair places in thy flight;
A world lay all beneath thee where to light;
And strange thy taste.

Of all the varied scenes that met thine eye—
Of all the spots for building 'neath the sky—
To choose this waste.

God speed thee, pretty bird; may thy small nest
With little ones all in good time be blest,
I love thee much;

For well thou manag'st that life of thine,
While I, oh! ask not what I do with mine!
Would I were such!

Fricke is reading on the Epistle to the Hebrews. He is lean and small, with bald head, thin, pale fingers, soft and gentle voice, and a certain monastic calm, as if he might have just emerged from a copying cell in one of Charlemagne's schools palatine. If I had not written this last sentence I should say there was something about him that reminded you at once of our Dr. Era Abbott, him of the "Bibliography of the Future Life," of the New Version, of Harvard, and of the wholescholarly world. You soon forget this slight man in the fervour of his speech. He does not spend his whole time (as Messner, of Berlin, would do) in philological trifles; but makes his text the framework for doctrinal statement. His real theme is original sin, with Paul's Hebrews as his means of illustration. Was Israel an unmitigated sinner? No. That people must be judged by its environments. There was a firm religious groundwork, and the formative force which came from it to Christianity will never lose its place of worth and power in our civilisation. A sense of historical injustice to the Jew seems to animate Fricke just here, and in the fire of the moment he raises his hands and brings them down again with a vehemence which makes one think of Luther, in his flight with Eck, in this same Leipzig, and in this same month of June, three hundred and sixty years ago. The hour strikes. No speech can hold the students. They screw up their inkhorns and soon are out of the room and the master's presence.

Leehler reads in the history of doctrine. He sits during the lecture, as, indeed, the most of the professors do. He has scant hair, an earnest manner, a clear voice, and a knotty, lumpy face. He wears a stiff white cravat, of the Old School latitude. His period is mediæval, and his work is a statement of the nature and validity of the sacraments. He traces with exquisite skill the [rise of the wretched view, away back in those days, that the sacrament can save, apart from any faith, love, and general religious sentiment of the participant and recipient. For a thorough handling of the schoolman's view of the saving efficacy of the sacraments it would be difficult to find a treatment of more grasp and strength than by Leehler. He just comes down upon it as if calmly pounding it into fine dust. He makes but little reference to the continuation of the fallacy in our days, but believes what he says concerning the Middle Age men. One cannot help reading between the lines the glance of his rapier towards the Oxford theology of the Newman time.

Luthardt is busy with ethics. He is something of a rhetorician, and still stands well at the outpost as a champion of advanced orthodoxy. His last ten years have been wearing on him; but he has still the same magnetic speech, enthusiasm, and hold upon his students. What is prayer? he asks. He who prays must keep his prayers together. It is often well to use the words of others; but, whether those or your own, the soul must bear the business in hand. He who prays in public must have the prayers of Scripture at command, and now and then use the words which have been his friends for years. Prayer is going to God, and then talking with him. It is selfish to go to him on set occasions only.

We must have stated times, when no just pressure is upon us; and then, when the occasion is grave, we go as to a familiar friend. Men ought to pray three times a day: in the morning, because of the new and uncertain day; at noon, when the heavy burden is on us; and then at night, when the hours are past and we need to thank God for helping us through all. Prayer is both conditional and unconditional. For some things we know our need, and that God wishes to give them; for others there must be the recognition of his good pleasure. Can we pray for the dead? Not strictly, for the relation to God is decided in this life. But why not? asks Luthardt. We give the body to the ground, and is it not natural that we commit the soul to God? Suppose we do consider the life as all over, is God displeased that we ask his blessing on the soul still? It may be hypothetical and problematical; but it is just one of those things in which we err on the safe side when we pray over our beloved dead. Very telling is Luthardt's way of showing that the Moravian conception of prayer is a mistake, in that it brings Christ so near as to leave the Father away; while that of the rationalist is just as far wrong, as it reverses the order. The whole Trinity must be invoked, at one and the same time, as equally near and operative in response to prayer.

When Luthardt finishes, you feel that you have been looking at a picture. He holds you from the first syllable to the last. He gives you time to think as he moves on and appeals to the heart as fully as to the understanding. The beautiful deep red rose which he held in his hand when he began his lecture has not once been laid down. It threatened to break or fall or lose some of its leaves now and then, in the fervour of the speaker; but it has escaped all accident and, now that the lecture is over, he carried it out with him.

Delitzsch the elder is getting aged. His hair is white and his voice weak. He reads closely and looks out of the window at intervals, as if to rest himself. His lecture is a picture of Jerusalem in the ancient times and its relation to the world. As a specimen of scholarly word painting his whole Vortrag is rich in the extreme. He seems to forget the new-and-old Leipzig where he is, and to be away back in the early days, when Jerusalem first lifted its head above the average Jewish village and began to gather to itself the spiritual forces which have made it what it is, or, rather, what it was. He is at home in its winding streets, describes the progress of the first temple and then the next, shows you the panorama of its tragic life, and introduces you, one by one, to the men who have ruled it by the sceptre of the sword or their thought.

The good and now declining Delitzsch has the rare fortune of seeing his son coming to take his place. Here he is, Friederich by name, in one of the smaller rooms, a brusque and plodding young man, working his way patiently toward the front. In style he is of the new generation, not clad in the traditional black, but in light grey, with hair parted in the middle of his round, full head, and cheeks aglow with burning health and enthusiasm. He is somewhat in his father's line of work, only more purely philological. His theme is Assyriology. He has his full manuscript before him, some terra cotta images and figures spread upon his table, and some old parchment sheets, full of inscriptions. These latter are for the students to look at and gather inspiration from, as object lessons by which to take hold of his text. Now and then he leaves his seat, and writes in the Assyrian characters on the blackboard, and as his students answer his searching questions. Only eight students constitute his audience; but then this is the way in which every German professor begins his work. He has only a voluntary group first, in some remote little room, and, if he does well and his company increases, he gets trusted more and more, and in time ascends to recognition and a regular appointment as Herr Professor Ordinarius. These years of discipline are a severe test. I have known of men who have grown grey as privatdozenten and never become anything else. Some are ground fine between the millstones of more popular workers; but others come out safely from the ordeal and have a life-long position of security and honour.

BIRMINGHAM.—A new organ of large size and excellent quality, built by Messrs. W. Hill and Sons, of London, was opened in the Church of the Messiah (the Rev. Dr. Crosskey's) lately.

A MODERN HINDU REFORMER.

(From the Atlantic Monthly.)

"Ten years ago the most influential religious teacher in India was Keshub Chunder Sen," said an officer in the English civil service to me, as we were crossing the Indian Ocean, and were waiting for our first glimpse of Bombay. Religious influence in India means as much as in Scotland. From the Himalayas to Cape Comorin religion of some sort holds undisputed sway. The power of England is not comparable to it. It was the mere suspicion, so it is generally believed, that their faith was about to be tampered with that aroused both Hindu and Mahomedan into such a frenzy of hate against the English that the mutiny of 1857 failed only through lack of leadership from becoming a successful revolution. The people of India are naturally religious. They have always been ready either to fight or die for their faith. The Ganges has been reddened as often as the Rhine with bloodshed in religious wars. On the great plains of India battles as cruel as Germany saw in her thirty years of War have been repeatedly fought. To-day, if there were no strong-handed Government to hold them apart, Hindu and Mahomedan would rush upon each other in the madness of religious hate, or burying their animosities for a moment in an intenser hatred, they would combine against their common enemy, the Christian.

For a teacher of religion, under thirty-five, to attain in such a country to a position of such marked prominence is a phenomenon. It is still more remarkable that this position was reached not by a leader of any of the old powerful religious parties, whether Hindu, Mahomedan, or Christian, but by the founder, or at least the acknowledged interpreter of a new religion, in a position more or less marked to each of these three parties. Keshub Chunder Sen is a disciple neither of Moses, nor Buddha, nor Zoroaster, nor Mahomed, nor Christ. He calls himself by none of these names. He is an apostle of the New Dispensation. He is the bringer in—so he believes—of a new epoch to India and humanity. Why may it not be? All the ancient religions were once new. They were all born in the Orient. India herself was the first to hear the infant cries of Sakya Muni, the first to heed his teaching, the first, too, to forget it. Why may she not even in the last half of the nineteenth century have given birth to another as great as the great Buddha himself? The hour is ripe. The old is passing away. Buddha is dead. Brahma and Mahomed are not revered as they once were. The Hindu laughs heartily with you over the hideous puerility of the idol worship from which he has just come, and to which he will probably tomorrow return. India has need of a new dispensation, and some fifty years ago a few of her leading spirits began to organise a reform, which has resulted at least in the establishment of a new church,—the Brahmo Somaj.

"At first," says Chunder Sen, "this Brahmo Somaj to which I belong was simply a church for the worship of the one true God, according to the doctrines and ritual inculcated in the earliest Hindu Scriptures." For the time the members of this Church held to the infallibility of the Vedas; "but," continues Sen, "the Brahmo Somaj, because it was the work of God, could not but break with the Vedas as soon as they were found to contain errors." The Brahmo Somaj, released from the nature worship and absurdities of the Vedas, became a pure theistic church, "the centre," says Sen, "of a moral, social and religious reformation." "In the Brahmo Somaj," he adds, "we see concentrated all those great, urgent and pressing reforms which India needs at the present moment. Is it the amelioration of the condition of women that India wants? Look at the Brahmo Somaj, and you see already are gathered in some of its chapels ladies who have discarded idolatry, superstition and caste altogether; who have learned to pray in their own houses unto the one true God, and have set their faces boldly against every form of polytheism and idol worship; and some of whom have published most beautiful theistic verses and hymns. Is it the distinctions of caste that are to be levelled? You see among the Brahmos a good number of valiant and brave men, who not only dine with men of all classes, irrespective of the distinctions of colour, caste and creed, but who have promoted inter-marriages between members of different castes. The high-caste Brahman has accepted as his wife a low-caste Sudra, and vice versa."

This monotheism is certainly immensely superior to the idolatrous worship which one may still see

"Before the flag of the new dispensation," cries this broadest of broad churchmen, "bow ye nations,

BIRTHS.

BLAKE—On May 19th, at Stanley, Falkland Islands, the wife of Robert Blake, Esq., of a daughter.

LAWFORD—On the 10th inst., at 80, Lansdowne-road, Notting-hill, the wife of Percy Lawford, of a son.

MARRIAGES.

PONDER—BROGDEN—On the 6th inst., at Christ Church, Highbury, by the Rev. E. A. Stuart, M.A., Vicar of St. James', Holloway, J. Edwin Ponder, of Brixton, to Harriet Frances, daughter of John Brogden, Esq., of Aubert-park, Highbury.

SMITH—WARREN—On the 5th inst., at Nottingham, by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., R. H. Smith, Professor of Engineering, Mason College, Birmingham, to Maria Crosby, daughter of J. Warren, Esq., Surveyor of the General Post Office for the North of Scotland, The Park, Nottingham.

DEATH.

PLIMPTON—On the 6th inst., at 23, Lansdowne-road, Clapham-road, Martha Plimpton, eldest daughter of the late Alexander Plimpton, of South Lambeth-road, S.W.

Our Calendar.

SUNDAY, JULY 16.

LONDON.

Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, at Little Portland-street Chapel, at 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M.
Rev. CHAS. VOYSEY, at Laugham-hall, 43, Great Portland-street. 11.15 A.M.
Rev. ED. EVERETT HALE, at the Free Christian Church,
Clarence-road, Kentish-town, at 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.

Annual Gathering of the Sunday Schools at Essex-street Chapel; Rosslyn-hill Chapel, Hampstead; and College Chapel, Stepney, at 3 p.m.

TUESDAY.

Annual Flower Show of the Window Gardening Society at the London Domestic Mission, George's-row, Lever-street, St. Luke's, at 3 P.M.

* * Notices of Sunday Services are inserted in this Calendar at 6d. a line, and of other Meetings and Service gratis, provided a detailed Advertisement appears.

SELECTED BOOKS.

Arnold's (T.) History of the Later Roman Commonwealth, 2 vols., 24/
Cook's (F. C.) Revised Version of the First Three Gospels considered in its Bearings upon the Records of our Lord's Words, &c., 9/
Didon's (H.) Science without God, trans. by R. Corder,
5/
Elphinstone (Hon. G. K.), Memoir of, by A. Allardyce, 21/
Ewald's (Dr. G. H. A. von) Commentary on the Book of Job, trans. by J. F. Smith, 10/6
Schiller's Mary Stuart, a Tragedy, trans. by L. White, 6/
Three-Cornered Essays, by a Middle-Aged-Englishman, 6/

Mr. WALTER MAWER, Sunday School Association Office, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C., will supply any of the above-named new books and new editions, at the prices named, carriage free, on receipt of Post-office Order, payable at the East Strand Post-office.

The Inquirer,

A Religious, Political, and Literary
Newspaper, and Record of Reverent
Free Thought.

ESTABLISHED 1842.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

One Copy for 3 months (13 weeks) (pre-	5s. 5d.
Ditto ... (not prepaid)	6s. 0d.
Ditto for 6 months (prepaid)	10s. 6d.
" " (not prepaid)	11s. 11d.
Ditto for 12 months (prepaid)	£1. 1s. 0d.
" " (not prepaid)	£1. 3s. 10d.

ADVERTISEMENT SCALE.

Up to and inclusive of first five lines . 2s. 6d.
 Each line afterwards 0s. 4d.
 For Six consecutive insertions, 25 per cent. less.
 For Thirteen " 50 "

All payments in respect of the INQUIRER are to be made to MR. WALTER MAWER, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C., to whom all Advertisements and Business communications should be sent.

All Letters and items of Intelligence intended for publication should be addressed "To the Editor of the INQUIRER," 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

WORK OF UNITARIANS IN THE PAST AND THE FUTURE. The Sermon Preached at the Annual Meeting, May 31, in Unity Church, Islington, by the Rev. Dr. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE. Price One Penny. Fifty copies will be sent, carriage free, for 3s.; one hundred for 5s. A large edition having been printed with a view to the widest possible circulation.

SERMONS, by ROBERT COLLYER. Cheap Issue. Price 2s.

POSITIVE ASPECTS OF UNITARIAN THOUGHT AND DOCTRINE. Cheap Edition, 1s.

TEXTS AND MARGINS OF THE REVISED NEW TESTAMENT. By Dr. G. VANCE SMITH. 1s.

A Cheap Edition of this work is now issued, price 3d.

Address, Miss C. PHILPOT, Bookroom, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London.

Just published, 8vo., cloth, 10s. 6d.

A SHORT PROTESTANT COMMENTARY on the Books of the NEW TESTAMENT: with general and special Introductions. Edited by Professors P. W. SCHMIDT and F. VON HOLZENDORFF. Translated from the Third German Edition, by the Rev. F. H. JONES, B.A. (in 2 vols.). Vol. I., Matthew to Acts.

Vol. II. will be published in the Autumn.

Subscribers to the THEOLOGICAL TRANSLATION FUND LIBRARY receive this Volume for 7s. Prospectus with Contents of the Series post free on application.

WILLIAMS and NORGATE, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London; and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

Fourth Edition, 487 pp. 8vo. cloth, price 7s. 6d.

SAMUEL SHARPE'S HISTORY OF THE HEBREW NATION AND ITS LITERATURE. With an Appendix on the Hebrew Chronology. By SAMUEL SHARPE, Author of the "History of Egypt."

WILLIAMS and NORGATE, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London; and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

MISS F. POWER COBBE'S NEW BOOK.

Just published. Crown 8vo. cloth, 7s. 6d.

THE PEAK IN DARIEN and other inquiries touching Concerns of the Soul and the Body. By FRANCES POWER COBBE.

WILLIAMS and NORGATE, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London; and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

A LADY can highly recommend a CONFIDENTIAL SERVANT as COOK HOUSE-KEEPER in a small family. A Ladies' Establishment preferred. Good references can be given.—Address, A. M., at Bindon House, Wellington, Somerset.

FOR SALE, at a moderate price, the last eight volumes (unbound, but clean) of the INQUIRER.—W. MAWER, INQUIRER Office.

ASSURANCE AGAINST ACCIDENTS OF ALL KINDS.
ASSURANCE AGAINST RAILWAY ACCIDENTS A ONE
ASSURANCE AGAINST FATAL ACCIDENTS AT SEA.
ASSURANCE OF EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

Railway Passengers' Assurance Company,
THE OLDEST AND LARGEST COMPANY, INSURING
AGAINST ACCIDENTS OF ALL KINDS.

The Right Hon. LORD KINNAIRD, Chairman.

Subscribed Capital, £1,000,000.

PAID-UP CAPITAL AND RESERVE, £240,000.

MODERATE PREMIUMS

Bonus allowed to Insurers after five years,

£1,700,000

HAS BEEN PAID AS COMPENSATION.

Apply to the Clerks at the Railway Stations, the Local Agents, or

64, CORNHILL,

or 8, GRAND HOTEL BUILDINGS, CHARING-CROSS, LONDON.

WILLIAM J. VIAN, Secretary.

THE XIXTH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY,
ADELAIDE-PLACE, LONDON-BRIDGE, E.C.
SHARES £10, Payable in one Sum or by Periodical Payments.

Directors.—Henry Waldemar Lawrence, Mark H. Judge, F. H. A. Hardcastle, Eliza Orme, George Palmer, M.P., Mary E. Richardson, and Henry Rutt.

This Society affords the means of investing money in large or small sums with complete safety at good interest. Interest on Shares 5 per cent. per annum, paid half-yearly. Deposits received at 4 per cent. Withdrawals up to £10 at three days' notice. Prospectus free of FREDERICK LONG, Manager and Secretary.

LONDON.—WEST-CENTRAL TEMPERANCE HOTEL, 97, 99, 101, Southampton-row, Russell-square.—Patronised and highly commended by the Rev. D. S. Govett, M.A., English Chaplain, Gibraltar; Rev. H. M. Holden M.A., St. Bartholomew's, Bradford, Yorkshire; Rev. Canon French, M.A., Killaloe, Ireland, &c. Central, quiet, exceptionally clean, moderate in charges. Visitors' Drawing Room. Breakfast or Tea, 1s. 3d. Beds from 1s. 6d. Printed Tariff Card on application.

FREDERIC SMITH, Proprietor.

MISS BOWRING, holding an Honour Certificate from Dublin University, and having passed Groups A and B in the Cambridge (Higher) Examinations, wishes to instruct Pupils, either personally or by correspondence, in English, French, German, and Latin. Seven years' experience in teaching. Good testimonials.—Address, 160, Bower-street, Maidstone.

LAW.—To articulated CLERKS intending to spend their last year in London. A Graduate of London, B.A., LL.B., admitted in 1864, will be glad to receive a gentleman for the last year or whole time of his articles. Personal assistance, if desired, for the Final Pass or Honours' Examination. Facilities can also be given for acquiring a good knowledge of short hand and English composition.—Address, X. Y. Z., care of W. Mawer, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C.

BOARD AND RESIDENCE, CROYDON.
—A Lady, residing with her brother, offers a comfortable home for a lady or two sisters or friends. Double bedded room. Terms, £1 11s. 6d. each. References exchanged.—Address, K. J. P., 77, St. James's-road, Croydon.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK.—Current Accounts opened according to the usual practice of other Bankers, and interest allowed on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £25. No commission charged for keeping Accounts.

The Bank also receives money on Deposit at Three per cent. interest, repayable on demand.

The Bank undertakes, for its Customers, free of charge, the custody of Deeds, Writings, and other Securities and Valuables; the collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the purchase and sale of Stocks and Shares.

Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued.

A Pamphlet, with full particulars, on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane.

THE BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY'S ANNUAL RECEIPTS EXCEED FOUR MILLIONS.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH, with immediate Possession, and no Rent to pay. Apply at the Office of the BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH, with immediate Possession, either for Building or Gardening purposes. Apply at the Office of the BIRKBECK FREE HOLD LAND SOCIETY.

A Pamphlet, with full particulars, on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane.

SEASONABLE DELICACY.

BROWN & POLSON'S CORN FLOUR

As Blanc-Mange, Custard, Baked Pudding, &c.

WITH

STEWED FRUIT

OF ANY KIND.

LONDON AUXILIARY SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

The ANNUAL GATHERING of the Schools will take place on SUNDAY NEXT, July 16, at Three o'clock p.m., in three Groups, as follows:—

At ESSEX-STREET CHAPEL:—George's-row, Stamford-street, Blackfriars' Mission, Notting-hill, Avondale-road, and East Surrey-grove, Peckham.

At ROSSLYN-HILL CHAPEL, Hampstead:—Kentish-town, Islington, and Newington-green.

At COLLEGE CHAPEL, Stepney:—Hackney, Spicer-street, Stratford, and Deptford.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION,
GEORGE'S-ROW, LEVER-ST., ST. LUKE'S, E.C.

The Window Gardening Society will hold its ANNUAL FLOWER SHOW on TUESDAY, July 18. Doors open at 3 p.m. Admission, from 3 to 6 p.m., Sixpence; from 6 to 8.30 p.m., Twopence.

A Meeting for the Distribution of Prizes will be held at 8.30 p.m. Admission free.

T. CHATFIELD CLARKE, Esq., in the Chair.

FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH,
CLARENCE-ROAD, KENTISH-TOWN.

The Rev. ED. EVERETT HALE, of Boston, U.S., will Preach in the above Church next Sunday Morning, July 16. Service: Morning, 11 A.M.; Evening, 7 p.m.

CROYDON FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

The members of this Congregation having determined to rebuild their church in accordance with the design issued with the INQUIRER of the 1st of July, desire to invite the contributions of former members and well-wishers residing at a distance.

Subscriptions will be gratefully received by the Hon. Treasurer, JAMES FAGE, Esq., of Addiscombe Lodge, Croydon, Surrey.

Amounts already received from members of the Congregation:—

	£	s.	d.
Five subscribers at £300 each	1500	0	0
Three " " £150 " "	450	0	0
Three " " £100 " "	300	0	0
Other amounts	150	0	0
Total	3810	0	0

WESTERN SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

The SECOND ANNUAL MEETING will be held at Gloucester, on THURSDAY, July 27. Proceedings to commence at Three o'clock with an Open Committee Meeting, to which all friends are invited.

JOHN BIRKS, Secretary.

HEATH BROW SCHOOL FOR YOUNG BOYS AND GIRLS.

Principal, Mrs. CASE.

Teachers for the Session 1882-83:—The Misses CASE and Miss E. F. SQUIRE; J. G. PRABER, B.A., Lond. (Classics and English); JOHN BRIDGE, M.A., Lond. (Mathematics); Mr. ARCH. BALLANTYNE (History and Literature); — (French); Mr. JOHN GUPPY (Chemistry); Mr. W. H. FISK (Drawing); Miss C. SQUIRE, R.A.M. (Music); Mr. WINTERBOTTOM (Gymnastics); Miss MARY BIRCH (Dancing).

THE NEXT TERM begins SEPTEMBER 20.

Heath Brow, Hampstead, London.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Mrs. HOOD will be pleased to receive a few GIRLS to board and educate. Special arrangements made for delicate girls during the winter months.—Address, care of the Rev. ALFRED HOOD, Bournemouth.

HIGH SCHOOL, STOKE GREEN, NEAR COVENTRY, established (1865) by the Rev. G. HEAVISIDE, B.A., of University and Manchester New Colleges, London, promotes a Liberal Education at a moderate cost.

BRENTWOOD, WORSLEY, near MANCHESTER.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal ... MRS. F. SHAWCROSS,
late of Brook House, Knutsford.

The NEXT TERM begins MONDAY, May 8.
For prospectus, apply to the Principal.

"THE FORT, MARGATE."—APARTMENTS in a well-furnished house, facing the sea, on moderate terms.
Address, Mrs. S'abback, Lansdowne Lodge, the Fort Margate.

BRIGHTON.—Apartments, with or without Board, at Miss Wood's, 12, Lower Rock Gardens. Three minutes from Madeira-walk and the Chain Pier.

Printed by WOODFALL and KINDES, of Milford-lane, Strand W.C.; and Published for the Proprietors by WALTER MAWER, at the Offices of the SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London, W.C.—Saturday July 15, 1882

The Inquirer.

A Religious, Political, & Literary Newspaper, & Record of Reberent Free Thought.

[REGISTERED AT THE GENERAL POST-OFFICE AS A NEWSPAPER.]

No. 2091.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 22, 1882.

[PRICE 5D.]

CONTENTS.

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:—

The Ministry of the Beautiful	469
England and Egypt... ..	470
Dr. Williams's Trust—XXXIII.	471
Natural Religion.—I.	472
"Theory of Political Epithets"	473
Leslie Steven's Science of Ethics.—III. ...	473

OCCASIONAL NOTES 475

REVIEWS:—

Land Nationalisation	476
Short Notices	476
Literary Notes	476

OUR CONTEMPORARIES 477

CORRESPONDENCE:—

Sophia and Sophrosyne	480
Holidays for Poor Town Children... ..	480

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE:—

The Liverpool Conference	480
The Annual Gathering of London Sunday Schools	481

THE LIBERAL PULPIT:—

Religious Phraseology	482
------------------------------	-----

UNIVERSITY INTELLIGENCE 483

THE MINISTRY OF THE BEAUTIFUL.

OUR hard logical Rationalism has not always, we fear, duly appreciated the ministry of the Beautiful in Art and Nature, in worship and in life. It has discountenanced appeals to the emotional nature, until it has almost forgotten that man is not a mere reasoning machine, but has deep and divinely implanted sentiments and emotions which touch him at the deepest springs of his being. It has asked in the spirit of a narrow and perverted form of Utilitarianism, "What is the use of Art? What is proved by poetry? What is the practical result of this much-lauded culture of the Beautiful?" And no doubt the extravagancies of some of the prevailing forms of æstheticism create a reaction on the part of sound taste and robust common sense, which on its side also has to be guarded against the "falsehood of extremes."

Yet the fact is not a little significant that it is in the most philosophical and sceptical book in the Old Testament, amidst utterances of almost hopeless despair and blank pessimism, we find that pregnant sentence, "He hath made everything beautiful in its time; also He hath set the world in their heart." There are evidences everywhere in the world of nature that the mysterious and beneficent power which is behind all its phenomena Himself delights in Beauty. He has spread out the heavens in such glorious array that even those who know but little of the astronomical laws of the universe are filled with reverent adoration at the wondrous sight, and see countless forms of beauty in everchanging clouds by day, and the spangled firmament by night. He has covered the earth with verdure of exquisite hue and texture, and both in the wild and majestic scenes of nature as well as in its softer and lovelier forms, constantly surrounds our path with richest materials of beauty if only we have the eye to discern and the heart to feel. The things that pass away and often seem of least use, material things, are themselves bound with silver cords and are made to be beautiful in their appointed time, and for their fitting function. Everywhere in this fair outward universe there are shapes and forms, and colours and sounds which are delightful and beautiful, and give us pleasure deep and strange, which can be accounted for on no utilitarian maxims; and the Spirit of GOD moving within us now as of olden times speaks to us as it did in the inspiring words of the Psalmist: "These fair scenes of nature please thee: do they not also please Him who made them? He that formed the ear, shall He not hear the song of birds? He that made the eye, shall He not see the colour of flowers? He that made us to rejoice in the beauty of the earth, shall He not rejoice in the beauty of His own works?" Yes, the Author of Nature, we may well believe, delights in His own works, in all the elements of beauty and magnificence, as well as of material use and bounty. He has spread in rich profusion over the earth, just as the painter delights in the pictures which he has drawn, as the gardener delights in the flowers he has planted, as a cunning workman delights in the curious machine he has invented.

Much more are things conformed to the same divine law of beauty when we ascend from the material universe to the moral and spiritual world. Here also do we not feel how essential it is that goodness should have an underlying grace and manifest loveliness as well as the deeper ethical qualities? There is infinite significance in the saying of the Psalmist, "worship GOD in the beauty of holiness," and for want of this element of character the Christian world has often failed to exercise the highest influence, and the peculiarly Evangelical virtues, as they are called, have not gained the love and reverence of many who are powerfully impressed by real goodness of life and character. There is a kind of awful severity in goodness of the ordinary ecclesiastical and sectarian type which repels instead of attracting people of the world. There are those who make their very virtues and charities unattractive, so devoid are they of the essential grace of goodness, while conscientiously desiring to do right. All that they need is to superadd to their excellent qualities the sentiment of the beautiful in life. Goodness ought to be a service of grace and gladness, possessed of a charm which shall attract even those who do not yield the unreserved homage of their hearts, because it is the service of One who Himself delights in beauty. A good and pure soul is always a beautiful soul, and the highest conception of beauty is not merely in outward and material form, but in the loveliness and grace of a complete, well-rounded and perfectly harmonious character.

We cannot travel along the path which is made luminous by the feet of CHRIST in this world, without being made to feel that Christianity and Art have been intimately blended and associated through all the victorious career of the Church. One effect of Christianity in the world has been the higher development of the beautiful in every direction—the beautiful not only in character and life, which is its highest form, but in Art and Poetry, Music and Painting, Architecture and Sculpture. Some of the noblest works of genius are those which have been produced through the inspiration of the religious sentiment. At first, in the earliest struggle of the Gospel with a seductive and all-encompassing idolatry, there was a strong and not unnatural reaction against Art. Poetry and Music, Painting and Sculpture had been closely associated with the corrupt forms of a fascinating polytheism, and in the light of a new and divine faith which inculcated reverence for absolute truth and goodness before all outward shows and attractive symbols, there was a natural tendency to discountenance Art, especially in connection with Religion. The early Christians in the outburst of new enthusiasm could not discriminate between the contents of the vase and the vase itself, and the result was that a rude iconoclasm took the place of loving recognition. Yet in spite of such a tendency, no sooner did the Christian religion become an established power in the world than it began to stimulate in its disciples the Art-tendency which is the love and recognition of the beautiful in outward form as well as in its inward essence. From that time forward the worship of Beauty more and more took possession of the Christian world, until the highest points which Art has ever reached are to be found in the Madonnas and Holy Families of the early mediæval ages, which our greatest painters are now repeating in still more spiritual form; in the stately churches and cathedrals, which we seem to have lost the art of building, in that magnificent Catholic worship which is mere show and mummery to the unsympathising Protestant or unbelieving observer, simply because he fails to comprehend the deep underlying facts and principles, or comprehending them, repudiates the faith they grandly symbolise. We cannot go back to the most sacred memorials of our faith without being made familiar with the various developments of Christian Art. And those influences will continue to act upon the Christian Church in a higher form even than in the past. The great minds that wrought out their sublime conceptions in form and colour are still working for us through the influence, on the imagination of their grandest works. Art culture, all the glorious tendencies towards the development of the Beautiful in its various forms are among the most prominent features of our age, and they rank high among its civilising and elevating forces. Art is beginning to recognise its grand religious mission, not to aristocratic and sacerdotal castes as in its earlier ages, but to the great common people. It recognises that it is to produce its noblest works, not for the palace or the temple alone, but for the homes of even the humblest toilers. Art is rightly aiming to elevate and adorn the household. Its tendency in these modern days is in the strictest sense of the word democratic. The progress of discovery and the cheapness of our manufactures are combining to bring rarest forms of grace and beauty within the reach of every ordinary household. We cannot too highly express our approbation of the laudable efforts of the Kyrle Society to encourage the love of the beautiful in the dimmest alleys of our great towns, and to promote the marked desire which is manifested even among the humblest to embellish their homes. It is happily within the power of everyone to have correct and beautiful copies of the master works of all ages. We need scarcely allude to so obvious a topic as the refining influence of the love of flowers—a culture of the beautiful which is within the reach of those who can hardly afford to adorn their humble homes even with cheap engravings of the master pieces of art. The little window gardens which are now so frequently to be seen in the lowliest localities of our large towns are almost pathetic indications of the popular love of beautiful flowers, and delight in their fragrant scent and delicate colours. We can hardly conceive of a more salutary and elevating recreation than the promotion of flower-shows in our Sunday-schools and Domestic Missions, and we are glad to notice that flower services also are becoming more frequent, and invariably arouse a considerable amount of public interest.

If then, there is, as we have maintained, a moral function in the beautiful, we shall do well to accept it in all its relations to the individual and the home, the church and the community at large. Let it be developed harmoniously in all fitting directions. Hitherto we have cultivated the beautiful partially; one denies it in one form, another denies it in another direction, and each is apt to despise or neglect that development of it with which he has no particular sympathy. One thing is clear, that the world is not made upon the ascetic or Puritan principle, any more than it is upon the narrow form of Utilitarianism which like Mr. GRADGRIND in the story, cares for nothing but the stoniest of facts, despises all the elements of beauty and grace in life, and makes even religion itself repulsive by the hard, unamiable form it assumes.

For our part we hold that it was a wise and healthy instinct which has led the vast majority of the Christian world to cultivate the beautiful in their religion worship. It is right and good that the house of GOD should be beautiful; that the music should be tasteful and inspiring; that the hymns and prayers should express in fitting words the highest sentiments and aspirations of the soul; that everything belonging to the services of the Church should be characterised by a quiet dignity and graceful propriety. It is not the love of beauty in too great measure that leads to perversion, but it is the partial and one-sided culture of it which produces all the corruptions against which the old Puritanism was the inevitable protest. We Liberal Christians, with our too exclusively rationalistic tendencies, are among the last that need be afraid of Art and Music and Liturgies, and all the attractions of a stately Church service as the fitting outward manifestation of the beautiful religious faith we profess. "He hath made everything beautiful in its time." Those significant words of the ancient sage contain the essence of the whole argument.

ENGLAND AND EGYPT.

THE recent course of events in Egypt is of a character to be deplored by every humane and thoughtful mind. The destruction of the city of Alexandria all political parties must regard as a deplorable event. Who is to be held responsible for this great crime? This is a question which must be answered, and answered, too, in no vague or evasive manner. The plain facts of the case, we think, show conclusively that the responsibility rests largely with the English Government. The action of the Government in ordering the British fleet, armed with the most deadly weapons of destruction, to take up its position outside of Alexandria was the first provocation to all the crimes that followed. It was in itself distinctly an act of aggression; almost as bad as landing an armed force. Suppose disorder and confusion, even riot, to break forth in London, would that be any justification of a foreign Power sending a fleet up the Thames? How should we endure the presence of a foreign fleet in English waters? It is when we thus bring the matter home to ourselves, and place ourselves in the same position that we have placed others in, that we are enabled to see the essential injustice of the whole business. The fleet, we are told by the Times—the constant apologist of all English misdoing—was sent to be a check upon the prevailing anarchy. Did it fulfil this purpose? Notoriously it did not. Did it preserve peace? Did it maintain order? Did it protect the lives and property of the people? It did nothing of the kind, but it led to results of a directly contrary character. The appearance of the fleet in Egyptian waters was the signal for renewed outbreak, and for massacre which had not occurred before. But it is said that the bombardment was a work of self-defence—that it was demanded for the safety of the fleet, that the forts were a menace to it and placed it in danger. The excuse utterly fails to justify the course pursued. The fleet was not obliged to remain within reach of the guns on the Egyptian forts. As Sir GEORGE BOWYER very justly remarks in his letter to the Standard, it was the fleet that went to the forts, the forts did not come to the fleet. The true work of self defence was that which ARABI attempted when he raised the forts and manned them to the best of his ability. This was a perfectly legitimate response to the threatening attitude of the monster vessels of war anchored in the harbour. It was the natural reply to our own action, and just the one that would be taken by a minister of war, as ARABI was then. Indeed, the raising and arming of the forts was only accepting the challenge which England had offered—taking up the gauntlet England had thrown down. The menace, the insult came from England, not from Egypt. What the fleet said in effect was this:—"We are here to overawe you, and if you do not remove the fortifications which you have put up in self defence, we, taking advantage of our superior power—of our heavier guns, shall knock them down, regardless what loss of life we may inflict, or what further horrors may ensue." So much for the pretence that the bombardment was begun and carried out in self defence.

But then it is also said that our interests were imperilled. This is the ready excuse always at hand when we need to defend an act of public injustice and aggression. Whenever we are engaged in a military enterprise threatening the liberties and independence of a foreign country, our interests are pleaded as the justification for our interference. It was so in the Afghan war, the Zulu war, the war between Russia and Turkey, and it is so in this war. Egypt is on the way to India. We are deeply interested in the Suez Canal. We have important trading connections with Egypt itself, and besides all this, a number of English speculators have invested large sums in Egyptian bonds, and the English Government in conjunction with the French has undertaken to protect the "interests" of these bondholders. It is true Egypt is on the way to India. But are we called on to interfere in the affairs of every country so situated? If we are, then we should have to meddle with the affairs of half Europe. The temporary disturbance of our trading connections is no sufficient justification of our intervention with an armed force, still less are we justified in doing this to protect the interests of a parcel of bondholders. This is a purely private and personal concern; it is no matter of national importance at all. Neither the honour nor the duty of this country is pledged to uphold the interests of speculators in foreign bonds. What investments they made they made for their own selfish gain and advantage, and at their own risk, and the consequences, whether favourable or unfavourable, whether loss or gain, were purely personal to themselves. This is a point which cannot be too earnestly insisted on. Once the precedent of Egypt were allowed, what troubles might we not get into with foreign countries? We should become more entangled with foreign intervention than ever. As regards the protection of the Suez Canal, that is another matter. It is the only solid ground for our interference in this Egyptian business. There, it may be allowed, we were within our rights. The Canal is partly ours; England, wisely or unwisely, has invested four millions of money in it. It is not only the nearest route to India, but has become a great highway for the commerce of the world. Every consideration leads to the conclusion that it should be preserved intact—that on no account should any interference be allowed with this means of communication between the West and East. But the bombardment of Alexandria was not necessary to secure this result. It only imperilled the Canal by arousing the vindictive passions of the people. We contend, then, that not a single justifiable plea can be advanced for the violent course of action which England has pursued in this most unfortunate affair.

It is especially to be deplored that all this has happened under a Liberal ministry—a ministry pledged to peace, retrenchment and reform. What different results were looked for when the present Government took office! What anticipations of social amelioration and political advancement were indulged in! And how have all those hopes been frustrated by one cause and another. We do not hold the Government directly responsible for all this; but the fact remains that a Government is held responsible for the use it makes of its opportunities, and for the public, national doings that transpire under its rule, and we are assured that the present ministry will not be allowed to plead any exception in this respect. A day of reckoning is fast approaching; when that day comes the constituencies will not be put off with empty or vain excuses.

C. F. B.

DR. WILLIAMS'S TRUST.—XXXIII.

[CONTRIBUTED BY W. D. JEREMY, ESQ.]

196. REV. ROBERT BROOK ASPLAND, M.A. (1859-69).—The eldest son of the Rev. Robert Aspland (No 142 supra). Born at Newport, I.W.; received his school education from the Rev. John Potticary, of Blackheath (No. 147), and the Rev. William Evans, of Tavistock, and continued his studies at the University of Glasgow (1819-22) and York College (1822-26). Minister of Matthew Henry's Chapel, Chester (1826-32); Assistant Minister at Lewin's Mead, Bristol, as colleague of Dr. Lant Carpenter (1833-37); at Dukinfield (1837-58); and lastly at the Gravel Pit Chapel, Hackney (1858-69). A member of the Presbyterian Board (1858-69); one of the Secretaries of Manchester New College (1846-54); and of the B. and F. Unitarian Association (1859-69). Editor for many years of the Christian Reformer, in succession to his father, who was its originator. Mr. Aspland was eminent for his knowledge of Puritan literature and biography, and of the history of the English Presbyterian Churches, and the pages of the Reformer are rich with information on such subjects. Soon after relinquishing the editorial work he was presented with a testimonial (consisting of plate of the value of £250, and a purse containing £600), "expressive of the high personal regard in which he was held by his friends, and of the sense of his long, able, and faithful services in connection with the Unitarian body." On Dr. Williams's Trust he was a member of the Glasgow College, Audit, and Book Committees, constant in his attendance, and highly influential. He died on the 21st of June, 1869, aged sixty-four years. In an address delivered at his interment, some of his admirable qualities were alluded to by Dr. Martineau in language of great beauty. A memoir of him, by the Rev. Edward Higginson, was soon after published.

197. REV. JAMES PANTON HAM (1859-).—The Minister of Essex-street Chapel since 1859. Educated for the ministry at Cheshunt College (1841-45). At the close of his curriculum there he was appointed by the directors of the London Missionary Society to Benares, but was prevented from going to India by domestic circumstances. For a short time Minister of the Countess of Huntingdon's Chapel at Maidenhead, whence he removed in 1847 to a chapel belonging to the same connexion at Bristol. There he became "unsound" in the Calvinistic faith, and founded a Congregational Free Church in the Coopers' Hall, an account of which appeared in the Christian Reformer for 1852 (pp. 395-409) under the title of "Creeds and Controversies in Bristol," written by the late Rev. William James. From 1854 to 1859 Mr. Ham was the colleague of the Rev. William Gaskell at Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, where his services were highly appreciated.

198. REV. HENRY IERSON (1859-).—At the time of his election he was the minister of Carter-lane Congregation, which afterwards removed to Unity Church, Islington. Educated at Stepney College and the University of Edinburgh, where he graduated M.A. in 1845. For some time Minister of a Baptist church at Northampton, his connection with which was severed on account of his having relinquished Calvinism and adopted heterodox opinions. Then one of the Classical Masters at University College School, London (1851-72), Minister at South-place Chapel, Finsbury (1851-57), and at Carter-lane, and Unity Church, Islington (1857-74). A member of the Presbyterian Board as a representative of Carter-lane since 1859. On Dr. Williams's Trust he has for many years been a member of the Glasgow College and Book Committees. Secretary to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association since 1874.

199. REV. JOHN PHILIP MALLESON, B.A. (1860-69).—Educated at Wymondley College (Independent) (1812-17), and at the University of Glasgow, where he held one of Dr. Williams's Scholarships (1817-19). Whilst at Glasgow he adopted Arian opinions, and in 1820 accepted the pastorate of the old Presbyterian Chapel in Hanover-street, Long Acre, London. In the following year he was elected a member of Dr. Williams's Trust (see No. 153 supra), but in 1822 he removed to Leeds, and thence in 1828 to Brighton, where for thirty years he conducted a school of high reputation, being at the same time minister of the Unitarian Chapel there. On retiring in 1860 and removing to Croydon he was re-elected a member of this Trust. He died March 16, 1869, aged seventy-three years.

200. JAMES HEYWOOD, Esq., M.A., F.R.S. (1860).—Born at Everton, Liverpool, on the 28th of May, 1810. A lineal descendant of the Rev. Nathaniel Heywood, who was ejected from his living of Ormskirk in 1662 by the Act of Uniformity, being the youngest of the four sons of Nathaniel Heywood, of Liverpool, merchant, and of Manchester, banker (of the firm of Heywood Brothers), and Anna his wife, daughter of Dr. Percival.* On the death of his father, in 1815, he and his brothers were taken charge of by their uncle, the senior partner of the banking firm, who, dying in 1828 unmarried, left them the bulk of his property in equal shares. The eldest of the brothers (the late Sir Benjamin Heywood, Bart.) was soon after elected M.P. for Lancashire, and helped to pass the Reform Bill of 1832. The subject of this notice received his higher school education from Dr. Lant Carpenter, and afterwards pursued his studies at the University of Edinburgh, Geneva, and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he had for his private tutor the future Master of Trinity, the late Dr. Whewell. In 1833 he became entitled as a senior Optime to the degree of B.A., but as it was guarded by a theological test, he nobly declined it. In 1837 Mr. Heywood read a paper on the Coalfields of Lancashire at the Liverpool Meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science before the Geological Section, which was presided over by Professor Sedgwick, of Cambridge, on whose proposal he was afterwards elected a Fellow of the Royal Society (1839). In 1841 Mr. Heywood published a translation from the German of Huber's "English Universities," illustrated by many plates. From 1847 to 1857 he was the Liberal representative in Parliament of North Lancashire, and as it is chiefly to his efforts and perseverance during that period that the nation is indebted for the opening of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge to all Her Majesty's subjects, irrespective of creed, a few details relative to that subject cannot fail to be interesting to the reader. In 1850 Mr. Heywood moved an Address to the Crown for a Royal Commission of Inquiry into the Universities and Colleges of Oxford, Cambridge, and Dublin, including an investigation into their religious tests. Thereupon the Prime Minister, Lord John Russell, agreed, if Mr. Heywood's proposition was withdrawn, to advise the Crown to issue a Royal Commission of Inquiry without going into Dissenters' grievances. Mr. Heywood consented to that arrangement, and a Commission was accordingly appointed. In 1854, the Earl of Aberdeen being now at the head of the Government, an Oxford University Bill was introduced into the House of Commons, but containing no allusion to religious tests. Mr. Heywood moved the insertion of a clause abolishing the subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles at matriculation, and it was carried by 252 votes against 161; he subsequently moved another clause for opening all secular degrees at Oxford, but in that he was defeated. On the next day (Saturday) a Cabinet meeting was held, and in the evening a letter reached him requesting a conference on Sunday with the Right Hon. Edw. Ellice, M.P., who had a communication to make to Mr. Heywood from the Cabinet. The conference was held, and the communication was—a request that he would again on Monday move the clause for opening secular degrees at Oxford, with a rider that degrees so opened should not form a qualification for any office theretofore held only by members of the Church of England. Mr. Heywood declined to adopt the rider, but on Monday he proposed an amended clause of his own, merely proposing the lower degrees of Bachelor in Arts, Law, Medicine, and Music to be opened without a religious test, and (mirabile dictu) it was carried. The Lords, however, added a rider similar to that which the Cabinet had suggested. The Bill thus deformed was passed and became law in 1854. In 1856 the Cambridge University Bill came before the House containing a similar clause; but on the motion of Mr. Heywood a new clause was inserted abolishing religious tests for College Scholarships. Thus was laid a good foundation for further University reforms. Concessions had been made from which it was impossible to recede, and at which it was equally impossible to stop. At a later period Lord Beaconsfield, when Prime Minister, is reported to have said that "no Government can remain in power in this country which does not reform the Universities." The Cambridge Bill having become law, Mr. Heywood took his degrees of B.A. and M.A., from which he had been so long excluded by religious tests. At the dissolution in 1857 he retired from Parliamentary life; but he has since been active in other ways. It may be mentioned that he has given to the English public a translation from the German of Professor Von Bohlen's historical and critical illustrations of the first part of Genesis, and a translation of Professor Heer's "Primeval World of Switzerland." Since 1856 Mr. Heywood has been a member of the Senate of the University of London, and assisted in making Greek optional at matriculation. He was the President of the Statistical Section of the Bristol Meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science in 1875, and the President of the Statistical Society in 1875 and 1876. The Free Library at Notting-hill, which is much appreciated, owes its existence and support to him. On Dr. Williams's Trust he has for many years served on the Estates, Schools, and Book Committees.

201. RUSSELL SCOTT, Esq. (1861-75).—Son of the Rev. Russell Scott, who was for forty-eight years the minister of the Unitarian Chapel at Portsmouth; a grandson of Dr. Hawes, one of the founders of the Royal Humane Society; and a descendant of one of the confessors of 1662. He was himself a practical philanthropist. For forty years a promoter of improved dwellings for the working classes, and throughout life an active and earnest friend of education. The following account of him has been kindly contributed by the Rev. Dr. Sadler, whose services at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, he was in the habit of attending:—"Mr. R. Scott was a zealous and consistent liberal in politics and religion. But what was most characteristic of him was his constant benevolence, which while it led him to take a warm and active interest in great public questions, especially those which were connected with the social condition of mankind, was fruitful also in the private and personal acts of charity and kindness. The readers of the memoir of Mary Carpenter will remember that it was by his liberality she was enabled to establish the Reformatory at Kingswood, near Bristol, in a house erected by John Morley for his own occupation. In this great work Miss Carpenter had not only Mr. Scott's sympathy and pecuniary aid, but also very valuable personal co-operation. I need hardly add that Mr. R. Scott was a man of the highest character for integrity. His judgment also was very reliable, both on account of his excellent understanding and the pains he took to secure all available information. Altogether he was a man of most solid worth." He retired from the Trust in 1875 and died the 18th of April, 1880, aged 79 years.

* In Dr. Kendrick's "Warrington Worthies" (1853) there is a silhouette portrait and the following account of Mr. Heywood's maternal grandfather:—Thomas Percival, M.D., F.R.S., F.S.A. Born at Warrington, September 29, 1740. An eminent physician, moral essayist, and philosopher. Author of "A Father's Instructions to his Children," "Medical Ethics," &c. In 1767 Dr. Percival commenced practice in Manchester, and at the meetings for scientific inquiry which took place at his house, originated the Literary and Philosophical Society of that city, of which he continued president for twenty years. He died at Manchester, August 30, 1804.

202. SIR JAMES CLARKE LAWRENCE, BART., M.P. (1861-).—Second son of the late Alderman Lawrence. Born in London, 1st of Sept., 1820; educated at Islington by the Rev. D. Davison, M.A. and the Rev. John Scott Porter (Nos. 157 and 159 supra), and afterwards attended classes at University College, Gower-street. An Alderman of the City of London since 1860; Sheriff of London and Middlesex in 1862; Lord Mayor in 1868; a member of the Royal Courts of Justice Commission; President of the Bridewell and Bethlehem Hospitals; a Commissioner of Licensancy of London; a member of the Hibbert Trust; the treasurer of the Holt Fund; President of the London and District Unitarian Society; President of the B. and F. Unitarian Association in 1864; Treasurer of the Carter Lane and Unity Congregation from 1856 to 1875; a member of the Presbyterian Board since 1856; a magistrate of Middlesex, Surrey and Westminster; M.P. for Lambeth since 1865; for many years a member of the Estates Committee of Dr. Williams's Trust, to which he has been enabled to render special services.

203. PHILIP WORSLEY, ESQ. (1864-).—Son-in-law of the late John Taylor, Esq., F.R.S. (No. 168 supra); grandson of the Rev. Samuel Worsley, Presbyterian Minister at Cheshunt, and great grandson of Mr. John Worsley, schoolmaster, of Hertford, whose translation of the New Testament was published in 1770; descended also by a paternal ancestor from the Hughes family, which counted among its members two of the Ejected Ministers—George and Obediah Hughes [see No. 38 supra]. For many years an acting partner in the firm of Messrs. Whitbread and Co., brewers. On Dr. Williams's Trust a member of the Audit Committee (1864-77) and of the Estates Committee (1867-81).

(To be continued.)

NATURAL RELIGION.—I.

Just sixteen years ago there appeared a book, written by an anonymous author, which created considerable interest in religious circles. It professed to be only "a fragment;" but it gave a view of the life of Jesus from the purely human side, leaving out of sight the conceptions so dear to the orthodox mind. The interest already created in the book was enhanced by the fact, that Lord Shaftesbury denounced it in language savouring more of the theological than the literary critic. "The most pestilential book ever vomited, I think, from the jaws of hell—I mean 'Ecce Homo,'—was the judgment pronounced upon it by his Lordship, and, it needs scarcely be added, this vigorous criticism enormously increased the demand, and several editions were called for. We know not whether the venerable Earl has read "Natural Religion,"* but we venture to think that however much he may dislike it, he will not repeat his mistake.

In the preface to "Ecce Homo" the author intimated that he had in contemplation to publish, though not "for some time to come," another volume, treating of "Christ as the creator of modern theology and religion." That book has, so far as we know, yet to appear. Certainly "Natural Religion" does not give us that view of Christ. The present work, which we purpose treating in this and subsequent articles, is founded upon a number of papers bearing the same title, which appeared in Macmillan's Magazine during the years 1875-8, and written by the same author. It was understood at the time, and since then from time to time announcements have been made to the effect, that these papers, gathered together in one work, would seek a wider circle of readers. The author has certainly not been hasty in his work. He warns us "not to enter upon this book with the expectation of finding in it anything calculated to promote either orthodoxy or heterodoxy," and he describes himself, not altogether very happily, as "one of those simpletons who believe that, alike in politics and religion, there are truths outside the region of party debate, and that these truths are more important than the contending parties will easily be induced to believe." He considers that "in religion the evil is far more inveterate than in politics; . . . indeed, we see religion suffering veritably the catastrophe of Poland, which found such a fatal enjoyment in quarrelling, and quarrelled so long, that a day came at last when there was no Poland any more, and then the quarrelling ceased." His object is to ascertain those truths about which all are agreed, a task by no means easy.

The book has already been classed as belonging to the Agnostic school of thought; but this, it seems to us, is by no means a true or fair criticism. We may differ from his method, we may be disposed to think that he makes too little of fundamental differences, that he concedes too much in his desire to arrive at a common basis, but we do not feel that the Agnostics can claim him on their side, any more than he would wish to be on the side or the Orthodox. Starting with the apparently irreconcilable difference between Science and Christianity, that is, of course, orthodox Christianity, he seeks to find whether there is not an agreement after all. They both agree in treating with contempt erudition and philosophy, but they do not agree in their estimate of what is the "true wisdom." He admits that the question between Christianity and Science is nothing less than this, whether we are to regard the grave with assured hope, and the ties between human beings as indissoluble by death; or, on the other hand, to dismiss the hope of a future life as too doubtful to be worth considering, even if not absolutely chimerical, and that "no reasoning can make such a difference into a small one." Still he contends it is worth while to call attention to the points of agreement, and putting religion by the side of science in its latest most aggressive form, to measure how much ground is common to both. And first, as we have indicated, "they agree in denouncing that pride of the human intellect which supposes it knows everything, which is not passive enough in the presence of reality, but deceives itself with pompous words instead of things, and with flattering eloquence instead of sober truth." But does not their agreement begin and end here? Is not the theological view of the universe summed up in the three propositions that a personal will is the cause of the universe, that that will is perfectly benevolent, and that it has sometimes interfered by miracles with the order of the universe? And has not science thrown, and does it not continue to throw, discredit upon all of them, and if so, are not Theology and Science hopelessly irreconcilable, and mutually destructive? These questions our author answers in this way. He maintains that the three propositions just mentioned are not so much an abstract of theology itself as of current theology. Neither the belief that God is perfectly benevolent, nor that He has interfered by miracles is necessary to theology. There have been theologies where no such belief existed. Two, then, of the three propositions are not necessary: there remains the third, that a "Personal Will is the cause of the Universe." But here again he deems it "easy to conceive a theology which did not occupy itself at all with causes, but which at the same time conceived the separate phenomena of the Universe, or the Universe itself altogether personally." To us we confess that this conception does not appear to be so easy as it does to our author, nor does he explain how it seems so comprehensible to him. He anticipates, however, the objection, the natural objection, we may say, that if the possibility of miracles be given up, that if the order of nature is invariable, and that all appearances of benevolent design are explained away, the belief in God would cease to be consoling. Does not this, he asks, arise from the fact that people limit the attributes of God to benevolence and personality, whereas these by no means exhaust the idea of God, and by denying them men do not cease to be theists?

We are far from asserting that these attributes do exhaust the idea of God, but we do think that if He is minus them, He is not the great Being that all theists have conceived Him to be. Of course, if the term personality involves mortality and a body, then to speak of the personality of God is misleading, but that is not the idea alone conveyed to our mind by the expression. Without attempting to define God in any way, we can conceive of Him as a loving Spirit, responding to our spirits, and this is partly what we mean when we talk of His personality, a meaning that requires neither mortality nor corporeal existence. Passing by this for the moment, we follow the argument adduced by our author. Science opposes to God Nature, that is, it denies the existence of any power beyond or superior to Nature, and so denying means that nothing further can be known. Is there hopeless irreconcilability here? "Those who believe in Nature may deny God, but those who believe in God believe, as a matter of course, in Nature also, since God includes Nature, as the whole includes the part." No doubt there is a phase of theology which disregards Nature as a system of law and only concerns itself with the occasional suspensions of law or miracle. Still, theology can never deny that Nature is an ordinance of God, though it may treat the laws of Nature as of minor importance, and as not giving us exactly the revelation of God that man needs. And here we quote the author's words:—

But if, on the one hand, the study of Nature be one part of the study of God, is it not true, on the other, that he who believes only in Nature is a Theist, and has a theology? Men slide easily from the most momentous controversies into the most contemptible logomachies. If we will look at things, and not merely at words, we shall soon see that the scientific man has a theology and a God, a most impressive theology, a most awful and glorious God. I say that man believes in a God who feels himself in the presence of a Power which is not himself, and is immeasurably above himself, a Power in the contemplation of which he is absorbed, in the knowledge of which he finds safety and happiness. And such now is Nature to the scientific man. I do not now say that it is good or satisfying to worship such a God, but I say that no class of men since the world began have ever more truly believed in a God, or more ardently, or with more conviction, worshipped Him. Comparing their religion in its fresh youth to the present confused forms of Christianity, I think a bystander would say that though Christianity had in it something far higher and deeper and more ennobling, yet the average scientific man worships just at present a more awful and, as it were, a greater Deity than the average Christian. In so many Christians the idea of God has been degraded by childish and little-minded teaching; the Eternal and the Infinite and the All-embracing has been represented as the head of the clerical interest, as a sort of clergyman, as a sort of schoolmaster, as a sort of philanthropist. But the scientific man knows Him to be eternal; in astronomy, in geology, he becomes familiar with the countless millenniums of His lifetime. The scientific man strains his mind actually to realise God's infinity. As far as the fixed stars he traces Him, "distance inexpressible by numbers that have name." Meanwhile, to the theologian infinity and eternity are very much of empty words when applied to the Object of his worship. He does not realise them in actual facts and definite computations.

The obvious question that arises on this passage is, In what sense does the writer use the word "worship?" Does not worship imply something more than wonder, awe, and admiration? Does it not also imply love, and that of the very highest kind? And if it does, can it be said that the scientific man really worships Nature? Power inspires awe; it will induce care and caution so as to avoid a conflict with it, but it does not inspire affection. The writer sees all this; he admits that the scientific man cannot feel for Nature such love as a pious mind may feel for the God of Christians; that science can discern in Nature little or nothing of the qualities of love, justice, or goodness. But he contends that "a very genuine love, though of a lower kind, is felt by the contemplator of Nature." "It is infinitely interesting, infinitely beautiful," and no doubt there is an exquisite pleasure in the discovery of laws, which yields to a feeling of awe. But this is not love, at any rate as most Theists understand the word. We agree with our author that "Nature, according to all systems of Christian theology, is God's ordinance," and that "whether with science you stop short at Nature, or with Christianity believe in a God who is the author of Nature, in either case Nature is divine, for it is either God or the work of God." We assent, too, to the proposition that the "vast mass of natural knowledge which no one questions" is, to the Christian, so much knowledge about God, and that the rigorous method by which it has been separated from human prejudice and hasty ingenuity, and delusive rhetoric or poetry, ought to be a matter of exaltation to him, because by such means he has been enabled to hear a voice which is unmistakably God's. But it does not seem to us that this really grasps the difficult problem of reconciling Theology and Science. Up to a certain point they are agreed, and so far well, but beyond that point there seems to be a hopeless divergence. It is of the first importance to ascertain where the point of departure really begins; but it does not assist in the solution of the problem unless, after the disagreement has commenced, you find a means of bringing about agreement again. Whether our author does this will be seen in future articles. We have devoted some space to the first chapter of his book because it, to some extent, gives the key to the subsequent treatment of his subject. At the same time, it is but fair to him to say that he by no means regards the thought of a God revealed in Nature as satisfactory, or worthy to replace the Christian view. He says, "I can conceive no religion as satisfactory that falls short of Christianity, but, on the other hand, I cannot believe any religion to be healthy that does not start from Nature worship. It is in the free and instructive admiration of human beings for the glory of heaven, earth, and sea, that religion—so far as religion is the name of a good and healthy thing—begins, and I cannot imagine but as morbid a religion which has ceased to admire them."

* "Natural Religion." By the Author of "Ecce Homo." London: Macmillan.

"THEORY OF POLITICAL EPITHETS."

In the current number of the Nineteenth Century Mr. George Jacob Holyoake has a very timely article on this subject, which it would be well if everybody engaged in public life would "read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest." The writer is, perhaps, one of the most competent of men to speak upon the subject of what may be called Parliamentary language, and it may be well in these days of heated controversy to pay heed to what he says. We fear, however, that Mr. Holyoake is as one crying in a wilderness. We have got into a sad way of late, and to political controversy alone the use of strong language is by no means confined. Unworthy motives are imputed with a freedom which is at once painful and indicative of a very unhealthy not to say irreligious, spirit. That we may soon improve upon this state of things will be the fervent prayer of all earnest men. But, as the best prayer is practice, it is only in the most careful conduct of leading public men and public journals that we can have any hope of a better tone of the public mind. Certain it is that Liberalism, whether in politics or religion, can have no permanent alliance with offensive forms of speech. It can be no part of the Liberal programme, at all events, to bring opponents into public contempt.

Mr. Holyoake evidently felt that the sin which he attacks is not confined to one party, for he does not draw any distinctions. He tells us of a certain society with which in his early days he was connected, the secretary of which had a trained talent of incriminative imputation towards official persons; and there is a good deal of humour in the record of the steps which were taken to throw upon that luckless individual the responsibility of his own failings. "It was understood among us," he says, "that we had caused the death of one official by ingenious pertinacity of unevadable correspondence. This was an entirely legitimate form of official murder. We had acted upon Bentham's maxim that to gain any redress you must make the ruling powers uneasy." Mr. Holyoake considers this is good doctrine under a selfish despotism, or under Lord Melbourne, whose policy was to deter persons from proposing improvements, or under Lord Palmerston, whose art was to evade change sought if any one did propose it. "But under a government with a conscience," he proceeds, "anxious to accord all the redress of evil it can, and sorry it cannot do everything assailing it by savage imputation, and pestering it with demands in season and out of season, is simply baseness of agitation, since it assumes that, under such rule, reason cannot be depended upon to arrest wrong."

Perhaps the root of the evil lies in the character of the times in which we live. We must read as we run if we are to read at all. The speed at which we live precludes that equanimity which is the gracious charm of culture. The consequence is that our literature and our modes of speech are hurried and rough. There is not time to select words much less turn sentences. Everything is done on the spur of the moment. The daily press sins enormously, and the weekly press does not lag behind, the so-called religious press probably bearing away the palm.

It can hardly, perhaps, be said that Mr. Holyoake does more than make in the terse and pungent manner so characteristic of him a series of observations such as might readily occur to any one who should reflect upon the subject, but his essay is none the less interesting on that account, for the reason that, as we say, reflection seems to be at a discount in these days. Dealing with what he terms disparaging and incriminative epithets, Mr. Holyoake strongly condemns their use, for indulgence in invective and denunciation, he tells us, is a sign of ignorance and inferior power. "The policy of the capable disputant is always to treat his adversary as a person of sincerity and right-feeling." Moreover, a controversialist of self-respect never gives an opponent "as good as he sends," if what he sends is bad. Mr. Holyoake gives us a notable illustration of what he means. "On a famous night in the House of Commons," he tells us, "when Mr. Disraeli was in opposition, he assailed Mr. Gladstone in tones of fierce vituperation of the 'unfinished' type of his earlier invective in his Runnymede Letters. To all human seeming his excitement was accountable. As he spoke he clutched the table as though it were a friend. A morning journal published a portion of his speech, in which the words had those sibilant endings peculiar to spirituous articulation. When Mr. Gladstone came to reply he made no accusation as to the condition of his assailant, but simply said that he himself laboured under disadvantage in his answer, as the right honourable gentleman had manifestly access to sources of inspiration denied to her Majesty's Government! These skilful words were open to two interpretations, which might be applied at the discretion of the hearer—to Mr. Disraeli's research or his refreshment. This is a perfect example of retort within the limits of Parliamentary courtesy—all the more effective from its forbearance."

In a few pregnant sentences Mr. Holyoake sums up the whole matter.

The advantage of abstention from calumnious imputation is very great. So long as an advocate keeps to epithets or phrases which imply lack of skill, or of comprehension, or discernment merely, his opponent is compelled to deal with the facts of the case, and to show that his knowledge of them is complete and his interpretation of them just; and if his friends come to his assistance, they must work on the line of elucidating his view of the question. Every attempt they make to vindicate his information and understanding tends to render clearer the facts in dispute. But the moment a dishonouring epithet is used, one that accuses an opponent of being wanting in good faith, or of arguing from motives of pecuniary interest, or as consciously saying the contrary of that which he knows to be true, the adversary at once ceases to reason; he retorts with insult and disdain and either proposes a duel or speaks one. Argument is over and personalities begin. The opponent probably recriminates by making similar charges against his assailant. His friends come to his rescue: they defend his character instead of his arguments—mostly they bring counter-charges against his accusers to prove that they are as infamous as they need be. Deadly enmity or enduring contempt arises between opponents and their partisans, and little more is heard, sometimes for years, of the question originally in dispute. By all means let the base be put down, but let that business be kept separate from advocacy. Advocacy is a distinct art. Once let the wide mouth of epithets be opened, and all the toads of passion and abuse leap to the platform and spit at all not of their way of thinking. Epithets of incrimination do but put, as it were, weapons into the hands of the adversary whereby he may the better withstand or parry the assault on his error. Every such imputation does but act as a buffer breaking the force intended to be dealt.

In the concluding portion of his article Mr. Holyoake tells us of a controversy he had with Wendell Phillips on this question of the use of epithets. Mr. Holyoake had dissented from the policy of strong language which the abolitionists pursued, and he quotes a sentence from Wendell Phillips, in which that gentleman had said that there was enough anti-slavery sentiment to bring even the Rev. Orville Dewey to his knees, and make him attempt to lie himself out of a late delicate embarrassment. Mr. Dewey may have deserved this treatment, adds Mr. Holyoake, but he very wisely observes, "it is not good policy for a general to hang his unsatisfactory recruits until the war is over." Mr. Phillips, in the course of this controversy, cited Parliamentary reforms in England, the abolition of Test Acts, of Catholic disability, of Negro slavery, and the Corn Laws as instances of popular movements which have been carried to a successful issue by advocacy in which epithets were freely used, and upon this Mr. Holyoake observes that "it is true that in these and in other movements in which maddening invective was employed those who were in the movements very well know that the Niagara flood of denunciation which was poured out washed more people away from them than it ever washed into them, and some movements were washed entirely away by it. When a good cause is carried in spite of invective, there are always persons who consider that it was carried by it." At the same time Mr. Holyoake does not fear to strike at what is quite as great an evil as the unwise use of epithets. "I never was an advocate," he says, "of that 'despicable virtue of prudence,' which is the Christian's ermine cloak of supineness when wrong has to be assailed. I never was for playing at patriotism nor at propagandism." He tells us that at one time in his own career he was subjected to sharp censure because he confined invective to error and did not inveigh against those who held it. He maintains that he was nevertheless right; but he admits that there is danger in this argument, in that "it may furnish a pretext to some for standing aloof from a right agitation, because 'fool friends' of progress have control of it. They never deterred me. It is a rotten stage of cultivation when a man's sense of the right method is so delicate that he is incapable of acting against gross wrong." Another observation Mr. Holyoake might have made—that those who demur to methods, and on that ground stand aloof from a cause which in itself they believe to be righteous are really greater culprits than those whose advocates does the cause more harm than good. Did they but take up the matter with vigour, their influence would go far to moderate the intemperate zeal of their comrades, and thus the cause would be doubly served.

We have given but a rapid sketch of Mr. Holyoake's admirable and timely utterance, and we conclude as we began, by urging our readers to peruse the article for themselves. It will be worth while even to miss a row in the House of Commons to ponder the counsel which indeed Mr. Mill gave us many years ago, but which Mr. Holyoake has so effectively re-presented to us. H. R.

LESLIE STEVEN'S SCIENCE OF ETHICS.—III.

THE THEORY OF MOTIVES.

For the purposes of this inquiry metaphysical problems are deemed by the author irrelevant. We have to do with human conduct. So far as man is a sentient being, his feelings, and so far as he is a rational being, his reasoning powers, must be taken into consideration. Feeling determines conduct. "Good" means everything which favours happiness, and "bad" means everything that is conducive to misery. But it is sometimes denied that pain and pleasure are the sole deterrent or attractive qualities. "We shrink from the fire or the knife, but some other motive may overpower our spontaneous dread." Yet this must be something which has its equivalent in terms of feeling. The true statement is that one emotion may be overcome, not by something which is altogether disparate from emotion, but by an emotion of a different kind. And although pain and pleasure are words which it is impossible to define, as they are names of the highest class, and not a species of some more general class, we still know what they mean. The assertion is made that conduct is determined by the feelings not as denying that it is also in some sense determined by the reason, but as "maintaining that a state of consciousness which is neither painful nor pleasurable cannot be the object either of desire or aversion." Since man is both a sentient and a reasoning being, we have to ask how we are to conceive of the mode in which these separable or at least verbally distinct faculties co-operate in determining conduct.

*Smith, Elder and Co., London.

The old reasoners said conduct followed "the last act of judgment." The intellect weighed "lots" of happiness in the balance. Reasoned conduct differed from merely instinctive conduct in that it implied adaptation of means to an end—the possibility of following courses of conduct not agreeable in themselves, but promising a greater total of happiness. "The characteristic of the reasoning being was the power of acting with a view to distant ends, instead of being the slave of immediate impulse." Mr. Steven thinks this phraseology is apt to sanction certain erroneous hypotheses, and some of these he promises to consider hereafter. For the present he is satisfied with observing that it seems to assume that a deferred pleasure is as potent as an immediate pleasure. "The influence of mental perspective appears to be entirely ignored." This influence he claims to be of the highest importance. As the happiness which determines the will is always regarded as future, though it may be in the immediate future, the feeling which is hereafter to be thus becomes the determining influence. The reason here determines conduct by reference to a feeling which does not yet exist, or, in other words, does not exist at all. An unfelt feeling is a non-entity. But many of our feelings are foretastes of feelings to come. "We shudder at the edge of a cliff because we foresee the consequences of a fall, and thus the shudder implies the belief in those consequences. But though this intellectual perception is an essential part of the process, it would not affect our conduct if it were a perception entirely divorced from feeling. It affects us because the perception is itself painful, because it involves an anticipatory realisation of an approaching pain. It is more accurate to say that my conduct is determined by the pleasantest judgment than to say that it is determined by my judgment of what is pleasantest." Further, the metaphor of the balance is misleading because "the intellect and the emotions are in reality related as form and substance, and cannot be really divided."

Pain and pleasure are the sole and ultimate determinants of conduct; and though we might conceivably find the physiological causes of pain and pleasure, or investigate the history of pain and pleasure, yet we could not alter the fact. As to the mode in which these forces act, the most obvious fact to Mr. Steven seems to be that in all cases "pain as pain represents tension, a state of feeling, that is, from which there is a tendency to change; pleasure represents so far equilibrium, or a state in which there is a tendency to persist. The mind writhes under a painful emotion, making an effort to get into a more tolerable posture." The analogy which gives the best account of the facts is the mechanical principle of least resistance. "I have to make some simple choice, say between a glass of wine and a glass of water. I am moved by the foretaste of the pleasure of drinking, the difficulty of reaching either glass, the dislike to expense, the moral and medical scruples in which I indulge, and so forth; for the decision takes place according to the principle of least resistance." It may be impossible to analyse all these motives, but the decision comes of the simple process of feeling one course to be the easiest. What happens is that which is pleasantest. The believer in Free Will misinterprets these facts.

"Slow experience teaches us what is the true sphere of volition. Our prevision of our own conduct is exceedingly fallible, nothing is more common than to mistake wishes for anticipation and dislikes for disbelief. A perfectly logical mind would draw conclusions unbiassed by pain and pleasure. The hatred of error would overbalance the painfulness of anticipation. Its emotions would decide it to add up its accounts; but they would be unable to persuade it that two and two make five. But nothing is easier than to find a mind which never permits its anticipations to intrude beyond their proper sphere. The logical mill once set going must grind out results irrespective of pain or pleasure; but we dread to set it going or tamper with its action. We are apt, in vulgar phrase, to "cook" our accounts. The reluctance of the mind to gaze upon painful facts prevents us from setting the sun precisely; and as we tamper with the materials at every stage of the process, we end with that mass of contradictions and baseless prejudices which we know as human beliefs. It is only by long experience, in short, that we learn what are the predictions which can fulfil themselves, and those which have no effect on the future. If it is still hard to resist the illusion that a thing will happen because we desire it, it is intelligible how all the religions which are rooted in early stages of mental development sanction the propensity to hold that fate can be conquered by will, and that prayers—the embodiment of desires—can govern the stars in their courses. Anticipation and volition spring from the same root, and it is by a very gradual and difficult process that we learn to assign to each its proper sphere in our mental operations."

In one sense all conduct is reasonable. "The most foolish vagaries of the most illogical mind have their cause, and would be explained if we could look into the mind of the agent." But in another sense men may be reasonable in the most varying degrees, viz., that sense in which intelligent beings alone are subjectively reasonable, or determined in their conduct by perceptions and inferences. Reason may be opposed to passion, or to want of thought, or to want of proportion between means and ends, or may indicate consistency and loftiness of purpose. Reason should not be taken as separate from the emotions; the two should be regarded as bound together in inseparable unity. "The man distracted between the charms of gin and duty is not divided between passion and reason, but between a sensual pleasure and the love of home, or the fear of hell, or the disgust of conscious degradation. If resistance to these emotions gave him no pain he would not resist. There must be emotions on both sides, as well as reason on both sides, or a struggle would be impossible. But much of our conduct is automatic, and we feel by signs as well as reason by signs, as the sight of a red flag may deter us from crossing a rifle range without calling up to imagination all the effects of a bullet traversing one's body. Reason and feeling are mutually involved, and develop together. The intellectual side, however, of human nature may vary, whilst the emotional remains constant, and emotional activity, in particular cases, is unfavourable to certain forms of intellectual activity, in spite of the close connection of the two elements. The bare condition of logical consistency is not sufficient to eliminate eccentricities. There is always a cause for the wildest vagary or the most unreasonable prejudice. Again, if there were some constant and definable object towards which all desires converged, the problem would be definite, but mankind have many ends which are partially inconsistent with each other. This tends to prove that any formula which professes to be simple must be illusory. "A superior being who could examine our characters would be able to lay down the formula of our conduct, in which the determining instinct would appear as the resultant of various subordinate instincts." The great part which reason plays is in harmonising and rendering consistent the parts of the organism; it checks a caprice which exists in obedience to any single emotion without reference to other considerations. But what is it that settles the influence exerted by each member of the federation? The character is determined for each individual by its original constitution, though it is modified as reason acts. This gives rise in various people to various types. Can we determine which of these is the most reasonable? Assuming a certain end, we might say what is the most reasonable mode of conduct, but nothing hitherto stated enables us to define the end which is itself the most reasonable. Each type of character has its own end; that motive is strongest with every man which corresponds to his most frequently stimulated instinct. What, then, is the criterion by which we can judge of feelings? They exist, and hence cannot be called true or false. To answer the question recourse must be had to the theory of evolution, which brings out the fact that every organism, social or individual, represents the product of an indefinite series of adjustments between it and its environment. The vital problem is in what sense one type of character is better than another. "The process of evolution is at every moment a process of discovering a maximum of efficiency, though the conditions are always varying slowly, and an absolute maximum is inconceivable. At every point of the process there is a certain determinate direction along which development must take place. The form which represents this direction is the typical form, any deviation from which is a defect." A complete answer to the question, what is the relative value of different kinds of efficiency? might bring out the fact that it is an advantage to a race to include a great variety of different types.

Speaking of motives, the author has argued that conduct is determined by pain and pleasure, or that the reason of conduct is always its quality in terms of feeling. The cause of its being painful or pleasurable is the constitution of the agent. This constitution must be considered as variable, dependent on the conditions of life, and thus, as ends vary, character varies, and we cannot determine a general law of conduct. "A man will do what pleases him, and, if he is to live, must do what is good for him, or at least what is not destructive." The "useful," then, in the sense of pleasure-giving, must approximately coincide with the "useful" in the sense of life-preserving. Habits and instincts may be considered in either aspect. Utility must be understood with reference to the whole organism. There is a tendency to correlate painful and pernicious, pleasurable and beneficial. An animal which liked poisonous food would die if that food were easily obtainable. This condition, operative from the earliest stages of evolution, maintains the correlation within certain limits. So far as an agent takes pleasure in things conducive to his preservation, he has a better chance of survival, and therefore we may regard this as a cardinal point in the theory of organic development. There is a presumption in favour of the more deep-seated instincts, and an institution which has flourished in many different ages and races must presumably fulfil some want and correspond to some deep-seated instinct. Thus, the widespread taste for stimulants may depend on some profound constitutional necessity which must find its satisfaction in one way or another. The problem involves an inquiry as to the place filled by the desire for stimulants in the whole economy of life.

Qualities which are essential to the individual are essential to the whole. Races survive in virtue of the completeness of the correlation between pernicious and painful states, but the quality which makes a race survive may not always be a source of advantage to every individual, nor even to the average individual. An animal deprived of sexual and parental instincts might derive an advantage thence; it might avoid many dangers to which their possession would expose it. It therefore becomes desirable to bring into distinctness the meaning of the contrast between the individual and the race, in order to determine in what sense there can or cannot be a conflict between the individual who is the product of the race and the race which is itself formed of individuals, and in what way the principles laid down must be explained or modified when this distinction is taken into account. M.

KIDDERMINSTER—NEW MEETING HOUSE.—On Sunday morning last the pulpit of the above church was occupied by the Rev. A. P. Peabody, D.D., LL.D., of Harvard University, U.S.A., who preached a most able and timely sermon on Heart Beliefs. There was a very large and interested congregation. In the afternoon the annual flower service was held. The scholars, numbering with their teachers nearly four hundred, marched in procession through the vestry and chancel, depositing as they passed at the foot of the communion table their bouquets, which were afterwards taken to the infirmary and workhouse. The church was exquisitely decorated with lilies, roses, moss, and ferns. An address was delivered by the Rev. W. Carey Walters, and certificates to the number of 101 were presented to those scholars who had made perfect attendances during the quarter. The report showed 413 teachers and scholars on the books, with an average attendance during the quarter of morning, 272; afternoon, 344.

THE MALL CHURCH, NOTTING-HILL, LONDON.—The scholars of the Sunday-school belonging to this Church had their annual excursion on Wednesday, July 19th. Over one hundred scholars went. The total number of the party, with teachers and friends, was 12. The weather was lovely, so the day was thoroughly enjoyed.

Occasional Notes.

THE following lines hitherto unpublished in this country were written by the late H. W. Longfellow for his friend Charles Sumner:—

COLUMBUS.

[A TRANSLATION FROM SCHILLER.]

I.
STEER, bold mariner, on! albeit witlings deride thee
And the steersman drop idly his hand at the helm; Ever, ever to Westward, there must the coast be discovered,

If it but lie distinct, luminous lie in thy mind.

II.
Trust to the God that leads thee, and follow the sea that is silent;

Did it not yet exist, now would it rise from the flood.

Nature with Genius stands united in league everlasting;

What is promised to one, surely the other performs.

DR. J. FREEMAN CLARKE, in a letter to the Christian Register of Boston, U.S., on "The English Anniversaries" writes:—"The meetings have been full, earnest, inspiring. I have looked in vain to find somewhere a trace at least of the "English coldness" of which we have heard. Where it has gone, if indeed it ever existed, I cannot imagine; but, certainly, I have not been able to discover the slightest suspicion of it. Nothing could be more hearty and cordial than their reception of us Americans. Their hospitality is unbounded, their thoughtfulness unlimited. I began my week on my first Sunday, May 28, Whit-Sunday, by preaching in Dr. Sadler's lovely little chapel at Hampstead. I say little, in comparison with abbeys and cathedrals; but it is as large as most of our churches. It stands in a semi-rural, semi-civic environment, surrounded by trees in full foliage, and accessible from the manse by a footpath leading through grass and flowers. The English Unitarians have many excellent scholars among them. Many of the young men have specialties of study, and show the good qualities of earnest, vigorous, and careful thought. I saw examples of this at the meeting of the Taylerian Society on Tuesday evening, where papers were read, followed by frank discussion. Nothing could exceed the kindness shown in every possible way to myself and other Americans. Mr. John Page Hopps, of Leicester, a fine preacher and good worker, had been appointed to preach the annual sermon, and insisted on having me take his place. The good-will to America and Americans seems universal. On the whole, these Unitarian meetings have been full of encouragement. Their spirit has been uniformly one of determined work, frank speech, clear thought, and generous co-operation. I saw no signs of any conflict between the supernatural and anti-supernatural elements. Deeper scholarship and a profounder religious life have taken the body out of these controversies. As with us, all sections are ready to unite in work.

MANY years ago, it is related, Emerson and Theodore Parker were walking in Concord, when a well-known leader of the Second Adventists rushed up to them in great excitement. "The world ceases at midnight!" he cried out. "Well," replied Parker, coolly, "I am not concerned; I live in Boston." "As for me," added Emerson, "I can get along without it!"

IN October last the foundation-stone of a new "Free Thought Hall," capable of seating about 800 persons, was laid at Dunedin, New Zealand. On Sunday, April 30, this edifice was publicly opened, an excellent address being delivered on the occasion by the Hon. R. Stout, the president of the Association. As illustrating the widespread influence exercised by the Liberal speakers of America, we notice that on the following Sunday a Mr. Bolt was announced to read one of Mr. M. J. Savage's discourses.

At the recent anniversary meeting of the Free Religious Association at Boston, U.S., Mr. S. J. Stewart, in the course of a long and fine address, said:—"While so-called moral men would often rather suffer loss and death than lose their sense of honour; and while, contrariwise men for the sake of a religion will suppress their fine sense of honour; while, too, there is no exact philosophy of religion, and while the most progressive and intelligent men agree that a moral impulse towards excellence and devotion to an ideal is the essence of all that could be good in religion—the reconciliation must be down in a morality which in the interests of truth and personal development demands unrestricted liberty, and then beginning down among the commonest good works ascends into a religion of ideality and reverence, and includes a manhood so sublimated as to appreciate the beauty and mystery in a flower and the sacredness of a child, the charm of the purest music and the glory of a sunset on the Alps, the necessity of devotion to an ideal object of excellence and the mystery behind all manifestations, is the practical aim and reconciliation of any cause for which men plead, and of every eternal principle."

In the last forty years criminal convictions in England have decreased fully one half, while church attendance has declined.

WE observe that one of the outgoing students of the Meadville Theological School this year was a lady, and, we believe, the first lady who has been educated at this school—the Unitarian Home Missionary Board of America. Our readers will be interested in the list of essays by the graduates:—"Mr. Julius Blass, of Baltimore, Md., read a very thoughtful paper on 'Pessimism.' After tracing the history of Pessimism from Buddha down to its modern apostle, Schopenhauer, he gave a very elaborate statement of modern Pessimistic philosophy, and pointed out its truths and its errors. The paper was very carefully prepared, and evinced a thorough study of the subject. Miss Anna J. Norris followed with a highly interesting treatise on 'The Mutual Relations of Philosophy, Theology, and Religion,' showing that none of these three was entirely independent of, or complete without, the other; but that they must each have a definite sphere of action, and only when taken together form a fully rounded whole. After a brief address by Professor Livermore, in which he expressed the gratification which he felt at having both sexes represented in the graduating class, the proceedings were brought to a close. Miss Norris returns to Iowa, and expects to engage in active work in the field there, while Mr. Blass will return to the school in the fall to pursue a post-graduate course."

FATHER TAYLOR, the late eminent sailor-preacher, of Boston, used to allow questions to be put to him during the service. On one occasion he had made some reference to that sweet singer Jenny Lind, who had just arrived in America, when a tall person rose on the pulpit stairs and inquired whether any one who died at one of Miss Lind's concerts would go to Heaven? Disgust and contempt swept across Father Taylor's face as he thundered out at the fellow, "A Christian will go to Heaven whenever he dies, and a fool will be a fool wherever he is—even if he is on the stairs of the pulpit."

WE are pleased to learn that the Sunday School Association has adopted Mrs. Charles Bray's very excellent little manual, "The Elements of Morality, in Easy Lessons, for Home and School Teaching," which was recently reviewed in our columns.

WE learn from our contemporary the Christian World that a "Christian conference" has been set on foot by certain liberal-minded clergymen of various denominations uniting with them, having for its main purpose "to promote mutual knowledge and sympathy between men of various denominations." A fundamental rule of the conference is, "that no denominational limits shall be assigned to its membership," and its general object is "to enable persons of all Christian denominations to compare their views and experiences, with a view to making the life of the English people generally more Christian." It is said that some of the most pronounced opponents of the Leicester Conference are now among the supporters of the new attempt at religious communion irrespective of creed. One meeting has been held, at which at least ten Unitarians were present, but its proceedings were private and unreported. We need scarcely say that this movement has our entire sympathy, but if it is to succeed, it will have to be bolder than the defunct Leicester Conference. That the preliminary meetings should be private and unreported is all right enough, but the liberalism that hesitates to avow itself, or seeks to attract outsiders by promises of secrecy, is doomed to failure.

OUR note of last week in reference to the Bishop of Lincoln and the Temperance question must be considered as withdrawn. The Bishop has addressed the following letter to the Times:

SIR,—A paragraph having appeared purporting to report the contents of a letter from me to the Mayor of Grimsby on the temperance pledge, may I beg the favour of you to state that I have never written any letter to the Mayor of Grimsby, and that I entirely disavow the words ascribed to me? May I also take this opportunity of making an appeal through you for the Church of England Temperance Society in this diocese?—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,
C. LINCOLN.

A PREMATURE announcement of the death of Dr. Close, the late Dean of Carlisle, appeared in some of the daily papers, and was copied into the Inquirer. We are glad to hear that the Dean, although he has been very ill, is recovering.

THE Wesleyan Conference is this year holding its annual meeting at Leeds. The Rev. Charles Garrett, one of the most ardent temperance advocates, was elected President. The numbers on the preliminary ballot were:—the Rev. C. Garrett, 209; T. McCullagh, 68; Dr. Moulton, 61. The present is the 139th Conference of "the people called Methodists."

A CORRESPONDENT writes to protest against the insertion last week, by way of Occasional Note, of the story told in the recently published volume entitled "Natural Religion" of Talleyrand, on the ground that in doing so we meant simply to sneer at those who, with our correspondent, believe "that our Lord did really rise from the dead, and lives now." We cannot congratulate our correspondent on his discernment. We should have thought it perfectly patent to every one that the sarcasm contained in the words of Talleyrand was launched, if at any one, at those who believe in a Christianity minus the miraculous stories connected with the Gospel narratives. Certainly, so far as we are concerned, we had no idea of sneering at the views held by our correspondent, and as the story may fairly be regarded as attacking those held by ourselves, we claim its insertion as evidence of our desire to be fair-minded towards those from whom we differ.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION, GEORGE'S-ROW.

THE Window Gardening Society connected with this Mission held its annual flower show on Tuesday afternoon, July 18. Two hundred and forty plants (including window boxes) were exhibited by sixty-seven persons, and twenty-four prizes were gained. The plants generally were in good condition, with a very fair amount of bloom, and the show, as a whole, was a decided improvement on last year's. The room was tastefully decorated with cut flowers sent by friends from the country, and by a valuable gift of thirty-eight plants, fuchsias, foliage plants, and ferns, kindly presented to the society by Frederick Nettlefold, Esq., who also allowed his gardener to award the prizes. The flower show was visited by friends and exhibitors during the afternoon and evening. At 8.30 a meeting was held for the distribution of the prizes; J. Chatfield Clarke, Esq., in the chair. The Rev. S. A. Barnett, of St. Jude's Church, Whitechapel, who had kindly consented to be present, gave an excellent address on "The Advantages of Flower Cultivation in Great Cities." After an interesting speech from the Chairman, Mrs. Chatfield Clarke presented the prizes to the successful exhibitors. Each of those who, though not taking prizes, were "honourably mentioned," received one of Mr. Nettlefold's beautiful plants and a tastefully illuminated card. The proceedings were enlivened at intervals by glees sung by the choir, and a vote of thanks to the chairman and Mrs. Clarke and the Rev. S. A. Barnett having been carried by acclamation, a very successful evening was concluded by the singing of the National Anthem.

Reviews.

Land Nationalisation. By Alfred Russell Wallace. London: Trübner and Co. 1882.

Of all the institutions in this aristocratic and conservative kingdom there is none that all Tories and most Whigs would defend with more energy of tooth and nail than the Land Laws and the semi-feudal customs, privileges and habits that have arisen out of them. They seem expressly fitted and designed to form and sustain wealthy aristocracies and to favour the accumulation of "more" where there is already "enough," and to hinder the acquirement of enough where there is at present a miserable insufficiency. Under the legislation of landlords the mountains of wealth show no tendency to sink, and the valleys of want and poverty no tendency to rise. The Lord in his Hall "clothed in purple and fine linen, and faring sumptuously every day," and the labourer in his hut ragged and wretched, are contrasts which, so far as they arise from natural differences of character, talent, endowment and energy, are inevitable, and will characterise society more or less at all times, and under all circumstances; but in so far as they are not natural, but artificial, traceable to favouring laws and factitious privileges, upholding one class and depressing another, they are not inevitable, but capable of being avoided; they are unnatural and wrong.

Our author thinks that land, being the basis of all necessary and essential labour, and the primary material upon which it must operate, and being, moreover, limited in quantity and beyond the power of man to increase, ought not to be held as private property, and that the ordinary principles of Free Trade, which work well in all that is increasable and expandible by will and effort, are not applicable to land which is not increasable, but fixed in quantity. If it could be increased in quantity by will and effort of man, there would quickly be an end of the monopoly of landlords, for it would then be open to all who at present suffer from high rents and hard conditions of tenure to apply their abilities in the making of more land, thus effectually reducing rents and altering conditions. But this making of fresh land being clearly impossible, the proprietors of that which exists have it all their own way; and whether they sell it or keep it and let it out for farms or building leases they are in every case masters of the situation, and can insist upon what terms they please. The freedom in the rest of the community to reject these terms and have nothing to do with this rack-rented land is simply the freedom to lie down and die, and that is not reckoned a great privilege by humanity in general, and seldom desired before the natural period of age and decay.

The landlords, then, having had for centuries the power to dictate their own terms, have (as other men would have done in their position) imposed very heavy terms indeed. They have, in general, cast the labour and cost of improving the value of the land (either by building or by agriculture) not on themselves as owners, but on the tenants to whom they have let it, and at the end of every year or term of years have coolly stepped in and taken possession of all the improvements and added values, which they did nothing to create, and demanded a considerably augmented rent for renewed leases or continued occupation. This state of things has existed from a very early period: it has had the sanction of custom, habitude, and legislative enactment; it has ramified, struck out shoots and tendrils in all directions, and introduced complications and difficulties in social and family affairs so many and so formidable that a remedy for the evil seems now almost impracticable. And yet it behoves the most capable of our thinking politicians to find out a remedy; for we cannot go on for ever under our present system—the landlords imposing heavy conditions on their leaseholders; these, in their turn seeking compensation and profit by still heavier conditions on those to whom they sub-let, and so on, grade after grade downwards, each clutching at some advantage, until we reach the poor day-labourer, who has nothing left but the crumbs that have fallen from the tables of those who sit above him. Mr. Wallace's remedy, as set forth in this volume, is to abolish landlordism altogether and to take all land into the ownership of the State, compensation being given to the existing proprietors in the form of annuities equivalent to their present nett income, to be continued beyond their own lives to any heir or heirs who may be living at the time of the passing of the proposed Act, but not to go on in perpetuity. The State having in this way acquired ownership, it should, according to our author, let out the land in small or large portions at perpetual quit rents of definite amount to such persons only as intend to occupy and use it in some productive way, sub-letting not being allowed, nor mortgages, except by permission of the Land Courts, and under exceptional circumstances.

This scheme will have to be considered and reconsidered again and again by the wisest heads, ere it can take a workable form. By what method and agency are the quit-rents due to the State to be collected? And is eviction to be the penalty of non-payment or irregularity in paying? The prohibition of sub-letting and mortgages, how is that effectually to be carried out? The State cannot have such an inquisitorial power over its tenants as to know at all times what they are doing, and sub-letting and mortgaging might go on under new names with feigning and subterfuge, without the State knowing anything about it. A sub-tenant might be called a manager or steward, and a mortgage might be called a loan. By means of loans it might be possible for some of the old dispossessed and compensated landlords to gain a virtual repossession and control of their former properties. Again, as a tenant, according to this well-meaning scheme, would be justly entitled to call absolutely his own whatever improvements he may have made, or whatever buildings he may have erected by his own labour and cost; are we to understand that he would be free at any time to sell the portion of the property created by himself? How could he do that without also transferring the occupancy of the land upon which the improvements and buildings had been made? If allowed to make this transfer would not the State as ground landlord, entitled to the quit rent, require some guarantee for the payment of that quit rent by the new comer in the very possible case that his means and his character could not be very confidently relied on? And would there not be sometimes in these cases of transfer a secret bargaining which would frustrate the intention of the scheme? Might not the outgoing occupier secretly demand a premium of the incoming one for the supposed advantage of the transfer? If so, would such an act be essentially different in its consequences from the present practice of demanding fines on the renewal of leases? As the present value of occupied land consists of two parts,—the natural or inherent value, and the factitious or added value, it is not yet quite clear to our minds how the State could become owners of the first without interfering in some way with the second, seeing that these factitious or added values are not movable things like goods and chattels. The State, according to this scheme, would not purchase both values; but we fear it would be found very difficult indeed to draw the line between what it had paid for and what it had not.

With reference to the distribution of land under this scheme Mr. Wallace gives us two statements which are or at least seem a little at variance with each other. At page 206 of this volume he would allow millionaires and great land-owners still to retain possession of their enormous estates, provided they retained them for personal occupation; but at page 216 we are told that every Englishman should be allowed once in his life to select a plot of land for his personal occupation, and that in quantity or size it should never be less than one acre nor more than five. There is something here which requires to be explained and made consistent. How can "every Englishman" be limited to five acres of occupation and yet great land-owners be allowed expansion over hundreds and thousands? Does not the phrase "every Englishman" include within it every great landlord possessing land in England? As for providing every Englishman who should desire it and be ready to conform to terms and conditions, with a plot of ground for personal occupation, it is only possible on the assumption that a very limited number would feel the desire and make the application; but then why use the word "every," with this limitation of meaning? It is misleading. Again, it would seem, if we rightly understand this scheme, that these amateur settlers on the land would have the right to make their selections out of large farms already occupied, provided they made the required payments. This would sometimes work rather unpleasantly; for though the great majority of these new occupiers of land would probably be quiet, respectable people, there would now and then be a few with habits, tastes and modes of life exceedingly unpleasant in a quiet neighbourhood. It is rather hard that a farmer should be required, even for adequate payment, to slice off a little bit from the borders of his farm for the accommodation of a new occupier from a distance who might like perhaps to open a beershop or establish some place of vulgar and noisy entertainment for the rustics. There might be a good separating space between the homestead and this kind of nuisance; but even distance in such cases, unless it is very considerable indeed, fails to "land enchantment to the view." We readily admit that the welfare of the many is a higher consideration than the comfort of the few; but there are cases in which the "many" are not concerned. It is the few against the few, and in the case of intruders of the kind just alluded to, the farmer might reasonably be allowed to "show cause" why he should not be disturbed.

We welcome this book as a very earnest and thoughtful effort to solve one of the most difficult and painful problems of the age. A great deal more has yet to be said about it both pro and con, and we trust that Mr. Wallace himself will return to the subject at some future time. He has abundance of talent for further investigations, and he seems not at all wanting in generous sympathy with the poor and low, and in earnest desire to uplift them out of that degradation and misery into which the present land system almost necessarily forces them. E. A.

Short Notices.

In Memoriam: Ralph Waldo Emerson. Recollections of his Visits to England in 1833, 1847-8, 1872-3, and Extracts from Unpublished Letters. By Alexander Ireland. (London: Simpkin, Marshall and Co.)—The substance of this highly appreciative memoir appeared in the Manchester Examiner and Times the day after the news of Mr. Emerson's death reached this country. It is now reprinted with extensive additions, which make it an exceedingly welcome and valuable memento of the brilliant writer and splendid man who so recently passed from the world.

Compilations on Piety and Morality. Collected by Peter Dean. (London: 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, 1882.)—As the preface says, this is a little work made up of great thoughts. One of the uses to which the compiler claims it can be put is that of a supplementary lectionary in the few free churches in which lessons are read from books other than the Bible. It certainly contains some most valuable thoughts from such writers as St. Chrysostom, St. Augustine, Thomas à Kempis, Pascoe, Fenelon, Bacon, Quarles, St. Thomas Browne, Jeremy Taylor, Socrates, Plato, and a score other such like.

Literary Notes.

Under the title "The Ancient Manuscripts of the New Testament for English Readers," the Rev. F. F. Basset, of Dulverton Rectory, will shortly issue a translation of the five earliest MSS. of the New Testament—viz., the Vatican, Sinaitic, Alexandrine, Codex Ephraem, and the Codex Bezae. The work will be published by Mr. Elliot Stock.

The firm of Herrmann Loescher, of Turin, has published the Memoirs of George Pallavicini, which contains the story of more than half a century, that is, from 1786 to 1848. These memoirs, written by Pallavicini himself, and now collected and published under the supervision of his wife, describe with terrible vividness the bloody five days of Milan, and bear the impression of the author's chivalrous and generous character.

In the July number of Westermann's Monats-Hefte, Herr K. Biedermann draws attention to some hitherto unprinted MSS. of the philosopher Liebnitz. The writer asserts, moreover, that there are several boxes in the Royal Library at Hanover containing the correspondence of Liebnitz with the great men of his times and other interesting documents. As these are now the property of the German Government, he hopes for some better result to the world.

THE memorial statue of William Tyndale, the martyr, who translated the new Testament, is now being designed by Mr. J. E. Boehm, R.A., and will occupy a site in the Thames Embankment gardens west of Charing-cross. The total cost will be £2,400, and more than half of this is subscribed by individual donors.

MR. JAMES CARLYLE, of Newlands, near Ecclefechan, has recently erected a large tombstone to the memory of his two brothers, Thomas and John Aitken. Near the top of the stone is the motto, "Humiliate," and underneath the Carlyle arms (!). The inscription reads, as far as regards Thomas:—"Here rests Thomas Carlyle, who was born at Ecclefechan, 4th December, 1795, and died at 24, Cheyne-row, Chelsea, London, on Saturday, 5th February, 1881."

MR. JOHN MORLEY'S monograph on Rousseau has been translated into Russian.

MR. THOMAS HUGHES has just completed his "Memoir of Daniel Macmillan." The volume will be published immediately. It is just twenty-five years since Mr. Macmillan died. Along with his younger brother, the present head of the firm, he started at Cambridge the business of Macmillan and Co., now one of the largest and most famous publishing houses in the kingdom.

MESSRS. CHATTO AND WINDUS have issued a new and uniform edition of the works of Mr. Charles Reade. It is handsomely bound, and illustrated by Mr. Du Maurier, Mr. W. Small, and other well-known artists.

A New volume of the Classified Catalogue of the Library of the Royal Institution of Great Britain, by Mr. Vincent, the librarian, is now ready.

ANOTHER volume of Mr. Gairdner's "Calendar of Letters and Papers of the Reign of Henry VIII.," including the year 1534, is in the press; also the continuation of the "Calendar of Treasury Papers for the Reign of George I.," edited by Mr. Joseph Redington.

KINGSWOOD, NEAR BIRMINGHAM.—The monthly meeting of ministers of Warwickshire and the adjoining counties was held at Kingswood last week, when, according to his usual custom, the minister of the place invited the wives and eldest daughters of the ministers to join the assembly. Mr. George St. Clair, of the Church of the Saviour, Birmingham, delivered a thoughtful and instructive discourse on the moral teachings of the ancient sages, which were not to be disparaged though preceding the sacred writings of Christians. The business of the Association was conducted after the service, the Rev. James Taplin in the chair. It was stated that arrangements are making for celebrating the centenary of the Society in the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, in the course of the autumn. The next meeting is to be held at Tamworth. After a cold collation, to which forty sat down, the Chairman gave the Queen, and speaking of the length of her reign, expressed a hope that she might live to see her jubilee, and should he be spared to witness it, he would be able to say what few could, that he participated in the rejoicings on occasion of the jubilee of her grandfather, George III., and those of his granddaughter, Victoria. Excellent speeches were subsequently delivered by Mr. G. St. Clair, the Revs. A. Lancaster, E. Parry, M.A., A. W. Worthington, W. Carey Walters, D. Maginnis, and H. McKean. The meeting closed with a hearty vote of thanks to the venerable chairman and the friends at Kingswood for their friendly and hospitable reception.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in Packets labelled—"JAMES EPPS & Co. Homeopathic Chemists, London." Also makers of Epps's Chocolate Essence for afternoon use.

Our Contemporaries.

THE SALVATION ARMY.

The Spectator writes:—

So soon as the Salvation Army begins, in any mind whatever, to make deeper and truer Christianity seem tame and poor and uninteresting—so soon as it begins to retard the inward life, to make the kingdom of God seem more showy and less searching than it really is, so soon it comes under the condemnation passed upon those who, not being with Christ, are against him, since they are slackening the control of his spirit, and rendering looser the bonds of his influence. The whole question seems to us to be one of the direction in which this sort of sensational influence in the case of any one person tends. And it is clear that however indefinite the supply of persons to whom its methods are at first suited, it cannot long keep a healthy influence over any one mind in its present noisy and pretentious state. The man who is prepared to go on from year to year enjoying the "great exhibition of Hallelujah Lassies," "Hallelujah gallops," "tremendous Free and Easies," "great charges on the Devil," and so forth, is not becoming a better Christian, and will soon cease to be a Christian in tendency at all. It is only because these sensational proceedings catch hold of the drinker, the profligate, the swindler, the brute, and make a change in the right direction, in the direction of producing Christian feeling in him, that they can be called, in any sense Christian. It is obvious enough that true humility, the awful sense of the lurking evil in the highest natures, the thirst for the life that is hid with Christ in God, cannot possibly be fostered by means of "shouting, dancing, handkerchief-waving, flag-flying, shouts of laughter, volley-firing," and so on. So far as this sort of religion is good at all, it is good only to those whom it draws away from something worse, and pushes on to something better. We may honestly say that to any one who has the least glimmer of what Christianity really is to the inward life, this sort of thing is a mere vulgar vexation, absolutely and radically inconsistent with it. But it does not follow in the least that it is a vulgar vexation to those who, if they had not been with the Salvation Army, would have been in a prize-fight or a gin tavern, or breaking all the laws of God and man. To our minds, the Salvation Army is good only for recruits from the Damnation Army, and to them only while they remain raw recruits. We can hardly imagine it possible for even those good persons who feel most profoundly and most disinterestedly the infinite joy of rescuing the apparently hopeless victims of evil from its toils, and who realise that by these coarse methods, and by these coarse methods only, can the rescue be achieved, to find in themselves anything but disgust at the social harlequinry of all these gymnastics of the soul, at the intolerable buffoonery of these mock surrenders to the spirit of him who, because he himself was "meek and lowly of heart," spoke of his yoke as being easy, and his burden as being light.

CLERICALISM AT OXFORD.

The Pall Mall Gazette writes:—

There is an impression abroad that with the University Tests Act and the growing spirit of liberalism in the University itself there is an end of the old system of clerical intolerance at Oxford. It is even sometimes pretended that orthodoxy and its representatives are now at as great a disadvantage as freethought was some years ago, and that the new masters of the situation are making as unscrupulous a use of their power as the clerical party were once wont to do, subjecting men of opposite views to material pains and penalties. To all innocent believers in this ingenious fiction we commend the following true incident in the most recent history of Oxford. All the colleges have during the last few weeks been busy in electing "Tutorial Fellows" under the new statutes. The great majority of the recently elected fellows, however, are not new men, but such of the old staff of fellows as had been devoting or intended to devote themselves to the work of teaching in their respective colleges. Except for some special reason, the election of present working fellows to tutorial fellowships under the new statutes was generally and justly regarded as a mere formality. The dullness of these formal proceedings has, however, been strikingly relieved by the action of one eminent and famous college. It so happens that Christ Church not only has a large number of clergymen among its fellows (or "senior students" as it prefers to call them), but enjoys in addition thereto the privilege of being governed, not like other colleges by the ignoble vulgar of fellows alone, but over and above these by six great dignitaries of the Church, known as Canons, and vulgarly supposed to override the small fry of actual teachers with whom they are associated. Under these circumstances it is not surprising that the atmosphere of this privileged society should be decidedly clerical; and, that being so, a little bit of sharp practice now and then in the interest of the faith might fairly be expected. But the event has far surpassed all ordinary expectation.

Among the late fellows and tutors of this highly favoured college was a certain gentleman held in great repute throughout the university both for his own learning in the branch of studies most peculiar to and characteristic of Oxford, and for his skill in imparting his knowledge to others. Unfortunately for him, however, he is also generally reputed to hold "advanced views" on theological questions. It might, indeed, seem that his opinions on theology, which he does not profess to teach, were nil ad rem, and that, in accordance with the rule universally followed at other colleges, a teaching fellow of acknowledged capacity and no inconsiderable service could not fail to be re-elected under the new statutes. The re-election, however, was objected to in the Electoral Board of the college by one or two clerical members, and the objection, though disregarded by the Board, caused the matter to come before the Governing Body. The Governing Body, in which the question was deliberately made to turn upon theological grounds, decided against re-election by sixteen votes to eleven. In the minority were the head of the college and almost all the teaching staff who belong to the Governing Body, including, it is only fair to say, the ablest and most distinguished of the younger High Churchmen of Oxford and several older clergymen. In the majority were all the Canons, the other non-working "senior students," and two of the teaching staff, all clerics. It is not perhaps surprising that the majority, consisting almost entirely of persons taking no part in the educational business of the college, should have been as regardless of its interests as a place of learning as they were keen to preserve its reputation as a stronghold of clericalism. They have only acted as they might be expected to act. What practical people will want to know is, why such a body should be allowed to override the wishes of the actual workers on a question exclusively affecting the college work. That the rejected gentleman himself has been treated with singular unfairness and ingratitude is palpable, but it is the least part of the matter. He will doubtless have many other opportunities of continuing his successful career as a tutor and lecturer at Oxford. It is Christ Church that is the principal sufferer. But then educational institutions must be expected to pay something for the honour and glory of being governed by Canons.

"NATURAL RELIGION."

The Pall Mall Gazette, in the course of a review of the new work by the author of "Ecce Homo," writes:—

From a historical point of view we may observe that modern Christianity is here admitted to be sunk in formalism, and to need a new deliverance. We cannot tell what the process will be. How, then, do we know that what comes out of it may not be quite as different from historical Christianity as that is from Judaism, and in some no less unexpected way? And how are we entitled to retain the name of Christianity except provisionally, for the essential religion of morality which, in our author's conception, is the living soul veiled by the external religion of dogmas? And from the philosophical point of view we may say that we expect, and mankind expects, something more of religion than to furnish us with an ideal; though the bulk of mankind have naturally but a confused apprehension of what they want. The difficulty of civilised man is not that he is in want of an ideal, but that he has so many. It would seem, according to our author's conceptions, that a man may have two or more religions at once. Who can tell that at certain times they may not point, or seem to point, to divergent paths? And if so, which is to prevail? The problem is to regulate the mutual relations and precedence of apparently conflicting ideals which offer themselves for our acceptance. A religion in the fullest sense, we conceive, must be a theory of life undertaking to do nothing less than this. That religion means much less to a great number of men—or, indeed, to most men—is not to the purpose. To some it may mean going to church on Sundays, and there going to sleep; to others, offering a stated number of human sacrifices on the customary feast days. But this concerns not our author nor ourselves; we are dealing with people who have come to think seriously. Now Catholicism or Mohammedanism or Calvinism does undertake openly and boldly the task just mentioned. It gives not only something to live for, but something to live for with an exclusive, or at least a paramount devotion—at the cost, no doubt, of starving some kinds of aspiration or wholly suppressing them. In our own time Comte had the merit of perceiving the magnitude of the problem, though but few are found to maintain that he successfully solved it. If this be so, there is a great battle still to be fought out; between different religions, or between religion and infidelity, call it what you will. The knocks were no softer in the Civil War because the Parliament still used the King's name in fighting the King's troops.

It may be said, on the other hand, that there is no final issue to such a battle; that the ordering of life as a whole is not a matter of set rule, but to be worked out in knowledge or action by every one for himself, and that this is just the secret of modern philosophy. Perhaps this was what Goethe meant in his saying, adopted by our author, "Wer Wissenschaft un Kunst besitzt, Der hat Religion." But if this be so, again, it would seem idle for religion to seek a new specific form; it is something which lives in many forms, and therefore will not be confined to any one. And when a man has found his own harmony of life, surely it matters comparatively little whether he calls it religion or not; and, considering the doubt whether it is communicable save by example, he may more wisely take for his precept Noli amulari than Accingere gladio tuo. Finally, we must note that supernaturalism suddenly comes back again in our author's last page or two, where, though he has carefully treated it as separable from religion, he still gravely doubts if it be not, in some form or other, needful for man's happiness. It shows either a singular uncertainty of grasp, or a singular degree of candour that he is content thus to weaken his position as against those who maintain the ordinary supernatural creeds on the ordinary grounds.

The Academy writes:—

Much had happened between the date of the publication of "Essays and Reviews" in 1860 and the time when "Ecce Homo," in 1866, was half accepted by the orthodox as an ally, if not a champion, of the cause they held dear. Almost more has happened between the publication of "Ecce Homo" and the present day. The public mind has come to regard as open questions, not only the infallibility of the Christian Scriptures, not only the supernatural origin of the Christian Revelation, but the fundamental axioms of all religion as hitherto understood in Europe. Of course the former points of controversy are by no means abandoned; there is probably still a majority of educated Englishmen who believe as heartily as they believed five and twenty years ago, not only in the truth of the Apostles' Creed, but in the plenary inspiration of the Bible. Still, before 1860, they not only believed in these doctrines, but thought that the world was agreed upon them, that all who doubted them were actuated by dislike of moral restraint, by vanity, or at best by a habit of paradoxical reasoning that had destroyed their common sense. But between 1860 and 1870 they learnt that in both points their belief was rejected by men who were both virtuous, candid, and practically intelligent; between 1870 and 1882 they have learnt that virtuous, candid, and intelligent men may be not only unorthodox or rationalistic thinkers, but, in the common sense of the words, Atheists and Materialists. There seems to be a sort of intellectual quietism, a willingness to swim with the tide of scientific opinion, which is hardly worthy of the author's courage. Of course, in a work on National Religion it is not necessary to discuss the Christian evidences. But the old questions which it was understood a hundred years ago that natural religion was concerned to answer—"Is there a God—i.e., a living and personal one? Is there a future life?"—these questions call for an answer still; and it is hardly a satisfactory one, "Whether there be or no, the progress of thought will tell us. But, whether there be or no, it is worth while to be good."

"THE REV. F. R. YOUNG, D.D., AND THE 'INQUIRER.'"

Under this heading the Swindon Advertiser, has an article from which we take the following premising that we should be obliged if any of our American readers would inform us whether there really is an "American Anthropological University" at St. Louis, and whether it is a chartered institution empowered to confer degrees in Divinity or any other branch of knowledge:—

We are indebted to some unknown friend for a copy of the July number of "The Shield of Faith. A Journal devoted to the defence of Christianity and an Exposure and Refutation of Infidelity. Editor, Rev. George Sexton, LL.D.; assistant editor, Rev. Frederic Rowland Young, D.D." Turning over the leaves in search after some reason for our having been thus favoured, at page 146 we chanced to fall upon the words, "American Anthropological University, St. Louis," "a minister whom Unitarians recognised as one of their best men for over twenty years has been thought worthy of a doctor's degree," and "a joke." Turning back to the beginning of the article we found it to read as follows:—"The Inquirer has an extraordinarily keen perception for jokes, it can detect something funny in the most dull and common place matter of fact. A week or two ago our Unitarian contemporary gave its readers the benefit of the following:—Some of our readers will see with great amusement the following paragraph extracted from Dr. Sexton's Shield of Faith:—'The officers and faculty of the 'American Anthropological University,' St. Louis, have conferred the degree of 'Doctor of Divinity' upon the Rev. F. R. Young, the assistant editor of this paper. This honour came to our friend perfectly unexpectedly to him, and without any solicitation, direct or indirect, on his part.' 'Dr. Frederic Rowland Young's religious services at Camden Town, which were so extensively advertised some months ago, have come to an end, and the Rev. Doctor is open to engagements 'in any evangelical pulpit,' as we hear from the same paper, where also we read:—'Dr. Rowland Young, at the request of the deacons, will conduct the Thursday evening services at the Rev. J. Baldwin Brown's Church, Brighton-road, during the months of June and July. He supplied Mr. Brown's pulpit at that gentleman's personal request on April 23rd.' We wish the Editor of the Inquirer had told us where the 'great amusement' comes in, that we might know when to laugh while reading the paragraph. There is evidently a joke somewhere, but we can't detect it. Is there anything funny in the fact that Dr. Young, who was once a Unitarian, now desires engagements in Evangelical pulpits, or in his services having closed at Camden Town after being 'extensively advertised?' Or does the joke consist in his preaching for the Rev. Baldwin Brown? Or are we expected to laugh because a minister whom Unitarians recognised as one of their best men for over twenty years has been thought worthy of a doctor's degree? Will some kind Unitarian friend who is familiar with the utterances of the Inquirer point out to us the fun of the paragraph in question? We promise him when he does, we will laugh heartily. A joke in the Inquirer is a great novelty; it is a pity that when there is one there it can't be discovered."

To comment on the above extract is by no means an easy thing, and we are inclined to think the Inquirer was right in its conclusion that the subject matter could only create great amusement. To reason seriously on a matter that can only create amusement is a task we will not undertake. But if the task be a difficult one to the Inquirer, what, we would ask, must be the position of a journalist living in the very centre of the district where the newly-fledged D.D. passed those twenty years during which he was recognised by the Unitarians as one of their best men? We certainly should like to be furnished with the names and addresses of any two sane and respectable members of the Unitarian body who for over twenty years recognised as one of their best men the minister who has been thought worthy of a doctor's degree. We are willing to accept the Rev. Frederic Rowland Young, D.D., as one of the number: Where, oh where, shall we look for the other? We will not attempt to decide whether or not the Rev. F. R. Young was recognised as the best or as the worst man the Unitarians had for over twenty years, but we can say we have met with men who have thought it of the first necessity to have a very ready perception of the distinguishing features of all the religious as well as irreligious bodies extant, as well as a most ready speech, to be able to say exactly to what body he did belong. There may be some who will recollect that it is not many years since (but long before the American Anthro-logical University of St. Louis had an existence), certainly within the last ten years, the present sub-editor of the Shield of Faith was so disgusted with all professors of religious faith that he objected to be classed along with any of them, and that by public advertisement he repudiated the prefix of "Rev." and requested that he might be known only as "Mr." for ever thereafter. Fortunately we are spared all trouble about titles and degrees. In England they are an honour to be prized by all men. In America they are a very different kind of thing. We would not be mistaken: In America there are Universities and degrees as honourable in everything but age as anything we have in England, and which may be as fairly won and worn. But in America the spurious title and degree is so common, and the mushroom University or degree and title giving power so brazen in its operations, that Americans, whose labours and learning would do credit to any University, never, or but seldom, use the titles and degrees which may be conferred upon them. In England the right of a University to confer degrees is obtained only after long and distinguished work open and known to the whole world. Against the American Anthropological University of St. Louis we can say not a word. It may be a duly constituted University, and it may be doing a very good work; but it must be very new. If it be made of gingerbread there can scarcely yet have been time enough for its gilt to tarnish. The Rev. Frederic Rowland Young may be its first, and he may be its last Doctor of Divinity for aught we know. Indeed, all that is certain about the University itself is its uncertainty. We had thought we knew something by name at least of the schools, colleges, and Universities of St. Louis from personal visits we had made to that city, and some intercourse with some of its leading people. But for the life of us we could not bring to mind the "American Anthropological University of St. Louis."

UNITARIAN CHAPEL, BRIGHTON.—I.

More than one of the Brighton newspapers have recently been giving accounts of Christ Church (Free Christian or Unitarian), in New-road, one of them a conspicuously unfair and one-sided sketch. The Sussex Daily News, a very able Liberal journal, has given in three successive numbers a long and almost exhaustive history of Unitarianism in Brighton, from which we take the following interesting passages:—

The Unitarians in Brighton, after an existence of nearly a century, can boast of the possession of one place of worship only—a building of moderate size—in a town containing over a hundred thousand inhabitants. Statistically considered, the denomination cannot, therefore, be regarded as a success in Brighton; but this is a remark which applies with equal force to the entire body.

The Rev. FREEMAN CLARKE, D.D., an eminent American minister, when preaching in connection with the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association recently, said:—"Unitarians, as a denomination, are a small body everywhere." It is clear, however, that mere numbers do not furnish the only criteria for judging of success in matters of this kind; and Unitarians claim to have accomplished a work the importance of which is out of all proportion to the comparatively small results capable of being tabulated. The preacher already quoted from claims for Unitarianism that, whilst in itself, as a sect, numerically small, it has leavened the religious thought and feeling of the present day. He says: "And now the leading minds in the great Churches, both in England and America, have come to the same ground that our fathers occupied. They do not call themselves Unitarians, nor do we ask them to do so, so long as they see objections to our name. But whether they are one with us or not, we are one with them, one with Robertson and Maurice, Stanley and Jowett, and many other great thinkers of the same class."

It so happens that we are in a position to present a sketch of the history of the Unitarian Church in Brighton from the very first, and anyone perusing it will not be so much surprised to find that, as a denomination, it makes so little show in the town compared with some other religious bodies, as to find that it has survived at all, in spite of all it had to encounter in the earlier stages of its existence especially.

This article is not intended either as an apology for Unitarianism, nor as a critical essay upon it, but it is perhaps only fair to say that the term

Unitarian is adopted by persons who, whilst agreed in not holding the doctrine of the Trinity, and in rejecting other doctrines generally understood by the term orthodox, vary very considerably from each other in their respective religious views. Much of the intense prejudice against the Unitarian is due to the impression that Jesus Christ is slightly and disrespectfully thought of, and spoken of by them, instead of His being, as is actually the case, regarded with the highest veneration and reverence, though a reverence stopping short, of course, of divine honour. In a Unitarian journal called The Christian Life it is sometimes difficult to realise that it is a "heterodox" publication one is reading, such passages as the following, for instance, scarcely sound like excerpts from a Unitarian sermon:—"As Christians, we all feel that, in the way of eminence, there is one, and but one, author of salvation; only one name that can be named. What he suffered, and by suffering accomplished, is told to successive generations in such ways as will best reach their understandings, and do them good. There are forms of the story that could not now be acceptable to us. But we have our own forms, and very impressive they are. . . . Nevertheless, one is eminent, one pre-eminent, because his is the great light that has gone round the world, he is the sun whose beams have warmed and cheered us. It is by him that hope has been excited, that hearts have been gladdened, that human nature has been refined and raised, and affliction and death have been hallowed." The sermon concluded with the following lines descriptive of Christ:—

"He is a path, if any be misled,
He is a robe, if any naked be;
If any chance to hunger, he is bread;
If any be a bondman, he is free;
If any be but weak, how strong is he!
To dead men life he is, to sick men health;
To blind men sight, and to the needy wealth;
A pleasure without loss, a treasure without stealth."

The "orthodox" could scarcely go much further. The Christian Life, however, can perhaps hardly be regarded as representing the general body of Unitarians, although some members value it very highly.

Whatever may be the case in other places, the Unitarians in Brighton are, so far as we can trace, as regards their doctrinal position, in general accordance with the opinions advocated in the Inquirer, and of the Unitarian Herald. In a recent number of the former such expressions are used in reference to Christ as, "the dear master and brother," and in the latter the following passage occurs:—"Jesus was inspired to live the sublime doctrines which he taught. Men said: 'These doctrines are true, beautiful, divine; but who can put them into practice?' Jesus opened his mind to God in prayer, and God's inspiration filled his spirit, and then he absorbed the doctrines into his being. He was an incarnation of the Golden Rule, he was an embodiment of the Lord's Prayer. He was the Sermon on the Mount in a real, personal, human life. God has pointed the millions of Christendom to Jesus for two thousand years, and said:—'Behold, what man can do and be under the divine influence!' A theory or doctrine may have the image of Deity and the superscription of eternal love; but men are always ready to ask the question: 'Can it be clothed in human flesh?' And we are prepared to answer that everyone that will obey the laws which govern his spirit can live divinest gospel that heaven ever sent to earth. The inspiration which we receive from Jesus, then, lies in his life more than in his gospel; but had there been no inspiration, there would have been no Jesus." The orthodox will naturally take exception to this passage and to the article on "Inspiration," in which it occurs: but no one can fail when reading it to be struck with the exalted position—from a Unitarian standpoint—that is assigned to Jesus Christ, in current Unitarian literature. A similar tone pervades the services used at Christ Church, and finds expression in the pulpit repeatedly.

It was in the year 1791 that the late Mr. William Stevens, then a young man and deeply religious, came to reside in Brighton, where he soon became associated with the Calvinistic Baptists; meeting in what was then known as New-street, but now as Bond-street. Mr. Thomas Vine was the Pastor, and Mr. Stevens explains how the change of view which so distressed and agitated the little Church at New-street came about. This is particularly interesting since no trace of "the origin" of this "evil," as it was regarded, appears in the church records. Mr. Stevens says:—About that time Mr. Elhanan Winchester, from America, was preaching with great earnestness the doctrine of universal restoration. Mr. Vidler, the then minister at Battle, communicated these ideas to some of the Calvinist Baptists at Brighton about the year 1795, and the result was that about eighteen persons, together with one of their ministers, Mr. Vine, became converts. The trustees became alarmed, and soon called a church meeting, and all those who could not agree with the eternal torment dogma were excommunicated; there were thus nineteen members sent abroad into the world. The meeting, it will be seen by a reference to our account of the "Baptist Churches," was held on October 13th, 1793. In the records of the Baptist Church there is nothing to show what became of these excommunicated members, but Mr. Stevens supplies the omission, and says:—"They met together at different times at friends' houses for religious services and inquiries, and through the spirit of inquiry a difference of opinion ensued between them, which soon led to their number separating; some went back to their old church, others went into the world, and all were again scattered." Mr. William Stevens in this dilemma took a bold step, and, undeterred by the discouraging aspect of affairs and the disunited condition of the wanderers from the orthodox fold, determined to open his own house for religious worship. The first service was held on May 7th, 1797. The congregation was not a large one, since it consisted only of four young men, in addition to the members of his own family. Mr. Stevens's congregation, however, soon increased, as that gentleman did not depend upon his own quasi-ministerial efforts, but availed himself of the services of several lay-preachers, and, by establishing a meeting for conference and discussion, which met once every Sunday, he kept up the interest by fostering a spirit of inquiry. All this time there was, so far as can be traced, no idea that the little gathering would develop into a Unitarian cause. On the contrary, when, as was presently the case, it was resolved to form a Church, the society was considered as a branch of the General Baptist Society at Worship-street, London. There were fourteen persons present at the ceremony of forming the church. Mr. Vidler who was then minister of Parliament Court Chapel, London, presided, and one of the members of the newly-constituted society, Mr. Gillam, a layman, was invited to become the preacher. In December, 1799, four persons were baptized at Ditchling by Mr. Vidler. We are informed that fraternal connections still exist between the Churches at Ditchling and Brighton. At the anniversary services, held on the first Sunday in July, friends from Brighton constitute a large part of the congregation, and the occasion is one of considerable interest.

In the course of the four years' during which time the services were held at Mr. Stevens's house, the attendance increased to about fifty, and it was, therefore, "thought advisable," says Mr. Stevens, "to accept an offer of a small chapel in Jew-street at a low rent." The only place of worship with which we are acquainted as having existed in the somewhat obscure thoroughfare indicated is a small Synagogue or Jewish school, which does not, however, appear to be the building here referred to. The Jew-street Chapel was opened for religious worship and for conference meetings in April, 1806. For a time a considerable amount of success attended this new departure. Mr. Stevens says:—"During the time of their meeting in this place they were frequently assisted by the ministers of the Lewes, Southover and Ditchling congregations, in Sunday-evening lectures, which drew together large congregations." It has several times been remarked in the course of these articles that Sunday evening services were quite the exception in Brighton, a circumstance that no doubt was favourable to the attendance in Jew-street at the evening lectures. It would appear that, although the congregation had been accustomed to meet together for nearly ten years, the doctrines held had not assumed a very definite form—thanks partly no doubt to the constant conferences, which must have been unfavourable to anything like a determinate creed. The crisis, however, drew on; and Mr. Stevens very well described it in the following passages:—"It appears that up to this time the doctrinal views of the society had not yet developed themselves into Unitarian, although, one by one, some of the orthodox dogmas had been given up; but Mr. Wright, the Unitarian missionary, visiting Brighton, the subject of the Trinity became one of serious inquiry, and many of the members embraced the doctrine of the Unity of God, and Mr. Gillam, the lay preacher, publicly preached it. This caused great offence to many, who seceded, and thereby greatly diminished the number of the congregation, and most of the pulpits of the town sounded the alarm of heresy that had lately shown itself; yet the little society persevered and kept themselves together." It is clear that the church may be described from this time as a Unitarian one, of which Mr. Gillam was the first minister. The new order of things commenced very inauspiciously, for we are told that "Very soon after this Mr. Gillam resigned his office as minister through some misunderstanding." Things were so discouraging indeed "that it was thought the society must be broken up." Mr. William Stevens, in this crisis of the church's history, for the second time helped them out of their difficulty, and, at the unanimous request of the members, who were very anxious still to keep together, consented to take the lead in the religious services at Jew-street Chapel.

At this time, it appears, Mr. J. Chatfield, a wealthy gentleman, settled in Brighton with his family, and, becoming a regular attendant at the Unitarian Chapel, exercised a very beneficial influence upon the little cause. Mr. Stevens says that "by his timely aid and advice," this gentleman "gave fresh courage to the society," that "he always showed himself a firm and substantial friend, the congregation being much indebted to him for their present position." It was probably through the good offices of Mr. Chatfield that the affairs of the society at Brighton were brought before the notice of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, by whom the Church was assisted: an appeal was also made to the friends in Brighton, Lewes, and other places, for funds, to purchase a larger chapel. The efforts of the friends were crowned with success, and the new building, situated in Cavendish-street, and afterwards known as the Biblical Lecture Room, was opened for public worship in July, 1812, by the Rev. R. Aspland, of Hackney. Tolerably large congregations attended. Mr. William Stevens was engaged to preach on Sunday morning, and Mr. Bennett, of Ditchling, in the evening, which he continued to do till he left Brighton for Poole. The debates were still kept up; since, in his account, Mr. Stevens says:—"Conference meetings were held on Sunday afternoons for the discussion of doctrinal and other subjects." This, so far as the writer is aware, is, or rather was, a feature peculiar to the Unitarians. There is nothing of the kind now at Christ Church. The services in Cavendish-street were for the most part carried on in the manner described till the year 1817, assistance being occasionally received from several London ministers at intervals; amongst those specially mentioned by Mr. Stevens are Dr. Abraham Rees, Dr. Thomas Rees, Dr. Evans, and Mr. Madge.

"About the year 1817, Dr. Morell, who was classical tutor at Mr. Aspland's," the gentleman it will be remembered who conducted the opening service at Cavendish-street Chapel, "removed to Brighton, and the congregation were greatly pleased when he engaged to preach for them, and to do the best he could to forward their cause—he being a very talented man." The hopes excited by Dr. Morell at this time were rudely dashed; for the rev. gentleman, instead of fulfilling his pledges, "very soon altered his mind, and opened his own school-room in Gloster place for religious services, thereby dividing a small congregation." Dr. Morell, however, soon removed to Hove. The little congregation in Cavendish-street, undaunted by the disappointment it had sustained, and by the repeated divisions that have been noticed, kept bravely on. It must have been in a very low condition financially, for the church could not afford to engage a minister. The principal part of the duties rested upon Mr. Stevens, who seems never to have wearied in his efforts on behalf of the congregation to which he was so warmly attached. In 1818, when the collapse of the Unitarian cause might not unreasonably have been looked for, it suddenly started upon a fresh and comparatively ambitious career. Mr. J. Chatfield, whose good offices on behalf of the society have already been noticed, availed himself of an opportunity that offered of purchasing a piece of ground in an eligible and central part of the town, on which to erect a larger and more commodious chapel. The ground was in New-road, which only a few years before had been a garden belonging to the Prince of Wales, but had become, by virtue of a most unbusiness-like arrangement between his Royal Highness and the inhabitants of Brighton, transformed into the only entrance to the town from the north.

There is nothing in the account given by Mr. Stevens to show upon what terms the ground was acquired and transferred to the society, but there is little doubt that they were sufficiently easy and liberal. The plot secured was an extensive one, the margin adding to the effect of the building when erected, and furnishing valuable space for a recent addition in the shape of a Sunday-school.

Mr. Chatfield, on securing the ground, immediately opened a subscription list, "heading it himself with £200." Mr. Holden, another gentleman connected with the congregation, also gave £200. Others soon followed with smaller sums; many of the London friends assisted, "Mr. Agar engaging to supply the remainder." The chapel not only started free from debt, but is still free from any burden of the kind. The chapel was finished in 1820, and opened on Sunday, August 20, in that year. The building is from a design by Mr. H. Wilds, and is forty-five feet by thirty-eight. "It has," says Mr. Erredge, "a light and elegant fluted Doric portico, and is built after the style of the Temple of Theseus." Various guide books describe the Unitarian Chapel, "The Stranger in Brighton," published by Baxter in 1822, speaks of it thus:—"This very elegant and truly classical building was erected in 1820. It is built in a style of simple elegance, and the front is covered with mastic composition. In the portico, the proportions of a Doric model of antiquity have been strictly observed, to which it owes its simplicity and beauty. The model of the proportions is the Temple of Theseus, in Millar's 'Ancient Architecture.' The interior is fitted up with much taste, and is lighted with gas. It may seat about 400 persons." In a guide-book published by W. Leppard, it says:—"The Unitarian Chapel was erected in 1822, its portico is formed upon a beautiful and classic model, and the best proportioned in the county." "The Royal Brighton Guide," published in 1827 by James Taylor, dismisses the building with the remark that "it is built after the manner of a heathen temple."

There appears to have been something the reverse of heathen in the selection of its first minister, since Dr. Morell, who had so disappointed the congregation, when in its low estate, was selected to preach in the new and elegant building. The chapel, which is capable of seating 350 persons, was crowded on the opening day. Mr. Stevens says:—"The same day that the new chapel was opened, the Cavendish-street Chapel was closed, and the congregation removed to the new chapel, highly gratified that their persevering exertions to keep together their small society should have been brought to so successful an issue." Although the Unitarians left the Cavendish-street Chapel in 1820, as described in the extract just given, Brighton was credited, in the religious census of 1851, with possessing two Unitarian places of worship, and the congregations of Christ Church and the Cavendish-street Chapel were added together in the official returns; and, even as late as 1855, the Post-office Directory of Sussex speaks of Brighton as having two Unitarian Chapels.

Although the Unitarians ceased to occupy the Cavendish-street Chapel, the building was let by them to the Bible Christians, as mentioned in our account of that denomination. Mr. Stevens thus sums up the work of the first stated Minister at the Unitarian Chapel in New-road:—"Dr. Morell's ministry continued in Brighton for seven or eight years with considerable success, at the end of which time he retired altogether from the ministry, as well as from his school at Hove, in which he had been very successful." The successor to Dr. Morell was Mr. Wallace, who occupied the pulpit for one or two years. The Rev. J. P. Malleon was engaged as minister in 1829. His ministry continued for the long period of thirty-one years, during which time he had the duties of his school at Hove House to attend to. The congregation was estimated as varying from 100 to 150. Mr. Malleon was a quiet and amiable gentleman, generally respected and always spoken of in the highest terms by those who knew him. The services were very quietly conducted; so far as we can judge, no efforts being made to attract outsiders, or to make Unitarianism popular in the town.

In 1860, the Rev. Mr. Malleon, whose health was enfeebled by the strain of the combined labour of preaching and teaching for so many years, found it necessary to retire from the pulpit, and the late Rev. Robert Ainslie was selected as his successor.

The new bell at St. Paul's Cathedral, which will shortly be properly rung, has excited a great deal of interest among London folk.

Correspondence.

SOPHIA AND SOPHROSYNÉ.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I believe I am correctly reported as saying that "sôphia (wisdom) is not altogether, either etymologically, perhaps, or practically, unconnected with sôphrosynê (self-control)". The etymological nexus is doubtful; yet I should hesitate to dismiss the possibility of its existence quite so summarily as Mr. Geldart is inclined to do, for I do not think that the view, which makes sâ (meaning "sound") the common element in both, is despicable, though I admit it is open to dispute.

Sôphôs and sâphês are clearly variants of the same word (and akin to the Latin sâpa and sâpio, and also to the German saft, our sap). Another Greek cognate is found by some in ôpôs (meaning "sap"); and those who take this view may not be altogether unreasonable in treating sôphôs and sâphês as results of different blendings of sâ and ôp, the root of ôpôs. I do not pin my faith on the etymology, but I fancy something may be said for it. The difficulty, presented by the resulting short vowel, is not, I think, insuperable. On this view, sôphia would not mean taste, but the possession of a sound sap.

Sôphrôn (in Homer sâôphrôn) clearly has sa for the root of its first syllable. I should hardly speak of phrôn as "the form assumed in composition by phrên." In composition phrên becomes phrênô, and I think always stands first in the word, except in metâ phrênôn. Of course phrôn is closely akin to phrônô, phrênô, and phrên; the root of all being probably phrâ (meaning "fence"), as in phrâssô. This root-meaning seems especially conspicuous in sôphrôn, which I should take to mean not sound-minded in general, but in a mental sense, soundly-fenced. I believe that sôphrôn, and its derivative sôphrosynê have always more or less the specific force of self-control.

ALX: GORDON.

P.S.—In the report of my address, "Müller's Symbolism" should of course be "Möhler's Symbolism." The reference to this word would scarcely be intelligible, except to those who were present at the examination. It appeared that a misunderstanding of the title of an English version of Möhler's Symbolik had led some booksellers to reckon it among works illustrative of sacred art.

Belfast, July 17.

HOLIDAYS FOR POOR TOWN CHILDREN.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—In a few days everybody will be leaving London, except about ninety-nine of every hundred. The children of the rich will be scattered over Europe; the children of the poor over the pavement wondering where it is, that wonderful "country" where some people go to, if they even know enough of it to wonder about it at all.

May I suggest that each person going for a long rest and change of scene might, for the addition of a few shillings to the expense, send a poor child for a few days of real enjoyment somewhere in the open country. To help towards this, I will find house-room and fields to play in here for any poor London girls between seven and fourteen years, for twelve days each, if the well-to-do holiday makers will find the children out, and send me, with the names and addresses, enough to pay the cost of their food. But the children must be really poor, and I may add that I should much prefer them being sent to other places; but I offer this as a means when others fail.

ELIZABETH ROSSITER.

Horsfrith Park, Ingatestone, July 18.

MR. RUSKIN AND THE SHEFFIELD MUSEUM.—Mr. Ruskin has offered to put the Walkley Museum, Sheffield, on such a basis as to secure its full and free use to the town for ever. Many art treasures, which Mr. Ruskin has in readiness to forward to Sheffield, cannot be exhibited at the present building on account of want of space. The people of Sheffield assisting, Mr. Ruskin hopes to perfect his scheme.

Religious Intelligence.

THE LIVERPOOL CONFERENCE.

The Rev. J. Page Hopps in the American Unitarian Review for July had an article on the recent Conference, from which we take the following:—

WHAT THE CONFERENCE WAS.

The result has taught us once more the much-needed lesson that, if Unitarians are to succeed, they must not act as though they were ashamed either of themselves, their cause, or their faith. It has shown something else: it has shown that our people will respond to a brave, clear call, and that there is more chance of success on the old lines than on any that are brand-new. The invitation was issued to "Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other non-subscribing or kindred congregations;" but the word that heads the list was accepted by everybody as including all the rest. Liberal Christians may, it is true, be found in all Churches; but the phrase "Liberal Christian," when applied to congregations, is well-known to be a mere euphuism for the less loved name, "Unitarian." The phrase "Free Christian" is even more distinctly Unitarian. The "Presbyterian," that we can venture to talk about, has long ceased to be anything but an historical survival: it has long ago become Unitarian. The "non-subscribing or kindred congregations" can only be the old tune with variations. To all intents and purposes, therefore, the Conference was Unitarian; and it was a foregone conclusion that its invitation to "kindred congregations" was only a symbol of the committee's world-wide sympathy and goodwill. Not even a Broad Churchman attended. I have not heard of a stray Baptist, Wesleyan, or Congregationalist. A Swdenborgian I saw hovering about the back seats, and George Dawson's successor was there; but the former belongs to a community that is itself a kind of speckled bird, and the name of the latter is to be found in the list of ministers in our Unitarian Almanac. A notable exception seemed to be the presence of Joseph Wood, who took the devotional service preceding Charles Beard's sermon in the Philharmonic Hall; but Joseph Wood, though a Congregationalist minister, and a man of considerable cultivation and ability, is "cut" by his brethren, and finds it far easier to exchange pulpits with a Unitarian than with a "brother" of his own community. The Conference, then, was essentially a Unitarian one; but its attitude of openness and welcome to all Liberal Christians, though it resulted in attracting hardly any one but Unitarians, was by no means fruitless.

It is worth recording that from first to last no one seemed to remember anything about "left wings" or "right wings," "advanced school" or "conservative side." It may have been an omission, but we all seemed too happy over our food to think much of the baskets in which it came. Neither did any body seem to remember that the word Unitarian is a cross. For the time being it was an ornament of grace. Indeed, it is becoming manifest that Unitarians may take heart of grace from the knowledge of the fact that their name, already historical, is fast becoming venerable, and in a sense honourable. Is it possible that it may even become satisfying and attractive? Anyhow, it is obvious that, if we appeal to the courage, the self-respect, the consistency, and what may be called the chivalry of the rank and file of our people, we need not fear that they will falter or repudiate or shrink.

Dr. Martineau, however, in his past attitude toward aggressive Unitarianism and in his letter, hardly does justice to the side of the work that he has least affinity with. He says plainly, "I could never approve a missionary attitude towards any of the differing Churches of Christendom." He advocates that we should cease to be advocates, "except in reply." He would have us treat "the various faiths of Christians around us with deference, as allies in foreign dress." He deprecates "the eagerness of argument and the encounter of clashing beliefs." All that is very beautiful and winsome, and many an "advocate" will look upon the picture with a longing eye. Who would not wander by "the still waters" and "lie down in the green pastures?" Who would not thank God if "creeds" and "texts" and "arguments" could be all foresworn?—if, as Milton sang,

No war or battle's sound
Was heard the world around;
The idle spear and shield were high up hung.

But is it possible? Nay, if it had been so in the past, would the possibilities of this Conference have been so much as hoped for. Should we have arrived at what Dr. Martineau himself described as the point in the development of Christianity which makes his ideal Church both possible and intelligible?

The truth is that, underlying the fine charity and broad sympathy of the Conference, so accurately forecast by Dr. Martineau, there was the vivid consciousness of theological victory. Unitarians know they are winning; in other words, they know that modern civilisation, modern science, modern common-sense, modern humanity, and the modern conscience are all on their side. And they rejoice, not as victorious sectaries, but as grateful pioneers. I am persuaded that not a little of the cheery, buoyant, hopeful, generous tone of the Conference must be attributed to the undercurrent of conviction that Unitarian thought and the great Unitarian hopes and trusts are in harmony with the living spirit of the age; and it is very difficult to dissociate the fact from the brave up-hill work done by sturdy theological combatants. Dr. Martineau has himself been a tower of strength on the battlefield; and it is not too much to say that, but for such solid work as he and others have done as "missionaries" in relation to "the differing churches of Christendom," the note of charity would have been hazy, and the Church, that now with bright eye and sturdy hand offers sympathy and good-will to all, would have been more like a jelly-fish, and with as little backbone, brain, or heart.

THE ANNUAL GATHERING OF LONDON SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

The schools of the London Auxiliay Association met last Sunday in three divisions. Each of the chapels was filled. At Essex-street Chapel there were over 600 scholars and teachers present, coming from Peckham, Blackfriars Mission, Stamford-street, George's-row, and Notting-hill. The Rev. J. PANTON HAM conducted the devotional part of the service, and Mr. EDWIN LAWRENCE gave the first address on the important part played in life by very little things, cautioning the children against giving way to little sins or yielding to small temptations, and urging them to become masters of themselves, and ever seek the highest aim in life; that is, be faithful followers of Jesus Christ, and true children of God. After a hymn had been sung, the Rev. F. SUMMERS spoke on the value of cultivating "truth in the inward parts." The Rev. C. DALL, of Calcutta, then addressed the children, taking for his theme "Gratitude," and said they ought to be very grateful they were not born in a land where a religion of fear prevailed rather than one of love. He spoke of the way the Hindoo mothers frighten their children into quietude, and gave a graphic picture of one of the horrible Hindoo deities. The Rev. C. J. McALESTER, of Hollywood, County Down, closed the meeting with an appropriate and beautiful prayer, and the service at this chapel ended. The children were very attentive and well-behaved, and the singing, under Mr. George Callow's direction, and that of the organist, Mr. Jones, was alike hearty, earnest and impressive.

At Rosslyn-Hill Chapel the schools of the Northern Division met, consisting of Hampstead, Hackney, Islington, Kentish-town, and Newington-green, the chapel being crowded with children and decorated with flowers. Mr. P. E. VIZARD, author of "Sacred Similes," conducted the service, and gave an admirable address, holding the children's interest and attention right on to the end. He took for his text a rose, saying that as Jesus often pointed his teachings with reference to a lily, a bird, a child, or a man, so he might be allowed to speak of this beautiful flower he held in his hand. If it could speak what would it say? Would it not utter only beautiful and loving words to them all gathered there, and should it not be an inducement to us all to make our lives and homes beautiful? Sometimes, however, we find a bad rose, one that has its heart eaten out by a grub or caterpillar. Take care that no selfishness, anger, untruth, disobedience, or other bad quality comes to blight our lives and make them bad and spoilt. Like a perfect rose let nothing but beauty and fragrance appear in all we do. The address was interspersed with appropriate and striking anecdote, and the unflagging attention of the children throughout showed they were deeply interested in learning these lessons from a flower.

At College-green Chapel the schools in the east of London filled the chapel and school-room to overflowing. The elder children crowded the chapel and the aisles, and the younger ones filled the new school-room. Mrs. SOULE, of America, and the Rev. W. A. POPE addressed the former, and the Rev. ROBERT SPEARS and Mr. J. S. TOYE spoke to the latter. The assembly of bright and eager young life, though uncomfortably crowded together, manifested the greatest interest in the services, singing, and the whole proceedings. It was hoped that the Beaumont Hall might have been obtained for this gathering, but when Mr. Spears applied for it he was told that it was not available for Sunday-school meetings, notwithstanding that the hall was built by a Mr. Beaumont some thirty or forty years ago for a sort of Theistic Church for east London, with an entirely open trust. No one can say that any of the meetings of last Sunday were wanting either in numbers, interest, or enthusiasm for the cause of Sunday-school education, or that they were in any way wanting in success. Collections to meet expenses were invited, and liberally responded to.

BRIDPORT.—Before the commencement of his sermon last Sunday morning the Rev. R. L. Carpenter stated that none of us can be, or ought to be, indifferent to that which has been, or may be, passing in Egypt. Science has made us day by day—even hour by hour—spectators of a terrible tragedy. With the mind's eye we read the successive scenes, and with varied emotions. Those who had lost patience with what seemed fruitless negotiations rejoiced when the hour for action had arrived. When the mighty engines of war were battering down the forts that threatened our fleet, many exulted in the gigantic power our country possessed; yet many have owned, with one of our statesmen, that it was a humiliating conflict, when our foe was so much weaker than ourselves. When we heard of the destruction of a great city and the unspeakable horrors that attended it, then indeed our pride gave place to a humbling grief. The time may not have come in which we can judge the conduct of those who are responsible for these events; as to the motives of our rulers, we should not deny that they wished to do right. Whether they have done right in accordance with international law is open to question; it is for us as Christians to ask whether they have acted as followers of the Prince of Peace, and have obeyed the divine law—"Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them." The time may come when we may gather some lessons from these appalling events, but he could not then attempt it. At the close of a discourse on the labourers in the vineyard, from Matthew xx. 16, "So the last shall be first and the first last; for many be called, but few chosen," the preacher illustrated the text from the fate of kingdoms which were once mighty, but which have now been degraded or have perished. Where now are the thrones of Assyria and Babylon? What became of the victorious empire of Rome? How many nations have seemed "chosen" for some great work in the world, and failed in the doing of it, or failed when it was done? Think of Egypt, the power of its kings, the wisdom of its sages—the learning of the Egyptians was proverbial; and wonder at the mighty works which remain there to this day. Egypt was the cradle of Israel, and the Church of Christ early found shelter there. What is it now? Israel was the "chosen people;" its glory, in the days of Solomon, was as nothing compared with the greatness promised by the prophets, which it might have attained had it listened to the call of the Prince of Peace; but for ages the proudest and most self-righteous of nations has been scorned, cast out, and trampled on? Think who, three centuries ago, were the mightiest powers of Europe—the Turks, then like a "scourge of God," to chastise an idolatrous Christendom—Spain, who accepted the call to the New World, into whose coffers the gold of America was poured, who might have been chosen to convey to a continent, buried in heathenism, the blessings of European civilisation and Christian faith. How did she fulfil the office? What has been her doom? And what of England? When Egypt was in its glory, and first among the nations, this island was the home of painted savages; it has been the prey of ravaging hordes, of cruel pirates, and invading armies. Little by little it has risen into a proud pre-eminence. It is first by sea; it claims sovereignty in many a realm of the East; its banner waves in every clime; it is a chosen nation—chosen, we think, by the King of kings to spread abroad the blessings of knowledge, of industry, of skill, of freedom, of Christian goodness, light and peace. It is chosen! What is its own choice—how will it fulfil so divine a destiny? Will it be like Spain, like Rome, like Egypt? Will it, instead of taking its own, take that which is not its own, and, instead of being enthroned through the ages as a benefactor, be degraded, as the evil servant who smote his fellow-servants, and brought shame on his Lord? God knoweth! May we know the things that make for our peace before they are hid from our eyes.

WALSALL.—Last summer the Rev. P. Dean spent his vacation in France, and on his return gave his congregation an address on "Religion as Seen in France During a Recent Visit." This summer his holiday has been spent in the Netherlands, and on Sunday night last, the first after his return, he gave a discourse on "Ecclesiastical and Theological Reflections from my Tour through Holland and Belgium." In the course of an interesting address he drew a comparison between Holland (a Protestant country where two out of every three are Protestants, and where there are also 680,000 Jews) and Belgium, where all are Roman Catholics with the exception of about one in four hundred. He said, as usual, facts showed that the comparison was greatly to the disadvantage of the Catholic country, the Protestant Dutch being far more cleanly, sober, educated, enterprising, moral and charitable than the Roman Catholic Belgians. Further, he spoke of Erasmus in connection with his birthplace—Rotterdam; of the controversy between Arminius and Gornuvius, the Pilgrim Fathers, &c., in connection with Leyden; of the mad doings of the Anabaptists, the birth, life, and character of Benedict, Spinoza, &c., in connection with Amsterdam; of the Jansenists, &c., in connection with Utrecht; and of other theological and ecclesiastical matters connected with other places he had visited. In concluding, he pointed out the great importance of the people of one country mixing with and getting to know the peoples of other countries, for thereby wars were made more impossible, and we learned more and more our common brotherhood and God's Fatherhood of us all.

CHELMSFORD.—On Sunday, the 9th inst., the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, of Safron Walden, paid a long anticipated visit, conducting the services both morning and evening, and giving a highly instructive and cordial address to the scholars in the afternoon. There were good attendances at all services, and a feeling of gladness at the opportunity of listening to the earnest words of the preacher was mingled with some regret that the few and widely scattered Unitarian churches of Essex could not be brought into closer contact for mutual help and friendly intercourse.

THE REV. BROOKE HERFORD.

At the meeting of the Channing Club, Chicago, held on May 29, the following address to Mr. Herford, on occasion of his leaving Chicago for Boston, was presented after dinner, at which the members and several guests were present:—

Dear Brother,—We, your associates of the Channing Club, desire, on the eve of your retirement from the active membership of this club, which you assisted in establishing, and your departure from the city, in which you have successfully laboured for nearly seven years, to put on record and to express to you our high estimation of the service you have rendered the cause of rational religion and of practical Christianity in Chicago. In your public utterances you have added to the concise and clear diction of a disciplined intellect the emphasis of a sincere spirit and the earnestness of a consecrated heart. While your daily walk and conversation among us have been of such a character as to bring into our homes devoutness without cant, and into our business a higher integrity, through your word and work those inside of other church fellowships have found it more easy to believe in a Christianity without bonds, and those outside of all churches have been induced to believe in the possibility of a religion without superstition.

So heartily have you devoted yourself to the higher interests and larger problems of our city, State, and country, that you, who came among us a foreigner, are about to take your leave as a citizen. We welcomed you to Chicago as an Englishman; we heartily commend you to Boston as an Anglo-American, and assure its citizens that they will find in you not only the solidity of England, but also something of the energy and hopefulness of the West.

Dear brother, we shall miss you from our city, that so much needs your help to consecrate its business activity, and to dedicate to nobler uses the growing accumulations of its commercial and intellectual life. We shall miss you from our Unitarian circles, which you have encouraged in the broader interests and larger duties of our faith; but we will not allow our regrets to sadden your departure, or in any way mar the brightness of your prospects.

We congratulate you upon the high privilege that awaits you, in being able to call the pulpit of Drs. Channing, and Gannett, and John F. W. Ware your own. The Unitarians of America have no higher honour at their disposal than that conferred upon you by your call to the Arlington-street Church in Boston. You go with our heartfelt wishes for that health and strength that will insure you prolonged usefulness and happiness. Your name will now be enrolled as an honorary member of our club, and we assure you that no distance or separation will ever invalidate your membership, or lessen our esteem for and fellowship with you. May Heaven's blessing accompany you.

Mr. Moulton spoke of Mr. Herford's faithfulness as a friend and a preacher, and expressed sorrow at his departure, which was Boston's gain; and on behalf of the club bade him good bye, invoking the choicest blessings of Divine Providence upon him.

Mr. High referred to what Mr. Herford had done during his pastorate of seven years, saying that no man in his profession, and perhaps no one outside of it, in the city of Chicago, had done more for the betterment of the city, to build up its better life, and thought, and purpose in the last seven years than he. His work would be remembered for years to come, and he left a gap which could not be wholly filled.

Mr. Van Inwagen, Mr. Harding, the Rev. Mr. Cowl, Mr. Roche, Mr. Felix, Mr. Follansbee, Mr. Shorey, the Rev. Mr. Galvin, and Mr. Gage referred to the universal regret at the departure of Mr. Herford, whose going was a loss to the whole city, and congratulated the Boston Unitarians upon having such an addition to their strength. Those of Chicago lost not only an eminent preacher and a successful worker, but a friend. All wished him Godspeed.

Mr. Coonly, as one outside of the Unitarian Church, bore testimony to Mr. Herford's good work, which led men to look for a broader sunlight and a broader horizon of manhood. They sadly needed some one to take his place. Although he attended a church where the lights burned blue, he hoped Mr. Herford would come back some time, and, if he did, Mr. Coonly said he would break through the rule and go and hear him.

Mr. Herford, in reply, modestly referred to his ministry, saying that he had tried to show in history and human life the deep roots of religion, and, if he had done anything, he knew it would stand. He would still be a part of this great New World and have some little part in the Great West. It would be one of the pleasures of his life to come back to Chicago when he could say or do anything that would be helpful to his dear old friends, whom he thanked for their good words.

Mr. Shippen then led in singing "Auld Lang Syne," after which Mr. Herford pronounced the benediction, and the club adjourned.

MRS. R. CHAMBERLAIN.—We regret to record the death of Mrs. Richard Chamberlain, of Birmingham, at the early age of thirty-two. The deceased lady is credited with having largely identified herself with matters affecting the well-being of the poor of the town with which her husband was connected. In recognition of her services in this way she received a public testimonial.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT AND PILLS.—More precious than Gold.—During summer the prevailing diseases are diarrhoea, dysentery, fevers and English cholera, particularly dangerous to children and young people. In those acute cases, where internal medicines cannot be retained, the greatest relief will immediately result from rubbing Holloway's soothing Ointment over the abdomen. The friction should be frequent and brisk, to ensure the penetration of a large portion of the Unguent. This Ointment calms the excited peristaltic action, quickly allaying the pain. Both vomiting and griping yield to it; where fruits or vegetables have originated the malady, it is proper to remove all indigestible matter from the bowels by a moderate dose of Holloway's Pills before using the Ointment.

The Liberal Pulpit.

RELIGIOUS PHRASEOLOGY.

(From Chicago Unity.)

"Not be that repeateth the name,
But he that doeth the will!"—Longfellow.

Many of the early Unitarians clung tenaciously to old forms of expression—old forms with new meanings. Certain Scripture words long since committed to dogmatic use they would never give up. They claimed to be "evangelical," while their opponents were seeking to prove that they were not even "Christian." Although Jesus was less spoken of in his redeeming and sacrificial functions, being conceived of mainly as the great Teacher or Exemplar, yet he was still "The Lord." Orthodoxy said that Unitarians had no right to the term. It went with the word "kingdom." It implied dominion. It was not inferior in meaning to "God." Its original was applied by the Greeks to their supreme deities.

Frequently in private, occasionally in public, the question would arise as to the fitness of using some obsolescent phraseology or symbolism, which had been unduly harped upon or made nauseous. The authority of the letter of Scripture was badly shattered. But disuse of phrase leads to disuse of custom and sacrament. The Church feels the effect throughout all its forms and offices. In 1832 Emerson left the Second Church, in Boston, because, at his request, it would not drop or relax the use of the communion bread and wine, over which he was no longer able to utter the customary formula of the Church.

In his last sermon to them—the only sermon of his ever published—he says: "The use of the elements, however suitable to the people and the modes of thought in the East, where it originated, is foreign and unsuited to affect us. Whatever long usage and strong association may have done in some individuals to deaden this repulsion, I apprehend that their use is rather tolerated than loved by any of us. We are not accustomed to express our thoughts or emotions by symbolical actions. Most men find the bread and wine no aid to devotion, and to some it is a painful impediment. To eat bread is one thing; to love the precepts of Christ and resolve to obey him is another."

"This mode of commemorating Christ is not suitable to me. That is reason enough why I should abandon it. If I believed that it was enjoined by Jesus on his disciples, and that he even contemplated making permanent this mode of commemoration, every way agreeable to an Eastern mind, and yet, on trial, it was disagreeable to my own feelings, I should not adopt it." "To exalt particular forms, to adhere to one form a moment after it is outgrown, is unreasonable, and it is alien to the spirit of Christ."

But nothing had happened so remarkable since Channing's Baltimore sermon as the address of Emerson before the Cambridge Divinity School in 1838. "It seemed like an echo of Channing's thought attuned to a vaster rhythm—the music of the spheres." (Mem. of Ezra Stiles Gannett, p. 189.) It was a new view of religion, told in new phrases. It was also an arraignment of current Christianity, and a prophecy that has been getting slowly fulfilled ever since. There was nothing of the commonplace or the traditional in it. It is an appeal for freedom and character and reality in religion.

"The truth is," he says, "that tradition characterises the preaching of this country; that it comes out of the memory and not out of the soul; that it aims at what is usual and not at what is necessary and eternal; that thus historical Christianity destroys the power of preaching by withdrawing it from the exploration of the moral nature of man."

Of Jesus he says: "The idioms of his language and the figures of his rhetoric have usurped the place of his truth; and churches are not built on his principles, but on his tropes."

Of historical Christianity he declares, "It has dwelt, it dwells, with noxious exaggeration about the person of Jesus. The soul knows no persons." "The manner in which his name is surrounded with expressions which were once sallies of admiration and love, but are now petrified into official titles, kills all generous sympathy and liking."

Theodore Parker listened to this address, and reaching home, wrote: "My soul is roused, and this week I shall write the long-meditated sermons on the state of the Church and the duties of these times." Three years later Parker's lightning struck at South Boston, in his sermon on "The Transient and Permanent in Christianity." This precipitated a crisis and made general a controversy toward which many tendencies had been ripening. Now the battle was to be fought, not with old orthodoxy, but with a new orthodoxy, formed within the lines of Unitarianism itself.

"Criticism had broken just far enough with the old reverence to render a jest on Balaam's ass, the possessed swine, the money in the fish's mouth, not inadmissible on week days. And men spoke freely of the orientalisms of the New Testament; among which they would sometimes class, not only the Conception and the Star in the East, but also the Transfiguration and the Ascension." Parker scrutinised whatever language was in current use very sharply. Professor Ware told the young men of the Divinity School that if there appeared to them any contradiction between the reason of man and the letter of Scripture they must follow the written Word. But that point was passed. With Parker, whatever the reason did not sanction was refused; and what was ambiguous was rejected. This made all his preaching singularly clear and direct. As his biographer said of his style: "It has the cant of no school, transcendental or part-evangelical. . . . He finds the country language capable of telling his most spiritual thought."

Men saw in him the elements of a revolution. Some of his friends begged him to hold back—at least to compromise with the old forms of speech. But he replied that even the Unitarians had been "weaving cob-webs and calling it cloth" long enough. They still used a great deal of phraseology, biblical and ecclesiastical, in a false sense, or it had no sense; and when he found the Boston Association, composed of his own ministerial brethren, deliberating over his heresies after the manner of the Sorbonne, if not of the Inquisition, he dared them to tell in plain words, to put into secular language, what they meant by such terms, among others, as these: "Salvation," "inspiration," "revelation," "Word of Word," "thus saith the Lord," "Saviour," "Messiah," "Redeemer," "miracle," "resurrection," "the Devil"—and to say if they believed in them? He was sure preachers were "mistaking sound for sense," and for his own part proposed neither to be deluded nor to be a party to delusion. He will not "take fiction for fact, a dream for a miraculous revelation of God, an oriental poem for a grave history of miraculous events," or "a picture sketched by some glowing Eastern imagination" for a "reality." He likes the practical portions of the Bible and the plain words of Jesus; but he draws his illustrations, as he himself says, "from most familiar things which are before all men's eyes, in the fields, the streets, the shop, the kitchen, parlour, nursery, or school." In no place, however, does his emancipation from the influence of custom and tradition appear more conspicuously than in his prayers. Not less a monument to his fervent piety than to his individual genius.

Not very far from the date of the South Boston sermon James Freeman Clarke began to gather his "free church"—perhaps the first instance in this country, if not in any country, of an ecclesiastical institution founded upon a secular basis.

The breach which this new conflict over religious phraseology portended did not fully come until the organisation of the National Conference of Unitarians. The disuse of certain Scriptural and doctrinal terms have gradually spread. Error and insincerity had often taken shelter in their indefiniteness. Many honest men looked upon them with suspicion or aversion. A few phrases, purely rhetorical in their origin, were still kept loaded with a dogmatic meaning. And those who refused to accept any equivalent or substitute for them were felt to be setting up, however unconsciously, the shibboleth of a party. All shades of men, however ranking themselves under the Unitarian name, were invited to meet in Convention in New York city, in 1865, for the purpose of organisation. Assembled there, the preamble of the Constitution offered for their acceptance contained within itself the grounds for a new departure, and later became the occasion for a restatement of the objects of religion.

Dissent from the language of the preamble was from the first inevitable. The tone of it was ecclesiastical rather than business-like. It looked like an attempt to rivet a set of obsolescent terms upon an elastic and growing faith. It ignored the fact that religion was more and more expressed in the vocabulary of every-day speech, in the plain terms of conduct, and less and less in the stately figures of Oriental fancy. Two phrases—"disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ," and "building up of the kingdom of his Son"—created division and the fire of a long discussion.

The preamble and constitution were adopted; but the next year, at Syracuse, the Convention was earnestly urged to recall or modify its action, to the end that those who could no longer use the phraseology that had been so much insisted upon might be recognised and feel at home in the Conference. But it was too late then, and there was a dread of Radicalism. Radicalism might call itself "Christian" as much as it pleased—as it did in those days, all the way from Parker down. That was not enough. That was not yet the shibboleth in dispute. The battle was over the phrases we have named. Speaking of the use of the epithet "Lord" in connection with the name of Jesus, the framer of the preamble said, "The essence of the Christian religion is lodged in that phrase." The result of this was the Free Religious Association.

It was too early yet for any considerable body of men to see that the tendency of religious progress in all respects is more and more away from the special and towards the universal. The special claims set up for the Jewish race, for the Hebrew literature, for Jesus and the Apostles, for the Church, for certain doctrines and sacraments, as ages go on, fall away, and are constantly merging into the universal—being but manifestations in time of the One Living and Eternal Spirit. All duties may become sacramental; all great thought may become Scripture; all true lives are redeeming. So, too, all the sentiments of Oriental saints, held in the bold figures of ancient speech, so far as they are of any practical use to us, may be retold, and for the purposes of organisation and fellowship must be stated in the ethical and unquestioned dialect of our common life. As Dr. Hedge says, "The separation of sacred and profane in human life bears an inverse ratio to the progress of religion. The ruder the religion, the wider the separation."

University Intelligence.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.

MATRICATION EXAMINATION—JUNE.

The following is a Classified List of Candidates who passed the late Examination for Matriculation with Honours:—

- ¹Holloway, G.—Private study.
- ²Turpin, G. S.—Nottingham High School.
- ³Joseland, H. L.—Tottenham College.
- ⁴Wynne-Edwards, J. R.—Giggleswick School.
- ⁵McIlvenna, J. J.—St. Francis Xavier's College, Liverpool.
- ⁶Starling, E. H.—King's College School.
- ⁷Hastings, E. B.—King's and University Colleges.
- ⁸Renwick, W.—Science and Art School, Newcastle-on-Tyne.
- ⁹Hooker, J. H.—Draper's College, Tottenham, and University College School.
- ¹⁰Morland, Lucy F.—The Mount School, York.
- ¹¹Muncaster, J. H.—Mill Hill School.
- ¹²Riding, Alice L. S.—University College.
- ¹³Foster, A. E.—Liverpool Institute.
- ¹⁴Fletcher, W. C.—Kingswood and Woodhouse Grove School.
- ¹⁵Savory, F. W.—St. Cuthbert's College, Ushaw.
- ¹⁶Taylor, S.—Park Hurst School, Buxton, and Private tuition.
- ¹⁷Habell, M. J. E.—St. Cuthbert's College, Ushaw.
- ¹⁸Wilson, Helen M.—Sheffield High School.
- ¹⁹Clarke, T. R.—Birkbeck Institute, King's College, and Private study.
- ²⁰Chevallier, Mary A.—Ipswich High School.
- ²¹Hailstone, A. H.—University College School.
- ²²Whitaker, J. S.—Manchester Grammar School.
- ²³Sowerby, T. H.—King's College School.
- ²⁴Ashworth, P.—Manchester Grammar School and Owen's College.
- ²⁵McLaughlin, J. B.—St. Edmund's, Ware, and St. Charles's, Notting-hill.
- ²⁶Smith, J. W.—Borough-road Training College and Private study.
- ²⁷Field, Annie B.—Bedford College, London.

- 1 Disqualified by age for First Exhibition.
- 2 Exhibition of £30 per annum for two years.
- 3 Exhibition of £20 per annum for two years.
- 4 Exhibition of £15 per annum for two years.
- 5 Prize of £10.
- 6 Prize of £5.
- 7 Disqualified by age for Third Prize.
- 8 Disqualified by age for Third Prize.
- 9 Third Prize divided.
- ^{*} Obtained the number of Marks qualifying for a Prize.
- N.B.—The bracket indicates equality of merit.

- ^{*}Cook, S. B.—Diocesan College, Rondebosch, and St. Thomas's Hospital.
- ^{*}Little, J. T.—King's College.
- Cowell, Marion A.—Bedford College, London.
- Jermain, J. C. S.—Private study.
- Holme, F. J.—St. Francis Xavier's College, Liverpool.
- Morland, C. E.—Friends' School, York.
- Austen, G. H.—Private study.
- O'Brien, Susanna G.—Ackworth School and The Mount School, York.
- Sherratt, Marian—Bedford College, London.
- Ashe, E. O.—Malvern and Owens Colleges.
- Hunter, M.—Giggleswick School.
- Morrison, W.—Private study and tuition.
- Robertson, Mary A.—North London Collegiate School for Girls.
- Maxwell, F. M.—Private study.
- Morgan, F. W.—University School, Hastings.
- ^{*}Lloyd, T.—St. John's College, Battersea, and Private study.
- ^{*}O'Toole, A. T.—St. Francis Xavier's College, Liverpool.
- Mostyn, Sarah E.—Ipswich High School.
- Adamson, Mary M.—Notting-hill High School.
- Shurlock, F. W.—Cheltenham Training College, King's, and Private study.
- Nathan, M. S.—City of London and University College Schools.
- Scadding, S. W.—Kingswood and Woodhouse Grove School.
- Howell, F.—University School, Hastings.
- Kershaw, W.—Borough-road Training College, and Private study.
- Parry, H. L.—Liverpool Institute and Private tuition.
- Swain, W. R.—Private tuition.
- Martindale, H. H.—Tottenham College.
- Shanahan, M.—City of London College.
- Higgins, A.—St. Joseph's College, Clapham.
- Duthie, O.—Liverpool Institute.
- Kellett, A. F.—Kingswood and Woodhouse Grove School.
- Shaw, Catherine P.—Private tuition.
- Durham, A. E.—University College School.
- Brackenbury, H. B.—Kingswood and Woodhouse Grove School.
- Bater, Alice T.—Milton Mount College.
- Webb, S. J.—Private study.
- Hall, J.—St. John's College, Battersea, and Private study.
- Higgs, W.—The Collegiate School and Firth College, Sheffield.
- Matley, C. A.—King Edward's Middle School, Birmingham.

In the First Division 371 passed, including 54 ladies; in the Second Division 66, including 4 ladies.

A JEWISH THEORY OF MIRACLES.

We are indebted to a work by a learned Jew published some time ago in Paris ("The Deicides," by Cohen) for the following instructive passage illustrating the Jewish theory of Miracles:—

In one of the celebrated Academies where all the sages of Israel were assembled there arose an important discussion between Rabbi Eliezer, one of the glories of the Synagogue, and his colleagues, as to the interpretation of certain doctrinal matters referring to things clean and unclean. All the arguments advanced by Rabbi Eliezer in support of his opinions had been unanimously opposed and rejected by the other doctors. "Well," indignantly exclaimed the illustrious Rabbi, "let this banana part from its roots and plant itself on the opposite side." At these words the tree detached itself from its roots and planted itself on the opposite side. "What does that prove?" cried the doctors, with one voice, "and what connection has the value of this banana with the question which occupies us?" "Well," again exclaims Rabbi Eliezer, "may the rivulet that flows near us demonstrate the truth of my opinions," and suddenly, O miracle! the waters of the brook reascended to their source. "Well," once more replied the other doctors, "whether the waters flow in one direction or another, what connection is there between this circumstance and the subject of our controversy?" "Well," impatiently said Rabbi Eliezer, "may the walls of this room serve me as proof and testimony," and the pillars supporting the edifice bowed obedient to the voice of their master, and the walls crack and threaten to overwhelm them. Then Rabbi Schoschonah, one of the most renowned sages of his age, exclaimed, "O walls! O walls! when sages discuss the interpretation of the law what have you to do with their argumentation?" And the walls stopped as they were falling and remained leaning suspended over the heads of the doctors. "May God Himself pronounce supreme judgment," cried Rabbi Eliezer, and from the heavenly heights a voice was heard saying, "No longer call in question the doctrine of Rabbi Eliezer, reason is on his side."

Rabbi Schoschonah enters his protest: "Neither reason nor the law," cries he, "is now in the depths of the heavens, neither miracles nor mysterious voices have, in our eyes, the power to demonstrate the truth. To human reason, to the decision of the majority of the sages of Israel is committed the interpretation of Thy law, O Lord! Henceforth these alone are the only powers that can avail." Notwithstanding the miracles that were performed, notwithstanding the intervention of a divine voice, the opinion of Rabbi Eliezer was condemned by the doctors, his contemporaries. And the Talmud innocently adds, that Rabbi Nathan, having met the prophet Elijah, he asked him what had been said in heaven respecting this celebrated debate, and received the following answer:—"The Eternal smiled and replied, 'My sons are the strongest, my sons have triumphed.'" This is manifestly but a legend, in which no historical fact can be traced; but it is a legend that involves in itself a whole system. It throws much light on the real ideas of the Synagogue and on the doctrine of Judaism respecting miracles. It is impossible not to be struck by the philosophical independence which is there shown, and which frees itself from the shackles of a blind belief.

Such was not then alone the spirit of the Synagogue, but also the exact condition of popular belief at the time of Jesus. Miracle was accepted as an incomprehensible fact, but not as a proof of divinity, and it was invested with still less importance and significance when restricted to the cure of human infirmity, or to a species of supernatural therapeutics; in fact it was nothing new or strange among the Jews that men inspired by God should effect the cure of disease by unknown or inexplicable means. The Hebrew annals are replete with facts which seem to suggest that some privileged beings among men possessed the wonderful faculty of influencing life and death according to their will.

Our Calendar.

SUNDAY, JULY 23.

LONDON.

- Rev. P. H. WICKSTED, at Little Portland-street Chapel, at 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M.
- Rev. CHAS. VOYSEY, at Langham-hall, 43, Great Portland-street, 11.15 A.M.
- Rev. Dr. HALE, of Boston, U.S., at Rosslyn hill Chapel, Hampstead, at 11.30 A.M.

THURSDAY.

Annual Meeting of the Western Sunday School Association, Gloucester, at 3 P.M.

* Notices of Sunday Services are inserted in this Calendar at 6d. a line, and of other Meetings and Service gratis, provided a detailed Advertisement appears.

SELECTED BOOKS.

- Cobbe's (F. P.) The Peak in Darien, 7/6
- Episodes in the Life of an Indian Chaplain, by a Retired Chaplain, 12/6
- Gardner's (H.) Leelyn, and other Verses, 5/
- Ingham's (S. C. J.) Cædmon's Vision, and other Poems, 5/
- Plain Preaching for a Year, Third Series, edited by Rev. E. Fowle, Part 4, 2/6
- Romanes's (G. J.) Scientific Evidences of Organic Evolution, 2/6
- Shore's (T. T.) Saint George for England, and other Sermons preached to Children, 5/
- Slack's (E.) Six Months in Persia, 2 vols., 24/

MR. WALTER MAWER, Sunday School Association Office, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C., will supply any of the above-named new books and new editions, at the prices named, carriage free, on receipt of Post-office Order, payable at the East Strand Post-office.

DEATHS.

- CHAMBERLAIN—On the 17th inst., aged 32 years, Emilie Agnes, wife of Richard Chamberlain, Oak Mount, Edgbaston, Birmingham.
- SHIPMAN—On the 18th inst., at Lymm, Cheshire, Caroline Shipman, aged 75, daughter of the late Michael Shipman, of Hinkley, Leicestershire and sister of the late R. M. Shipman, of Manchester.

The Inquirer,

A Religious, Political, and Literary Newspaper, and Record of Reverent Free Thought.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

WORK OF UNITARIANS IN THE PAST AND THE FUTURE. The Sermon Preached at the Annual Meeting, May 31, in Unity Church, Islington, by the Rev. Dr. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE. Price One Penny. Fifty copies will be sent, carriage free, for 3s.; one hundred for 5s. A large edition having been printed with a view to the widest possible circulation.

SERMONS, by ROBERT COLLYER. Cheap Issue. Price 2s.

POSITIVE ASPECTS OF UNITARIAN THOUGHT AND DOCTRINE. Cheap Edition, 1s.

TEXTS AND MARGINS of the REVISED NEW TESTAMENT. By Dr. G. VANCE SMITH, 1s.

A Cheap Edition of this work is now issued, price 3d.

Address, Miss C. PHILPOT, Bookroom, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London.

Fourth Edition, 487 pp. 8vo. cloth, price 7s. 6d.

SAMUEL SHARPE'S HISTORY OF THE HEBREW NATION and its LITERATURE. With an Appendix on the Hebrew Chronology. By SAMUEL SHARPE, Author of the "History of Egypt."

WILLIAMS and NORGATE, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London; and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

MISS F. POWER COBBE'S NEW BOOK.

Just published. Crown 8vo. cloth, 7s. 6d.

THE PEAK IN DARIEN and other inquiries touching Concerns of the Soul and the Body. By FRANCES POWER COBBE.

WILLIAMS and NORGATE, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London; and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

Just Published, price 2s. 6d.

ELEMENTS of MORALITY in EASY LESSONS for HOME and SCHOOL TEACHING. by Mrs. CHARLES BRAY.

London: Longmans, Green, and Co.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

"Mrs. Charles Bray, who writes for children with a charming sympathy and intelligibility, has illustrated in her 'Elements of Morality' the principles of that science in all their numerous applications to the conduct of juvenile life."—WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

"We have here a moral code founded on the obvious necessities of human nature. . . . In the concluding chapter, 'Our Union with the Unseen,' she dwells on the religious principle and shows how it binds the soul of man to the eternal source of all."—EDUCATIONAL TIMES.

"We are able to give this book a very high commendation. It is happily free from that confusion of thought as to the true basis of morals which characterises so many attempts of the same kind."—INQUIRER.

"Our duties, systematically arranged in every relation of life, are inculcated with winning force and affectionate entreaty, not easy to be withstood."—EDUCATIONAL NEWS.

MR. HOWSE'S PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY SERMON, 1882, can be obtained at Messrs. Johnson and Rawson's, Market street, Manchester, price One Penny; or from the Rev. E. S. Howse, Bowdon, near Manchester, by enclosing a penny stamp.

FOR SALE, at a moderate price, the last eight volumes (unbound, but clean) of the INQUIRER.—W. MAWER, INQUIRER Office.

DIXON'S IRON CHAPELS, SCHOOLS, &c.

Are tasteful in Design, Economical, Durable, made of the Best Materials, and erected in the most careful manner. Can be taken down, removed, and re-erected at small cost.

Careful comparison of Specifications, Structural and Architectural details, Materials and Workmanship are invited before placing orders. IRON CHURCHES, &c., usually on hand or in progress at the Works.

IRON BUILDINGS for all purposes and all Climates. Catalogues, Designs, Estimates, and all information on application.

ISAAC DIXON, Windsor Iron Works, Liverpool.

THE XIXTH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE-PLACE, LONDON-BRIDGE, E.C. SHARES £10, Payable in one Sum or by Periodical Payments.

Directors—Henry Waldemar Lawrence, Mark H. Judge, F. H. A. Hardcastle, Eliza Orme, George Palmer, M.P., Mary E. Richardson, and Henry Rutt.

This Society affords the means of investing money in large or small sums with complete safety at good interest. Interest on Shares 5 per cent. per annum, paid half-yearly. Deposits received at 4 per cent. Withdrawals up to £10 at three days' notice. Prospectus free of FREDERICK LONG, Manager and Secretary.

LONDON.—WEST-CENTRAL TEMPERANCE HOTEL, 97, 99, 101, Southampton-row, Russell-square.—Patronised and highly commended by the Rev. D. S. Govett, M.A., English Chaplain, Gibraltar; Rev. H. M. Holden, M.A., St. Bartholomew's, Bradford, Yorkshire; Rev. Canon French, M.A., Killaloe, Ireland, &c. Central, quiet, exceptionally clean, moderate in charges. Visitors' Drawing Room. Breakfast or Tea, 1s. 3d. Beds from 1s. 6d. Printed Tariff Card on application.

FREDERIC SMITH, Proprietor.

MISS BOWRING, holding an Honour Certificate from Dublin University, and having passed Groups A and B in the Cambridge (Higher) Examinations, wishes to instruct Pupils, either personally or by correspondence, in English, French, German, and Latin. Seven years' experience in teaching. Good testimonials.—Address, 160, Bower-street, Maidstone.

LAW.—To article CLERKS intending to spend their last year in London. A Graduate of London, B.A., LL.B., admitted in 1864, will be glad to receive a gentleman for the last year or whole time of his articles. Personal assistance, if desired, for the Final Pass or Honours' Examination. Facilities can also be given for acquiring a good knowledge of short hand and English composition.—Address, X. Y. Z., care of W. Mawer, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK.—Current Accounts opened according to the usual practice of other Bankers, and Interest allowed on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £25. No commission charged for keeping Accounts.

The Bank also receives money on Deposit at Three per cent. Interest, repayable on demand.

The Bank undertakes, for its Customers, free of charge, the custody of Deeds, Writings, and other Securities and Valuables; the collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the purchase and sale of Stocks and Shares.

Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued.

A Pamphlet, with full particulars, on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane.

THE BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY'S ANNUAL RECEIPTS EXCEED FOUR MILLIONS.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH, with Immediate Possession, and no Rent to pay. Apply at the Office the BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH, with Immediate Possession, either for Building or Gardening purposes. Apply at the Office of the BIRKBECK FREE HOLD LAND SOCIETY.

A Pamphlet, with full particulars, on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane.

SEASONABLE DELICACY.

BROWN & POLSON'S CORN FLOUR

As Blanc-Mange, Custard, Baked Pudding, &c.

WITH

STEWED FRUIT

OF ANY KIND.

CROYDON FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

The members of this Congregation having determined to rebuild their church in accordance with the design issued with the INQUIRER of the 1st of July, desire to invite the contributions of former members and well-wishers residing at a distance.

Subscriptions will be gratefully received by the Hon. Treasurer, JESSE FAGE, Esq., of Addiscombe Lodge, Croydon, Surrey.

Amounts already received from members of the Congregation:

	£	s.	d.
Five subscribers at £300 each	1500	0	0
Three " " £150 " "	450	0	0
Three " " £100 " "	300	0	0
Other amounts	150	0	0
Total	3810	0	0

HEATH BROW SCHOOL FOR YOUNG BOYS AND GIRLS.

Principal, MRS. CASE.

Teachers for the Session 1882-83:—The Misses CASE and Miss E. F. SQUIRE; J. G. PRASE, B.A., Lond. (Classics and English); JOHN BRIDGE, M.A., Lond. (Mathematics); Mr. ARCH. BALLANTYNE (History and Literature); — (French); Mr. JOHN GUPPY (Chemistry); Mr. W. H. FISK (Drawing); Miss C. SQUIER, R.A.M. (Music); Mr. WINTERBOTTOM (Gymnastics); Miss MARY BIRCH (Dancing).

THE NEXT TERM begins SEPTEMBER 20.

Heath Brow, Hampstead, London.

HIGH SCHOOL, STOKES GREEN, NEAR COVENTRY, established (1865) by the Rev. G. HEAVISIDE, B.A., of University and Manchester New Colleges, London, promotes a Liberal Education at a moderate cost.

BRENTWOOD, WORSLEY, near MANCHESTER.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal . . . MRS. F. SHAWCROSS late of Brook House, Knutsford.

The NEXT TERM begins MONDAY, May 8.

For prospectus, apply to the Principal.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Mrs. HOOD will be pleased to receive a few GIRLS to board and educate. Special arrangements made for delicate girls during the winter months.—Address, care of the Rev. ALFRED HOOD, Bournemouth.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Westbourne Tower, standing in extensive grounds, is specially arranged as a MARINE RESIDENCE for INVALIDS, and those seeking rest and change. Terms moderate, and include professional attendance.—Dr. NORTON.

"THE FORT, MARGATE."—APARTMENTS in a well-furnished house, facing the sea, on moderate terms. Address, Mrs. Stabback, Lansdowne Lodge, the Fort Margate.

ASSURANCE AGAINST ACCIDENTS OF ALL KINDS. ASSURANCE AGAINST RAILWAY ACCIDENTS ALONE. ASSURANCE AGAINST FATAL ACCIDENTS AT SEA. ASSURANCE OF EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

Railway Passengers' Assurance Company, THE OLDEST and LARGEST COMPANY, INSURING AGAINST ACCIDENTS OF ALL KINDS.

The Right Hon. LORD KINNAIRD, Chairman.

Subscribed Capital, £1,000,000.

PAID-UP CAPITAL AND RESERVE, £240,000.

MODERATE PREMIUMS

Bonus allowed to Insurers after five years,

£1,700,000

HAS BEEN PAID AS COMPENSATION.

Apply to the Clerks at the Railway Stations, the Local Agents, or

64, CORNHILL,

or 8, GRAND HOTEL BUILDINGS, CHANCERY-CROSS, LONDON.

WILLIAM J. VIAN, Secretary.

Printed by WOODFALL and KINDER, of Milford-lane, Strand W.C.; and Published for the Proprietors by WALTER MAWER, at the Offices of the SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, London, W.C.—Saturday July 22, 1882

The Inquirer.

A Religious, Political, & Literary Newspaper, & Record of Reberent Free Thought.

[REGISTERED AT THE GENERAL POST-OFFICE AS A NEWSPAPER.]

No. 2092.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 29, 1882.

[PRICE 5D.]

CONTENTS.

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:—

Muhammad and his Teaching	485
The Brahmo Year-Book for 1881	486
'John Inglesant'	487
Mundus Contra Athanasium	487
Natural Religion,—II.	488

OCCASIONAL NOTES

REVIEWS:—

Outlines of Primitive Belief among the Indo-European Races	490
Commentary on the Book of Job	491
Elements of Morality in Early Lessons for Home and School Teaching	491
Short Notices	492
The Magazines	492
Literary Notes	493

OUR CONTEMPORARIES

CORRESPONDENCE:—

Agnostic Services	496
The Brighton Chapel	496
Dr. Williams's Trustees	496

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE:—

Denton: Opening of the Russell Scott Memorial Schools	497
Sheffield: Re-opening of Upper Chapel	498

MUHAMMAD AND HIS TEACHING.

Now that we are unhappily involved in a war, if not with a Mussulman state, at least with a Mussulman leader, and the newspapers are giving us sad accounts of horrible massacres of Christians in Egypt, Professor MONIER WILLIAMS's article in the current number of the Nineteenth Century, on "Muhammad and his Teaching," has acquired a new and exceptional interest. No wars are so bitter and so inhuman as those which are fanned, either on one side or both, by the breath of religious animosity. They know little or nothing of that chivalrous private generosity which happily characterises wars waged merely for promoting the schemes of crowned heads or ambitious military dictators. And there can be little doubt that we shall hear of shocking barbarities perpetrated, either with or without the authority of ARABI, during the whole of our unfortunate Egyptian complications, for the religious fanaticism of the Mussulmans of the North of Africa is already being appealed to, and the appeal—the call to a Holy war—may extend to the forty-one millions of our Muslim fellow-subjects in India. Be this latter alternative as it may, the good average Christian Englishman will forget how he might act if the followers of the Prophet had invaded his sacred island-home. All the horrors which any kind of religious fanaticism might engender will be put down as the special product of the religion of the Mussulman. Those who will think and speak in this way are not to be reached by calm dispassionate articles like that to which we have referred, nor can we hope to reach them by any sketchy analysis we may give of it. Still, as an old but ever new theme, the subject cannot fail to be of some interest just now, even to readers as thoughtful and well-informed as those who peruse our pages.

"What's in a name?" says a familiar, if not proverbial, expression. There would seem to be a great deal in that of the Arabian Prophet, for it possesses a curious chameleon-like capacity of changing under the eyes of the beholder. Its last, and, as we should suppose, Orthodox form is "Muhammad," which is the past participle of the verb hamada, "to praise," says Professor WILLIAMS, and ought to admit of no more variety in spelling than our word "praised" does. Few men have been judged, as we are told, from such opposite standpoints as the Founder of Islamism, few so loudly praised on the one hand, and so strongly condemned on the other. Writing from an Orthodox Christian standpoint, as it would appear, our author speaks with considerable appreciation of the great complex character before him. "It is a remarkable testimony," he says, "to the greatness of MUHAMMAD's personal character that those who lived in the closest family relationship and intimacy with him were the first to believe in him. And this, too, without the attestation of signs and wonders." The moral earnestness of the Prophet in the earlier part of his career is illustrated by the words he uttered to the Kuresh tribe, who sought to win him from his heresy by flattering proposals when the guardianship of his uncle had placed him beyond their power: "If they placed the sun on my right hand and the moon on my left to induce me to renounce my work, verily I would not desist therefrom, until GOD made manifest his cause or I perish." And then as to his fortitude after the death of his uncle and his wife, KADIJAH, when he had to stand alone. "History scarcely affords a more sublime spectacle than that of this resolute reformer, cut off from all external aid and thrown back wholly on his own unassisted energies, yet rising nobly to the occasion, strong in the strength of his own superiority, doing battle single-handed with the combined forces of jealousy, superstition, rage, and fanaticism."

Half a Jew in character, race and language, it was natural, we are told, that he should be greatly influenced by Jewish ideas. His great model and exemplar was MOSES. And the monotheistic unidolatrous creed which he sought to establish was not put forth as a new religion, or even as an old one in a new setting, while he would have indignantly reterm pudiated the Muhammadan, now generally applied to it. His two cardinal doctrines were, as is well-known: first "There is no GOD but GOD," which was clearly aimed at the Christian doctrines of the Trinity and the Godhead of JESUS; and secondly "MUHAMMAD is the apostle of GOD." There is something touching and beautiful in the thought that, "the religion based on these two dogmas he called Islam, which may mean either 'Resignation' or 'Peace'—the peace resulting from a complete surrender to the Will of GOD." Every follower of this religion of trust and resignation was a Muslim, or person perfectly resigned to the Will of Heaven, and ABRAHAM was the first. Here again, we may remark, it requires but little philosophical insight to see that this doctrine of resignation which has led in its abuse to a paralysing system of fatalism, was aimed at the extreme form of the Christian doctrine of intercession, prevalent at the time, in accordance with which GOD was being constantly importuned in the name of the Saints and the VIRGIN MARY, who had shortly before been exalted to the dignity of "Queen of Heaven" at the Council of Ephesus.

It will be seen, as our author remarks, that though the Arabian Prophet declared the unity of GOD, he did not proclaim the unity of his own Apostleship, since the second dogma does not assert that he is the one sole Apostle of GOD. Nor should it be forgotten that whatever vices may have sprung up in his heart and life in later years when external enemies had been vanquished he was moderate, reasonable and catholic in his views, as well as abstemious and exemplary in his life, during all the earlier part of his career. For rightly or wrongly believing himself charged with the continuity of revelation, in the ordinary significance of the word, he sought to sweep away the corruptions which had polluted the one pure faith of ABRAHAM. Nor was this all. In order to give practical effect to his broad and catholic opinions he strove, we are told, to unite Arabs, Jews, and Christians in one homogeneous catholic church—to merge all the faiths of the world into the simple monotheistic creed which according to him had always existed and had been specially exemplified in the person of ABRAHAM. And "he not only abolished idolatry but set himself to abolish all priestcraft, sacerdotalism, ritualism, symbolism, ecclesiastical organisations, caste—everything that interposed a barrier between the free communion of man with his Creator—everything that implied the religious superiority of one human being over another. But his followers soon asked for a creed, and he had to develop his pure monotheistic conceptions. It seems probable, indeed, as Professor MONIER WILLIAMS remarks, that he had to go beyond the simple ideas of his earlier teaching in order to justify his claim to be considered a prophet. Anyhow, the Koran or Kurān, as the word is written in the Nineteenth Century article, was designed to meet and satisfy this desire for a creed. Students of the singular book in question will readily allow that "to MUHAMMAD GOD was the All-powerful One," and that the divine Omnipotence is the central thought in the revelation it professes to be. That to GOD belong the kingdom, the power and the glory is certainly its leading idea, and this thought, says our author, dominates all others in the mind of a Muslim to-day whenever he thinks about religion. And though the book knows little or nothing of tenderness and love, as these attributes are applied to the Divine Nature in the Christian religion, it is worthy of notice that mercifulness is an attribute constantly ascribed to GOD, every chapter of the Kurān commencing with the words—"In the name of GOD, the compassionate, the merciful." Nor is it difficult to account for the hostility which sprang up between Muhammadans and Christians when the most sacred book of the former expressly declares:—"They surely are infidels who say GOD is the third of three, for there is no GOD but GOD." The purpose and tendency of this is clear; MUHAMMAD was to all intents and purposes an ancient prototype of the modern Unitarian Church, at least in matters of faith. His reverence for JESUS seems to have been as great as that felt by ourselves. He himself was, as he taught, merely the Apostle of GOD, but JESUS he spoke of, says our author, as "the Spirit of GOD," and though he prayed for himself, and asked his followers to pray for him, he never asked them to pray for JESUS, to whom, alone of all the prophets, he did not impute sin. He also accorded to CHRIST the power of working miracles, but put forth no such claim for himself.

Turning to the practical side of the Muhammadan faith, we find, continues Professor MONIER WILLIAMS, that though abjuring all external symbols it is pre-eminently a religion of external acts. Its chief practical duties are prayer, fasting and almsgiving with the repetition of a particular creed or theological declaration, with at least one journey to Mecca in a life-time. Prayer was to be made five times a day, and to be preceded by a bodily ablution, called "the key of Prayer." But the prayers are scarcely prayers at all in the sense of petitions, but rather ascriptions to GOD and repetitions of parts of the Kurān. This naturally arose from the idea entertained of the divine sovereignty and the spirit of submission habitually inculcated. Fasting was instituted for the whole of the month Ramazan, when no food is taken while the sun is above the horizon, and as the Muhammadan year is a lunar one, the month in question may occur in the summer, which, as our author observes, makes it a severe strain upon the strict devotee. Almsgiving are regarded as "a loan unto GOD, they deliver from hell and secure paradise." The spirit thus called forth finds an admirable expression, it seems, in the case of indigent persons, while the belief in the future existence of the inferior animals, held and taught by MUHAMMAD, and peculiar to his religion, has led to great tenderness to the non-reasoning tribes. Lunatic asylums are said to owe their origin to Islamism, continues our author, just as hospitals are known to have originated with Indian Buddhists. In the early stages of its career, too, Islamism was "the very soul of progress," and it was only later that feebleness and servility crept over it. It is true, however, "that it still makes converts by the thousand among ignorant and uncultivated tribes, and by so doing elevates them far above the pagan level." Still, for want of expansibility, it leaves its adherents at a certain point from which they are apt to fall back into barbarism.

In estimating the relationship Muhammadanism sustains to Christianity, Professor MONIER WILLIAMS speaks rather as a theological apologist than as a learned philosophical writer. Like so many who still remain within the pale of orthodoxy, he seems to deem it a necessity to trifle with facts and cast philosophy aside when Christianity is in question. It is no doubt true that "a strict Trinitarian would have less difficulty in coming to terms with Hinduism than with the religion of Muhammad." But why? Simply because Islamism was a protest against the corrupt doctrines which had sprung up in the East—"his own fundamental dogmas of a Trinity in unity and of a divine Incarnation." And so long as he makes these dogmas identical with Christianity "he can have no fellowship with a religion which however reverently it may speak of CHRIST regards the doctrine of his association with GOD the Father as a blasphemous fable." But should he do this? Ought he not to look beyond the corruptions in question to the pure teaching of JESUS, which lays hold of the divine tenderness and love just as MUHAMMAD'S teaching exalts the divine sovereignty. If the errors of Christianity could be eradicated, and the ancient blots of slavery and polygamy be removed from Islamism, might not the two systems of faith be the natural complements of each other? A great historical religion is not to be estimated either by its abuses or by any mere popular expression of it; nor are cause and effect to be inverted by ascribing to religion what is due to race, as is often done when Protestantism and Catholicism are compared. That slavery and polygamy are sanctioned by what professes to be an authoritative revelation is certainly a great barrier to progress in Muhammadan countries. But these things do not constitute the spirit of that faith; it can be conceived of without them. Its true spirit, its soul-satisfying essence, would seem to be that sweet and holy calm which is sometimes met with in pious village life among ourselves, while the Christian spirit on the other hand is more active and progressive, like the busy life of town populations. Unhappily, each is an "infidel" to the other, and we are not likely to see them reconciled by the roar of cannon and the clashing of arms.

THE BRAHMO YEAR BOOK FOR 1881.

THE Bramho Year Book, so ably edited by Miss S. D. COLLET, increases in size from year to year, and in importance also, as a record of the progress of the Theistic Churches of India. It is now a bulky pamphlet of 150 pages, filled with interesting particulars of the sayings and doings of the Brahmo Somaj during the past year. There are now two chief central organisations, both in Calcutta, the Sadharan Brahmo Somaj, and the Brahmo Somaj of India, or Church of the New Dispensation. The former originated in a secession from the latter. It represents the rational Theism of the old Brahmo Somaj. Miss COLLET devotes the first part of her book to a report of its proceedings during the year 1881. An interesting account is given of the opening of the New Prayer Hall, the Anniversary Meetings, Congregational Services, Bengal Ladies Association, City School, and Mission Work. The various institutions belonging to this Somaj seem to be quietly prospering in their several lines of usefulness. The congregation continues to meet every Sunday evening, and also on the first Sunday morning in every month. A students' service is held on every Sunday morning throughout the academical year, except on the first Sunday in every Bengali month, when the Calcutta congregation holds the morning service just mentioned. A kindred institution is the Sangat Sabha, or religious conversational meeting, which is held on Sunday afternoons and on Tuesdays at the house of some friends. Both of these societies appear to be very useful for the culture of the religious life; but that life flows into other channels also. Special services and friendly gatherings are every now and then taking place, and the reports of these meetings bear witness to a very healthy and hopeful condition of religious activity and common enthusiasm. On the whole, it appears from Miss COLLET'S report, which she says is far from complete, that the Sadharan Brahmo Somaj is earnestly engaged in an important work, educational, missionary and religious, with results sufficiently encouraging to stimulate the workers and keep them faithful to their self-imposed tasks.

The greater part of the Year Book, however, is taken up with an elaborate review of the Brahmo Somaj of India, and its new departure as the Church of the New Dispensation, under the leadership of KESUB CHUNDER SEN. Miss COLLET'S reason for devoting so much space to this subject is on account of its intrinsic importance as a religious question. "It matters very little," she says, "which among the present Brahmo leaders are known to the next generation as successful or unsuccessful; but it matters very much whether the types of faith contributed by the Brahmo Somaj to the future religious life of India be pure, spiritual, and enlightened; or whether they tend to promote mental slavery, superstition, and idolatry. Hence it behoves all earnest well-wishers of the Brahmo Somaj to obtain, if possible, a clear understanding of what Brahmoism really is, and what relation is borne to it by the teachings of Mr. SEN." Accordingly, our author gives numerous extracts from Mr. SEN'S addresses, and from his organ, the Sunday Mirror, with its supplement, the New Dispensation, and we are compelled to say that these extracts abundantly justify her strictures. The New Dispensation is a distinct departure from the simplicity and rational teaching of former days, and a change unquestionably in the direction of mysticism and idolatry. Its teaching is not the simple Theism of the past, but mystical and half Orthodox. It introduces a number of new forms and ceremonies, all having, to say the least, a tendency to superstition. It follows precisely the course taken by the early corruptors of Christianity when they drafted pagan rites and doctrines on the primitive Christian faith. All this may and will no doubt render it acceptable to a large number of persons, but it will be at the cost of simplicity and rational faith. We thoroughly agree with the opinions expressed by the Central Assam Somaj. "We think that the New Dispensation is a disguised form of the Avatarism promulgated in India from time to time, and that the observances lately introduced into the Brahmo Somaj of India tend to encourage some forms of superstition which it should be the object of the Brahmo Somaj to root out." The fact is quite clear that the Theistic Churches of India are divided into two distinct parties, with diverse sympathies and ideals of the religious life. There is no prospect, we think, of the breach healing and the two parties becoming united. It is not trivial matters that divide them, but questions of principle. The seceding party are, it seems to us, fully justified in the step they have taken. The simplicity and purity of Theism are involved in the struggle. There remains no course now but for each to pursue its own way, and cultivate the religious life according to its own ideal. The voice of protest and warning has been raised, and so far the Sadharan Brahmo Somaj has discharged its duty. We hope the controversy will be less prominent in the next Year Book, and that in it Miss COLLET will have space for her usual chapter on Literature and other interesting matters, which she has been compelled to omit in the present one.

The Year Book concludes with the usual statistical tables. The first is a list of the Brahmo Somajes of India. One hundred and sixty-two are named, scattered over different parts of the country—the majority being in Bengal, and our author says the Somajes here enumerated may all be reckoned as branches, large or small, of the Theistic Church of India; fifty-six are marked in the list as having each a mandir or meeting-house of its own. The second table gives a list of eighteen Brahmo marriages from November, 1880, to December, 1881. Among the marriages we notice two in KESHUB CHUNDER SEN'S own family—his second daughter and eldest son. Three of the ladies are fourteen years of age, all the rest are sixteen and upwards. We cannot close this article without expressing our high sense of the ability and conscientious labour bestowed by Miss COLLETT on her chosen, but not altogether agreeable task. She appears to have made a good selection from her multifarious materials, and to have acquitted herself with commendable fairness and ability. The able manner in which she has performed her work is all the more praiseworthy when we consider that it was done under the disadvantage of bad health, and had at one time to be laid altogether aside through illness.

"JOHN INGLESANT."

After having heard so much about this book my impression on reading it was one of disappointment. I expected to find it the first work of a rising author, with perhaps some rawness and extravagance, but a great deal of promise in it. It is just the reverse; it is not raw, but thoroughly balanced and subdued throughout; it is not the work of a young man, but reads like the result of the study, thought, and experience of a lifetime; a good deal of it rather like an inventory of accumulated knowledge than a work of fiction.

But that which strikes and impresses one in the book is, that it must have a very determined purpose, to which the fictitious part is subservient; for the hero's character and the plot and whole development of the story seem continually sacrificed to some such end.

What this purpose is, however, is the thing that no one can make out. The hero begins with his earliest boyhood, and spends his whole life in the search for the true religion that shall satisfy his soul, and the true philosophy that shall make his life happy. In this search he is led through every grade of the perplexed religions of the time, from the Roman Church to the English Church, and from the English Church to the Puritan and Quaker. The failings of every one of these systems are very freely shown with great impartiality. This is all very well; but we expect at last, after passing through every form of error, that he will learn what is the Truth. But he does not, and seems to settle down at last through exhaustion, not because he is satisfied or happy. On the other hand, the cause of this may be, not that the truth does not come before him, but that he is disabled from seeing it by the effects of his Jesuit training. If the book is written only as an exposition of the evil results of Jesuit teaching, then it does effect its purpose.

John Inglesant, of a sensitive and impressionable nature, falls into the hands of the Jesuits in his childhood, and is trained by them as an instrument for their designs. Never in all the course of his manhood does he get over this training enough to call his soul his own, or to be anything more than an instrument in other people's hands. When he is devoted to the king in his misfortune, or called by someone else to help in any good work, his self-sacrifice is heroic. But left to himself, though always longing after the highest standard of good (or rather perhaps discontented with all else), in the moment of choice he chooses always the more slovenly and less noble course. And nothing that he comes to in his wide experience, in the different countries he visits, or the striking events he witnesses, nothing has power to rouse him from this first overwhelming impression. Not even for the sake of the heavenly character and unselfish love of the heroine, Mary Collet, can he free himself from the trammels in which his heart is bound, and which strangle all its impulses. His character is a failure from beginning to end, with the constant promise and apparent capability of being a success. This renders the whole spirit of the story very depressing. But it is not because the author does not know what is good; he is perfectly aware of the failings, and points them out himself; and they are evidently intentional parts of the purpose with which he writes. The whole design of the story shares the same fate; splendid situations and dramatic scenes are constantly opening, and as constantly they are cut off without leading to anything, having apparently served the author's turn.

The book is neither a romance nor a novel. The first part is history dramatically read; the second part a philosophical poem, with some resemblances to Goethe's Faust. The first part is fresh, spirited, and original; the second morbid, and overdone, though reaching in places to sublime heights of poetical feeling. The whole seems to offer material for fine drama; the situations and scenes are many of them magnificent, and the masterly analysis of human passion is of a high order; and yet there is not a character in the book; there are only types, and a crowd of personages coming and going.

There is no constructive or artistic power shown; the story has no form. It is as if we walked along a busy highway, watching the men and women as they pass. The narrative is transparent, and tells its own story; there is no straining after effect; the events are interesting according to their own importance, and follow one another without visible connection, as in real life. This gives its peculiar charm to the writing in making it seem perfectly natural, which is one of its chief merits, especially in the first part.

In spite of its fine scenes, it is not a work that any one can admire as a whole. Its tone, though often elevated, is never of the highest kind, never of the soundest or happiest kind. It is, in fact, too saturated with Roman Catholicism and English Ritualism, without being satisfied with either. The whole spirit is eminently worldly. But then, again, the author is fully conscious of this, and says that the hero, though a mixture of monk and courtier, was more courtier than saint.

It is among the fashionable and worldly sets in England that these questions of license in religious feeling and form are chiefly surging at present, and this book is particularly interesting to outsiders as being written from their point of view.

There are many fine poetical similes running through the work, as, for instance, when human life is compared to the parts in a concert, the invisible and eternal foundations of life being represented by the deep unchanging bass rolling onward through the whole, while each separate existence plays to this accompaniment a melody for itself on some instrument or other, according to its own pleasure. Or, again, where faith is compared to the full light of the sun, reason, philosophy and science are busy breaking it up in prisms, dissecting and analysing it; but it is the unbroken sunlight in the meantime from which all nature has life and being.

Among all those of whom Inglesant seeks for the true religion and spiritual happiness, and seeks so fruitlessly, there is scarcely one who mentions to him the name of God. All that they can tell him is different forms of the worship of Christ. All that they can speak of is the "Church," whichever it may be, that each belongs to. But they forget that it is not a "Church" that can feed the craving of his heart; it is Religion. And although Christ lived and died to teach men the name of God, yet among such a multitude of Churches calling themselves Christian, this Name, and this alone, is the one that they forget to utter. N.B.M.

MUNDUS CONTRA ATHANASIUM.

In Fanny Kemble's "Records of Later Life"

we read that the authoress objected on a certain occasion to the public reading of one of the Psalms for the day, as being filled with imprecations unfitted to a Christian audience. The clergyman's wife, to whom she was talking, agreed with her, but added, "You know, my dear, one never means what one says," and expressed it as her opinion that she herself, as a clergyman's wife, was right to join in the repetition. Perhaps some may smile at the good woman as a silly sample of her sex, and be inclined to condone her offence as committed with the praiseworthy object of magnifying her husband's office in "his" parish. But it seems to the writer that this silly woman does not stand alone either in silliness or in sex.

Inveighing one day with a friend against the wickedness and folly of reading the Athanasian Creed in the services of the Church of England—first, because it is not true; secondly, because the greater part of it is supremely unimportant; thirdly, because the important clauses are not believed by those who utter them; and strongly expressing the pain and indignation I felt that educated men, not destitute of common sense or Christian sentiments, should sanction with their voice and presence a Creed shocking alike to their reason, their conscience, and their bowels of compassion, he answered, "My dear fellow, they don't think of what they are saying. It does not trouble them, because they attach no definite meaning to the phrases. Are you not yourself as bad? When you repeat in the Psalms, 'One deep calleth another, because of the noise of the water-pipes,' you know you are speaking nonsense. Let them alone. Do not attack a mere form of words, whose life has long disappeared."

But is this so small a matter? May a good Samaritan, in this case, pass over on the other side with the priest and levite, without offence? Either my friend was right or he was wrong. If he was wrong—if the congregations do believe what they are saying—if they do believe that a poor wretch who "cannot thus think of the Trinity," will "without doubt perish everlastingly," what woful folly, what blackness of ignorance, what wilful blindness to the light! One can only say:—

Mit der Dummheit kämpfen Götter selbst vergebens!

But if my friend was right—if the congregation cannot swallow so monstrous a formula, and do not believe what they are saying, had they not better for the future substitute the prayer-wheels of the Buddhists for this Confession of Christian Faith? For the Buddhists do at least put into their prayer-wheels the prayers they think are acceptable to Buddha; whereas our Christian brethren offer up, with their minds, as we are supposing, awakened to the facts, a form of speech which they are aware is an offence to the Deity. As for those who attempt to get out of the difficulty by some theory of "unconvincing mercies" and such other parasitic verbiage, they may be left to their own unwholesome devices.

There was a judge, so the story goes, who used to say that he was never better pleased than when he had heard only one side of a case, because then it was so easy to come to a decision. The present would seem to be a case which has only one side; or, if there be two sides, on the one side there is good sense and good feeling, on the other, obsolete tradition, vis inertia, fear of consequences, unreasoning instinct, unwillingness to retreat, and Mrs. Grundy. Not that the writer would for a moment contend that the Athanasian Creed has not been exceedingly useful in its time. In the infancy of Christendom, when the multiplicity of churches had no common bond of union, and no strength derived from common traditions and formulas, and no recognised common organisation; in the struggle against dominant pagan influences and the stern pressure of Arianising emperors and potentates, it was useful, if the Church of Christ were ever to possess any corporate existence and world-wide authority, that it should raise its voice with no uncertain sound by means of Provincial Synods and Catholic Councils in the interests of pure doctrine. And it is not too much to say that it was a matter of vital importance to the Church to gain the victory in the struggle forced upon it during the latter half of the fourth and the fifth centuries. Not that the Church was always right, and the heretics always wrong.

Far from it. The writer is not always able, like Lord Beaconsfield, to proclaim himself on the side of the angels. But if the Church, as in the Apocalyptic vision, was to ride crowned and armed, on its white horse, conquering and to conquer, then its sword must have been some such creed as that called the Athanasian, sharp, two edged, and awful.

But all this happened a long time ago. The Church is no longer in its infancy. When I was a boy nothing delighted me more than the Athanasian Creed. It was so definite, so clear, so logical, so comprehensive, so mysterious. Synthesis and analysis met and kissed each other. It was as good as one of those curious Chinese puzzles in which the queer shaped little pieces of wood each fit into its place, and together make up the complicated symmetrical figure. It was as comforting as the "blessed word Mesopotamy." But I am no longer young. To retain the Athanasian Creed in the reading of the Church of England services seems to me a blunder and a crime. One may fairly apply to it the Pauline condemnation, "When I was a child I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man I put away childish things." "To everything," says the preacher, "there is a reason, and a time to every purpose under heaven. . . . A time to gather stones together, and a time to cast away stones." This is a time for casting away stones—of stumbling. That which is recognised as a crime and a blunder can never be rightly considered a "buttress," or "bulwark," or "outwork" of the Church. Dean Stanley in the Christian Institutions remarks that "the creeds do not touch at all (except in the expression Light of Light) on the moral, which is the only important aspect of the question. They entirely (as was observed many years ago by Bishop Thirlwall) 'miss the point.' Bishop Pearson, in his elaborate dissertation, is wholly silent on this subject." If this be true of the Apostolic Creed, how much more true of the Athanasian? Do not let it be a just reproach that "one never means what one says."

One last word. There are doctrines of the Church of England, which even a loyal son cannot accept if he would exercise his reason and preserve his conscience void of offence. If, owing to the mildness of our times, there is no longer for such an one that godly discipline (which is much to be wished) which would excommunicate him or condemn him to the stake, he cannot avoid knowing (and being freely told) that he is a heretic, whose presence in Christian assemblies is rather suffered than allowed. He must be content with knowing that he is one of a small minority of believers. It will not therefore pain him nor offend him when he hears those with whom he habitually worships repeating beliefs in which he cannot join, because he will know that they say what they think, and he will not desire to impose limits on his brother's religious utterances. But the shameful thing about the Athanasian Creed is that his brother does not believe it and yet repeats it. From this grievous error, I, for one, would redeem him if I could, because it is not simply an error of opinion, but of Christian judgment, of conscience, of brotherliness, of plain common sense. I challenge any [orthodox] reader of the Inquirer to say that he holds to the Athanasian Creed in its entirety and without garbling—always barring "uncovenanted mercies," which he may have if he will, but not attempt to bestow on others.

H. CANDLER.

"NATURAL RELIGION."—II.

In the second chapter of his book * the author considers "The Abuse of the word Atheism." He does not deny that such a thing exists; on the contrary, he takes the view often expressed in these pages, and affirms that it "is a disbelief in the existence of God—that is, a disbelief in any regularity in the Universe to which a man must conform himself under penalties," and that it shows itself in two ways—as a speculative crotchet and as a great moral disease, the latter being "the real atheism." He points out with much force that there is often atheism under the guise of religiousness. There are men who have but a poor and paltry

